THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XVIII.

THE REIGN OF JAMES I. COMPRISING A PERIOD OF TWENTY-TWO YEARS, AND THREE DAYS.

24. JAMES I.

A. D. 1603.] ELIZABETH had no sooner breathed her last, than the council met to consult about the measures that were to be taken in the present juncture. The Queen's will was immediately opened, and found to confirm what she had declared by word of mouth. The King of Scotland had therefore in his person a threefold right, which rendered his title indisputable; and the new King was proclaimed by the name of James I. six hours after the Queen's death.

Though the council had been careful to send the King the first news of his accession to the crown of England, Sir Robert Carey, the Lord Hunsdon's youngest son, found means to be before them.

Presently after Carey's arrival, came Sir Charles Percy, and Thomas Somerset, who, by order of the council of England, notified to him the Queen's death, and the council's diligence in proclaiming him. These were quickly followed by Sir Thomas Lake, who was sent by the council to inform him of the state and condition of the realm.

As soon as James knew that he was proclaimed, he dispatched Aston to acquaint the Privy-Counsellors, that he was preparing for his journey; and accordingly he left Scotland the 5th of April, eleven days after Elizabeth's death. He spent above a month in his journey from Edinburgh to London, where he arrived the 7th of May. He had no sooner entered England, but the people strove to demonstrate their respect by magnificent entertainments in all the towns he passed through. Such were their acclamations, their wishes for his prosperity, their praises and joy for his arrival, that an honest plain Scotchman could not forbear saying, "This people will spoil a gud King." The multitudes which flocked from all parts to see their new Sovereign, grew at last so troublesome to him, that he was forced to set bounds to their curiosity by a proclamation. This was surprising to the people, who did not understand that a little inconveniency should hinder the King from receiving the respects of his new subjects.

At York, most of the English Lords came and paid him their homage. Among these was Secretary Cecil, now considered as out of favour, because he had been Essex's sworn enemy. But great was the surprise, when the King received him with extraordinary marks of esteem. This gave occasion to suspect, he had taken care, beforehand, to gain his favour; and the King's behaviour to him afterwards confirmed the suspicion.

On the 3d of May the King came to Theobald's, Secretary Cecil's house, where he staid some days. Here the council came to pay their respects to him, and here passed what was most remarkable in his journey till his arrival at London. When he was about to leave Scotland, he sent Carey to tell the Privy-Counsellors, that his intention was to keep every man in his post. However, at his coming to Theobald's, he increased their number with several others, most of whom were Scots; his design being, as he more plainly showed afterwards, to make but one kingdom of England and Scotland. The new Scotch Counsellors were the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Mar, the Lord Hume, Sir George Hume, Lord Kinloss, and Sir James Elphinston his Secretary. He nominated also two English noblemen, the Lord Zouch, and Burleigh, Secretary Cecil's eldest brother. At the same time or presently after, he admitted into his council the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, the Lords Thomas and Henry Howard, the one son, the other brother to the late Duke of Norfolk, of whom the former was a suspected, the latter a known, Papist; but upon the King's arrival he had embraced the Protestant religion.*

From the King's arrival in England to his departure from Theobald's, he made about two hundred Knights, and some days after his coming to London, he made many more. As Elizabeth had been sparing in the distribution of honours, with which Sovereigns are wont to reward the merit and services of their subjects, her successor on the contrary, bestowed them with a liberal, or rather profuse, hand. Never had the like number of Knights, Barons, and Earls, been made in any former reign. This occasioned a satirical libel, intituled, "A Help for Weak Memories to retain the Names of the Nobility."† Besides the three Howards, Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst and High-Treasurer, was made Earl of Dorset; Sir Robert Cecil was at first created Baron of Essingdon, then Viscount Cranburne, and afterwards Earl of Salisbury; and Philip Herbert, the Earl of Pembroke's brother, was made Earl of Montgomery.‡ The Earl of Southampton who had been condemned to die, and the Earl of Essex's son, were restored to their estates and honours before the King reached London. But the Lords Grey, Cobham, and Sir Walter Raleigh, who had been enemies to the Earl of Essex, were very coldly received.

James, with good natural parts, had a great share of learning. He was able to form the plan of a good government, the general maxims whereof he perfectly knew. But his aversion to war, his weakness for his favourites, certain prejudices he had imbibed, wherein all that approached him helped to confirm him, ever hindered him from putting his theory into practice. He was persuaded, that the authority of Sovereigns over their subjects was unlimited, and that all monarchical governments ought to be absolute. Moreover, he was strongly prepossessed in favour of his own merit and capacity. As soon as his courtiers discovered his genius and character, they failed not to attack him in the most sensible part. That is, they took all occasions to applaud his wisdom, learning, parts, and to talk in the highest strain of the regal power. As this pleased him infinitely, so it was the best way to gain his favour. Hence arose several expressions little known in the former reigns, but which were common in this. The King was called the Solomon of the age, and styled his Sacred Majesty, and these flattering titles, which he greedily received, confirmed him in his prejudices. He had one amongst the rest which greatly influenced his whole administration. And that was, he believed he was come to the crown of England solely by hereditary right, and could not bear, it should be thought he was obliged to Queen Elizabeth, or that his title proceeded from any act of Parliament. This pretended hereditary right, with its consequences, was the fountain of the divisions which began in this reign, between the King and Parliament, and which continued during the three following reigns. This also gave birth to the Tory and Whig factions.

This Prince's choice of the ministers who were to manage the public affairs, greatly conduced to cherish his high conceit of his personal qualities, and of the regal authority. The first was Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury. He was a man of great genius, consummate prudence, vast capacity, and perfectly acquainted with the state and interest of the nation. The Earls of Suffolk and Northampton, the one Lord Chamberlain, the other Lord Keeper, were much inferior to the Earl of Salisbury in parts and ability. But it is pretended they were Papists in their hearts, and as the Catholic religion could not be restored in England but by an arbitrary power, they earnestly laboured to indulge the King in his notions concerning the regal authority. All the rest of the courtiers followed the same method, and emulously strove to gain the King's favour, by a blind submission to his will.

Shortly after the King's arrival at London, he sent a numerous train of Lords and Ladies into Scotland to attend the Queen and his children, who were ready to come to him. He had three children, namely, Henry, nine years old, Elizabeth, and Charles.§

Whilst the Queen was on her journey, the King remembered, he had complained to Elizabeth of Valentine Thomas, who had slandered her, and was now in prison. It is not known wherein this slander consisted; but whatever it was, about a month after the King's arrival, Thomas was ordered to be brought upon his trial, and received sentence of death for conspiring against Elizabeth, and some of her council.‖

About the same time, and before the Queen's arrival, the Marquis of Rosny came from the King of France, to congratulate the King upon his accession to the crown of England. The French King's chief aim was, to hinder James from being gained by the Spaniards, and to renew his defensive alliance with Elizabeth, in which the ambassador succeeded to his wish.

Count Aremberg, ambassador from the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella, sovereigns of the Low-Countries, had come to London, some time before, but was sick, or feigned to be so, all the while the Marquis of Rosny stayed in England. It was not till after the Marquis's departure, that he desired the King to send one of his privy-council to hear the occasion of his embassy. Cecil, whom the King chose, was strangely surprised to hear nothing from him but compliments. Probably, this ambassador was sent into England, only to observe what passed, and to sound the new King's intention concerning a peace between England and Spain. James had shown by his proceedings, that he was inclined to peace, since, without solicitation, he had revoked the letters of marque granted by Elizabeth, to several private persons. Some time after, Taxis came also to London from the King of Spain, and having congratulated the King upon his accession to the crown, desired commissioners might be appointed to treat with him of a peace. This negotiation, which was then only begun, ended at length in a treaty of peace, concluded the next year.¶

The plague, which began to break out in December, increasing at London during the hot weather, the King retired for some time to Wilton, the Earl of Pembroke's seat, near Salisbury.

Whilst the court was at Wilton, a conspiracy, or rather the project of a conspiracy, was discovered, the authors whereof were Lord Grey, Lord Cobham, Sir

---

* The King's gratitude to the Howard family, who for the sake of the Queen his mother, were in disgrace in the late reign, did not stop there. The Lord Thomas was made Earl of Suffolk, and then Lord-Treasurer; and the Lord Henry was created, some years after, Earl of Northampton. Moreover, Philip, Earl of Arundel, the late Duke of Norfolk's eldest son, having lost his title by his condemnation, though Elizabeth gave him his life, the King created his son Thomas, Earl of Arundel and Surrey. Thus the King's regard for the Duke of Norfolk's family, plainly showed what he thought of Elizabeth's treatment of that Duke and his house. Upon all occasions he affected to show, it was only out of policy that he had, whilst she lived, concealed his aversion for the late Queen. The most notable mark he gave of it, was, that he neither went into mourning himself, nor would admit any person to his presence in a mourning-habit.

† James made so many Knights and Peers, particularly in the first years of his reign, that such a help was very necessary. It is pretended, that the current of honour was so stopped in Elizabeth's reign, that scarcely a county had Knights enough to make a jury.

‡ He also made Sir Robert Sidney, Baron of Penhurst; Sir William Knolles, Baron of Grayes; and Sir Edward Wotton, Baron of Marley. And afterwards, while preparations were making for his Coronation, which was performed the 25th of July, in the heat of a plague, he created Sir Thomas Egerton (Lord Chancellor) Baron of Ellesmere; Sir William Russel, Baron of Thornhaugh; Sir Henry Grey, Baron of Groby; Sir John Petre, Baron of Writtle; Sir John Harrington, Baron of Exeton; Sir Henry Danvers, Baron of Dantsey; Sir Thomas Gerard, Baron of Gerard-Bromley; Sir Robert Spenser, Baron of Worm-Leighton.

§ Henry was born February 19, 1593; Elizabeth, August 19, 1596; and Charles, November 19, 1600.

‖ About this time, Charles Lord Montjoy, returned out of Ireland, and brought with him Hugh O'Neal of Tyrone, or rather Tiroen (i. e. the land of Eugenius) being the name of an Irish county. The Lord Montjoy was honourably received, sworn of his Majesty's Privy-Council, and afterwards made Earl of Devonshire. Tiroen himself, who had been the cause of so much bloodshed, was pardoned, and proclamation made that he should be treated by all men with respect and honour.

¶ For the more solemn reception of Ambassadors, was at this time instituted a new officer, by the name of Master of the Ceremonies, with a salary of 200*l.* a year, of whom the first was Sir Lewis Lewkenor.

Walter Raleigh, George Brook, two priests Watson and Clark, and some others. The design was, to place on the throne Arabella Stewart, the King's cousin-german. To this end, the Lord Cobham was to treat with the Archduke at Brussels, and try to obtain six hundred thousand crowns, of which Raleigh was to have seventy thousand. Cobham was also to carry Arabella's letters to the Archduke, the King of Spain, the Duke of Savoy, wherein she should promise to marry the person they should name, and to grant a full toleration to the Catholics. It was further agreed, that the Lord Grey should ask the King's leave to raise two thousand men for the service of Holland, and with these troops should seize his person.* The conspirators, being apprehended, were tried at Winchester, in November following, and condemned to die. Raleigh was found guilty upon the written evidence of one single witness, namely, the Lord Cobham, even without being confronted. Only George Brook however, the Lord Cobham's brother, and the two priests, were executed, the King having ordered the rest to be sent back to prison, but without giving them a pardon. The Lord Grey died soon after, and the Lord Cobham obtained his liberty, but was deprived of his estate, and died in great poverty and distress. Sir Walter Raleigh remained twelve years in the Tower, where he wrote a History of the World.

Not long after the discovery of this plot, the King and Queen were crowned at Westminster with the usual solemnity, on the 25th of July, St. James's day.†

The Papists could not believe, that a Prince, who had never expressed any hatred of them, should suddenly alter his mind, and chuse to tread in the steps of Elizabeth. The Puritans imagined, that James, having been educated in their religion, and professed it all his life, till his arrival in England, would be propitious to them. Both were deceived, but the last much more than the first. Of the Catholics, James hated only the Jesuits, and such as were too servilely attached to the court of Rome, and the prerogatives of the Pope. But he saw it would not be in his power to grant a full toleration to the other Catholics. Thus the Catholics, who had expected at least a full toleration of their religion, were much surprised, when, upon presenting a petition to the King on this occasion, they received for answer, that he thought himself obliged to support what he found established in the kingdom.

The Puritans presented also their petition, not only for a toleration, but moreover to pray the King that sundry articles of the church of England, with which they could not comply, might be reformed. The Bishops failed not strenuously to oppose this petition, and to intreat the King to leave religion as he found it at his accession to the crown, without any innovation. This was what the King fully intended. When he first came into the kingdom, he not only went over to the church of England, but even meant to force the Puritans to conform, and to be revenged on them for what the Presbyterian synods had made him suffer in Scotland. Besides, the government of the church by Presbyters too much resembled a common-wealth, to be agreeable to a Prince so strongly prepossessed in favour of monarchy. The government of the church of England was much more conformable to his principles.‡ Not to appear at first too partial, he appointed a conference between the two parties, wherein he would be moderator himself. He also published a proclamation, commanding both sides to be quiet, till matters were regulated as he should judge proper.§

The

* As Raleigh, Guy, and Cobham were commonly believed, after the Queen's death, to have opposed proclaiming the King, till conditions should be made with him; they were upon that account, extremely obnoxious to the court and ministry; and people were apt, at first, to suspect, that the plot was merely a contrivance of secretary Cecil, to get rid of his old confederates, now become his most inveterate enemies. But the confession, as well as trial, of the criminals, put the matter beyond doubt. And though no one could find any marks of a concerted enterprise, it appeared that men of furious and ambitious spirits, meeting frequently together, and believing all the world to be discontented like themselves, had entertained very criminal projects, and had even entered, some of them at least, into a correspondence with Aremberg, the Flemish ambassador, in order to give disturbance to the new settlement.

† Immediately after the coronation, the King issued out a proclamation, expressly forbidding all persons, who had any business at court, to repair thither till winter, by reason of the plague which raged then exceedingly, and swept away above thirty thousand in London only.

‡ Wilson says, that the King thought if church power were in the hands of many, it would not be so easy to be managed, as when in the hands of one, who had dependence upon him, and with whom he might better grapple. And therefore the King would often say, No Bishop, no King.

§ The conference between some Bishops and Presbyterian ministers was held at Hampton-court, the 14th, 16th, and 18th of January 1604. The King let the ministers see immediately what they were to expect. He declared, "That, following the example of all Christian Princes, who usually began their reigns with the establishment of the church, he had now, at his entering upon the throne, assembled them for settling an uniform order in the same, for planting unity, removing dissentions, and reforming abuses, which were naturally incident to all politic bodies. And that he might not be misapprehended, and his designs in assembling them misconstrued, he further declared, that his meaning was not to make any innovation of the government established in the church, which he knew was approved by God, but to hear and examine the complaints that were made, and remove the occasion of them; therefore he desired the petitioners to begin, and to shew what were their grievances." Doctor Reynolds being the spokesman, reduced what he had to say to two heads, the first whereof related to the doctrine, and the second to the discipline of the church. As to the doctrine, he said, the articles of the church of England were in some places obscure, and in others defective. Then he mentioned the articles he spoke of, and desired the King they might be so explained as to leave no ambiguity, and that what was defective might be supplied. Whereupon a dispute was begun, wherein the King always replied, answering the ministers' arguments himself, one while with reasons, another while with authority and threats. The ministers, seeing the King become their adversary, chose to be silent, and feigned to be satisfied. The points they insisted upon were:

I. That sufficient care was not taken to plant good and learned pastors in the churches, to the great prejudice of the people.

II. That subscription was required to the Common Prayer Book, wherein they saw several things which their conscience would not suffer them to receive.

III. That the clergy were liable to the censures of lay-men, by means of the high commission.

IV. They objected against the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage, the surplice, with some other things which they looked upon as superstitious. There were warm disputes upon all these points, wherein the King took care to reply to the ministers himself, without giving the Bishops time to speak. The King's conduct was so agreeable to the Bishops and their friends, that the Lord Chancellor Egerton, unwilling to miss so fair an opportunity to flatter the King, said aloud, "He had often heard that the priesthood and royalty were united, but never saw it verified till now." Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, carried his flattery still farther, and said, "He verily believed the King spoke by the spirit of God." After this, the King dismissed the assembly, and ordered the Bishops and ministers to meet again, in three days, at the same place.

On the 18th of January, the day appointed by the King, the Bishops were called first into his presence, who delivered to him an explanation of the liturgy. Then the King questioned them about excommunication, the high commission, the oath ex officio, the subscription to the Common Prayer Book, and approving their answers, ordered the ministers to be called in, and the writing presented by the Bishops to be read before them. The ministers, believing it was in vain to make any reply, kept silence. However, the King, supposing they had nothing to object, and had reason to be satisfied with the condescension that was shown them, exhorted the Bishops to treat with lenity such as were of a contrary opinion, and commanded the ministers to preserve the unity of the church, and beware of obstinacy and disobedience. "Obedience and humility," added he, "are the marks of good and honest men, such I believe you to be; but it feareth me, that many of your sort are humourous, and too busy in the perverting of others. The exceptions taken against the Communion book, as I perceive, are matters of mere weakness, and they who are discreet will be gained with time, and by gentle persuasions; or if they be undiscreet, better it is to remove them, than to have the church troubled with their contentions. For the Bishops, I will answer, that it is not their purpose presently and out of hand, to enforce obedience, but by fatherly admonitions and conferences, to induce such as are disaffected. But if any be of an opposite and turbulent spirit, I will have them enforced to a conformity. Neither tell me, that the wearing of a surplice, or using the cross in baptism, will diminish the credit of ministers that have formerly disallowed the same; for that is just the Scottish argument, when any thing was concluded, that suited not with their humour, the only reason why they could not obey was, That it stood not with their credit to yield, having been so long of a contrary opinion. I will none of that, but that a time be limited by the Bishops of every diocese, to such, and they that will not yield, whatsoever they are, let them be removed; for we must not prefer the credit of a few private men to the general peace of the church."

In this manner passed the pretended conference; but it wrought not the conviction of the Puritans; and all the fruit the King reaped

A. D. 1604.] The 22d of February the King published a proclamation, commanding all Jesuits, and other priests having orders from any foreign power, to depart the kingdom.* This proclamation was so worded, that the King was extremely careful to show, he did not banish the Jesuits in hatred to the Catholic religion in general, but only on account of their attachment to the doctrine of the Pope's unlimited power over crowned heads.

The proclamation against the Jesuits was soon followed by another, enjoining the Puritans to conform to the worship of the established church.

As the Parliament was to meet the 19th of March, the King thought it necessary to gain the affection of his subjects, by suppressing some abuses introduced about the end of the late reign, tending to the oppression of the people. This he did by several proclamations against certain monopolies; against protections, frequently hindering the course of justice; against saltpetre men, who dug up people's houses, unless they were well fee'd; against the King's purveyors, who seized any man's horses and cart, under colour of employing them for the King, and then excused them for money. Among these proclamations, there was one not so acceptable to the people, namely, that against hunting, on very severe penalties to the offender.†

As the time of the Parliament's meeting approached, the King and Queen made their entry into London four days before, not having been able to do it sooner by reason of the plague. The King had need that day of all his patience, nothing being more disagreeable to him than the solemnities which drew a crowd of people about him.‡

The first public step which discovered the sentiments of James, was the calling of his first Parliament. Both in the writs and the proclamation, he took upon himself to describe what sort of representatives should be elected, not by way of exhortation, as the former Kings had done, but by way of command, and as conditions without which they should not be admitted into the House.§ This was directly striking at the Commons, whose privilege of deciding the validity of elections had never been questioned. He assumed a power not only to enjoin penalties on such as should offend against the statutes concerning elections, but also to enjoin them by a bare proclamation, the authority whereof he rendered equal to that of the laws.

The speech which the King made, on opening the Parliament, fully displayed his character, and proved him to possess more knowledge and better parts, than prudence, or just sense of decorum and propriety. In style and matter, it was equal to most performances of the age; but it was deficient in that majestic brevity, and reserve, which become a King, in his addresses to the great council of the nation. It candidly confessed, however, the too great facility with which his Majesty yielded to the solicitation of suitors: a fault which James promised to correct; but which adhered to, and distressed him, through the entire course of his reign. This speech was received with but little satisfaction by any party.

The first thing the Parliament did, was to prepare an act for acknowledging the King's title to the crown of England. James had not required it. On the contrary, in all appearance, by repeating several times in his speech, that he was undoubtedly King by birth-right, he designed to intimate, he did not want the Parliament's confirmation. But the two Houses did not, or seemed not to understand it, whether they resolved to preserve a privilege hitherto enjoyed, or feared such an omission might occasion troubles and rebellion. The King, on his part, thought it not prudent to refuse the act.

The principal affair for which the King had summoned the Parliament was, the union of the two kingdoms, though he pretended, his sole motive was to express his thankfulness to the English. He had so good an opinion of his eloquence, that he did not question the success of this affair, and the nomination of the commissioners for that purpose confirmed his belief. So, through impatience, or to engage the Parliament the sooner to unite the two kingdoms, he ordered himself to be proclaimed King of Great Britain, without staying for the Parliament's determination. Thenceforward he would hear no more of the distinction of the two kingdoms. St. Andrew's cross was quartered with St. George's in the flags, and by proclamation the Scotish coins were made current in England. This showed, the King did not doubt, the affair of the union would succeed to his wish. But he did not yet know the genius and character of the English. Such as had no share in his bounties, loudly murmured to see his Scotch attendants grown so rich in a very short space, that the English could not imitate their magnificence without ruining their estates. Several pasquils were daily made upon this occasion, not much to the advantage of the Scots, nor consequently to the design of the union of the two kingdoms.

There was also another thing which did not render the people favourable to the King. Immediately after the opening of the Parliament, the Commons examining, according to custom, the contested elections, there was a debate in the House, about the return of Sir Francis Goodwin, and Sir John Fortescue, for Knight of the shire, for the county of Bucks, and upon a full hearing, Sir Francis was declared duly elected. Three days after, the Lords sent a message to the Commons, that there might be a conference about Goodwin's election. The Commons, surprised at so extraordinary a message, answered, they did not think themselves obliged to give an account of their proceedings, and therefore could not grant the conference required. The Lords replied, the King having been acquainted with what had passed in Goodwin's case, thought himself engaged in honour to have the affair debated again, and had ordered them to confer with by it, was to show them how much they were mistaken in depending upon his protection.

Whitgift was a mild and peaceable man, who would have been very glad to reclaim the Puritans by gentle methods, agreeable to the gospel, but he died quickly after, on the 29th of February. He was succeeded by Richard Bancroft, a prelate of a very different character, who, instead of dealing gently with the Puritans, never ceased incensing the King against them, and doing them all the mischief he could. The persecution, which these suffered whilst Bancroft was at the head of the clergy, induced many families to withdraw out of the kingdom, to enjoy elsewhere liberty of conscience, denied them at home. Bancroft is also accused of having been one of the most zealous to instil into the King the maxims of arbitrary power.

* In this proclamation, the King acknowledges himself personally much beholden to the Bishop of Rome, for his kind offices and private temporal carriage towards him in many things, and says, he is ready to requite the same towards him as a secular Prince.

† Shortly after, another appeared, appointing the 5th of August to be kept as a holy day. It was ordered, that every year on that day public thanks should be returned to God in all the churches, for the King's miraculous deliverance in the year 1600, from the conspiracy of the Gouries, who made an attempt upon his life. This new holy day was not universally liked. Besides that the occasion of it happened to the King before his accession to the crown of England, there were people as well in Scotland as England, who had the malice to affirm it was only a fiction to cover a real conspiracy of the King against the two Ruthvens or Gouries, who were killed on this occasion.

‡ The suburbs and city were one continued scene of pageantry. There were seven triumphal gates or arches erected in the streets through which he was to pass from the Tower to Whitehall. It seems, he endured this day's brunt pretty patiently, being sure he should never have such another. But afterwards (says Wilson) in his public appearances, the crowds of people made him so impatient, that he often dispersed them with frowns, not to say curses. His private recreations at home, and his hunting exercises abroad, both with the least disturbance, were his delights.

§ "Wee notifye by theis presentes, that all retornes and certificates of knightes, citizens and burgesses, oughte and are to be brought to the Chauncery, and there to be fyled of record; and if any shall be founde to be made contrarie to this proclamation, the same is to be rejected as unlawful and insufficient, and the citie or borough to be fyned for the same; and if it be founde that they have commytted any grotse or wilful default and contempt in their election, retorne or certificate, that then their liberties, according to the lawe, are to be seized into our handes as forfeited; and if any person take upon him the place of a knight, citizen, or burgess, not beinge duely elected retorned and sworne according to the lawes and statutes in that behalfe provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this oure proclamation, then every person, soe offending, to be fyned and imprisoned for the same."

the Commons upon it. Whereupon, the Commons, by their speaker, gave their reasons to the King, why they could not admit of this innovation. But all they could obtain was, that instead of a conference with the Lords, the King commanded them to confer with the judges. This pleased them no more than the other. They set down their reasons in writing, and delivered them at the council chamber, to desire their Lordships to intercede for them to the King, not to violate their privileges. The answer was, the King absolutely commanded them to have a conference with the judges. The Commons were extremely surprised at so absolute an order. Meanwhile, fearing to be accused of too easily engaging in a quarrel with the King, they thought it more proper to yield, than stand out, fully bent however, to adhere to what had been determined in the case of the contested election. The King had engaged in a very nice affair, and probably, would not have come off with honour, had he not been disengaged by Goodwin's moderation. Sir Francis, chusing to forfeit his right, rather than occasion a quarrel between the King and the Commons, desired the House to order the county of Bucks to elect another Knight in his stead.

The Commons perceived by this affair, that the King's intention was to sound them, and that hereafter such incidents might frequently be revived. For which reason, on the 16th of June, addressing the King concerning certain grievances, they took occasion to represent their privileges, of which they supposed him not yet fully informed. This address so displeased the King, that on the 7th of July, he prorogued the Parliament to the 7th of February, to have time to think of means to humble the Commons.*

Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, was one of the first who attempted to go beyond the usual bounds, by causing things to depend on the King's will, which were undeniably within the Parliament's jurisdiction. He exhibited to the King and council twenty-five grievances of the clergy, which were desired to be reformed in granting prohibitions, that the King's courts might not have cognizance of what concerned these articles. It is said, his intention was to shew others the way to apply directly to the King, without regarding the Parliament or convocation. But the King was told, in case he granted the Archbishop's request, he would be engaged in inextricable difficulties, because the redressing of grievances had ever belonged to the Parliament. Whereupon, the King consulted the judges, who answered unanimously, he ought to refrain from deciding any thing concerning the Archbishop's request.

The conclusion of the peace with Spain soon followed the prorogation of the Parliament. Taxis having informed the King of Spain how the court of England stood affected, the constable of Castile was sent into the Low Countries, with orders to pass into England and conclude the peace. But the constable, being detained by some affairs in the Netherlands, conveyed his power to Taxis and Richardot. These two deputies being come to London, agreed upon a treaty, which was not however, signed till the 18th of August, after the arrival of the constable of Castile. Some say, this ambassador purchased the peace with large sums of money distributed among the King's ministers. However this be, the treaty with the King of Spain was double, there being one relating entirely to the commerce.†

The peace with Spain being concluded, the King was persuaded to grant a monopoly of the trade with Spain and Italy to a company of merchants, and to forbid all his subjects, except such as were authorized by this company, to traffic in those countries. But in the next session of the Parliament, the Commons, taking into consideration how destructive to trade such a monopoly was, represented so plainly to the King the ill consequences thereof, that the company's patent was revoked, and the trade with Spain and Italy declared free as before.

During the rest of the year 1604, nothing remarkable passed in England. The King led a peaceable life amidst the flatteries of his court, and very lavishly bestowed his favours on his minions; a species of liberality which bred great discontent in those who had no share in it.‡

The King made choice of his High Admiral, the Earl of Nottingham, for ambassador extraordinary to Spain. The Earl departed in March 1605, with a numerous retinue, consisting, according to some, of no less than six hundred and fifty persons.§ At the same time, the Earl of Hertford was sent in embassy to Brussels. Whilst he was at sea, a Dutch man of war sailed by, and refusing to strike, the English Captain, Sir William Monson prepared to compel him, but the ambassador would not give him leave. This was the first indignity of that nature received by England from the Dutch, whose sovereignty was not yet so much as acknowledged by any potentate in Europe.‖

Whilst every thing seemed to procure King James a quiet and peaceable reign, the Devil, envying the happiness of the English, inspired some of his agents with one of the most horrible plots that ever was heard of. This was the gunpowder-treason-plot.

Whatever might be the ground of the hopes entertained by the Catholics, when they saw King James ascend the throne of England, it is certain they expected great things from him, and at least a full toleration, with liberty of publicly exercising their religion. Upon this toleration they built their hopes of restoring, by degrees, their religion in England. But the King's speech to the Parliament, discovered two things. The first, that this toleration, which till then had been hardly doubted, was not yet ready to come. The second, that though they should obtain it of the King, it would not be for such as acknowledged the Pope's authority in its utmost extent. These were the men however, that were most active and eager to re-establish their religion in the kingdom. They despised a bare liberty of conscience for the moderate Catholics, to which the King seemed to confine his favours. They believed it to be the King's intention to divide the Catholics, and make two sects, whereof one, renouncing

* There were several statutes made in this Parliament, amongst which was one against conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil spirits.

† "By the IVth article of the first treaty it was agreed, that neither the Kings of England nor Spain, should directly or indirectly, give aid to the enemies or rebels of either part, of what nature or condition soever they were.

"By the Vth, they renounced all former leagues, confederacies, capitulations, and intelligences contrary to that treaty.

"In the VIIth, King James excuses the delivery of the cautionary towns to the King of Spain; and promises to enter into a treaty with the States, wherein he will assign a competent time to them, to accept and receive terms for a pacification with the Archduke; which if they refused, he would from thenceforth think himself freed from the former conventions with them."

These, doubtless, are the articles which have given occasion to say, the Spaniards bought the peace. There appears, however, to have been a secret article to the following effect:

"That as to the States of Holland and Zealand, things should remain as they were, as well with respect to the cautionary towns, as to the other articles of the treaties between Elizabeth and the said States, without the King of England's being obliged to recall his troops from the Low Countries; or to forbid his subjects to serve the said States. Moreover, that the commerce, trade, and navigation between the English and the said States, should continue upon the same footing as in Elizabeth's life-time."

‡ This year, the King, who was a great enemy to Tobacco, as appears by his writings against it, ordered by a proclamation, dated October 7, that besides the custom of two-pence in the pound it used to pay, there should be an additional duty of 6*s*. 8*d*. on every pound imported into the realm.

§ The Spaniards were astonished at the magnificence of the embassy, and the handsome gentlemen; for it seems the Jesuits reported our nation to be ugly, and like Devils, as a punishment for casting off the Pope; and they pictured Sir Francis Drake generally half a man and half a dragon. So easy is it, says Wilson, for those jugglers, when they have once bound up the conscience, to tie up the understanding also.

‖ The jealousy the English began to conceive of the Hollanders, was nothing in comparison of that caused by the King's prodigal favours to the Scots. This jealousy occasioned many insolencies; the streets of London swarmed night and day with bloody quarrels; and private duels were every where fomented between the English and Scots. The Scots complaining at first to the King, that they were so poor, they underwent the bye-word of beggarly Scots; the King replied to them, "Content yourselves, I will shortly make the English as beggarly as you, and so end that controversy."

the doctrine of the Pope's supremacy, should be tolerated in the kingdom, and the other expelled. This division appeared to them so destructive to the Catholic religion, that they imagined, the King by this artful and politic conduct, intended to reconcile to the church of England, such as should imprudently reject the Papal authority, as it happened in the reign of Henry VIII.

To prevent the execution of this pretended design, which might be very prejudicial to the church of Rome, some of these zealots consulted together, and formed a horrible plot, which was afterwards approved by the rest. The chief of these wretches was Robert Catesby, a gentleman of Northamptonshire, descended from the Catesbies mentioned in the reign of Edward V. This man, having gained Thomas Percy, the Earl of Northumberland's cousin, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, John and Christopher Wright, Francis Tresham, Guy Fawkes, Sir Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter, Thomas Bates, and Robert Keyes, chose five of them to consult how to restore the Romish religion in England. Percy, one of the most zealous, proposed killing the King, and offered to perform it. To this Catesby replied, "Though the King were dead, their cause would not be advanced, since he would leave sons, who perhaps would not be more favourable to the Catholics. Nay, supposing the King and his children were removed, there would remain so many of the nobles and gentry, that probably it would be very difficult to accomplish their design." He added, "he had thought of a way to destroy in an instant, almost all the principal enemies of the Catholic religion, and to throw the kingdom into such a consternation, that not a man would be able to take proper measures to oppose the execution of their design." This way was to blow up the Parliament house, whilst the King should be speaking his speech from the throne to the Lords and Commons. Then he shewed them in what manner the project might be executed, and was applauded by all. However, as so detestable a plot could not but breed ideas frightful and naturally shocking to conscience, some moved to have the lawfulness of the project examined by their divines. It is said, that Henry Garnet, Oswald Tesmond, and John Gerrard being consulted, approved of the plot as just and lawful, since it was against excommunicated heretics.

Be this as it will, the thing being determined, they took an oath of secrecy, administered, as it is said, by father Garnet.* Percy, being one of the gentlemen pensioners, was appointed to hire a house, adjoining to the upper house of Parliament. This passed in November or December 1604, and the King was to make his speech to the Parliament on the 7th of February. Percy having hired the house, the conspirators began, with no small labour, to dig in the cellar through the wall of partition, which was very thick.† But as the Parliament was prorogued to the 3d of October, they had as much time as was necessary to finish their work. In the beginning of February 1605, they had almost digged through the wall, when on a sudden they heard a noise on the other side. This threw them into a great fright, being apprehensive of a discovery; but their courage reviving, Guy Fawkes, who passed for Percy's footman, was sent to see what had occasioned their fear. Presently after he returned and said, the place whence the noise came, was a large cellar under the upper house of Parliament, full of coals, which were now under sale, and the cellar offered to be let. As nothing could be more favourable to their design, Percy immediately hired the cellar, and bought the remainder of the coals. Then he sent for thirty-six barrels of powder from Holland, and lodging them at Lambeth, caused them to be conveyed in the night into the cellar, and covered with coals and faggots.‡

The plot being thus in a fair way, it was considered what was to be done when the King, Prince Henry, his eldest son, the Lords, and Commons, should be buried in the ruins of the Parliament house. The Duke of York, the King's second son, being yet very young, was not to be present at the Parliament, and the Princess Elizabeth, his sister, was educated at a house belonging to the Lord Harrington, in Warwickshire. It was resolved therefore, that Percy, who had free admittance into the King's palace, should undertake to kill the Duke of York, and that others, under colour of a hunting match, should meet on the same day, near the Lord Harrington's house, and secure the Princess Elizabeth. As all this could not be effected without money, Tresham offered two thousand pounds sterling, Digby fifteen hundred, and Percy promised to supply four thousand. Some moved for foreign aid beforehand: but the motion was rejected. It was resolved only to demand assistance of France, Spain, and the Archduke, when the plot should be executed. Then after some consultation, they agreed to save the Princess Elizabeth, and proclaim her Queen. To this end, they drew up a proclamation, taking care to insert nothing concerning religion, for fear of alarming the people, till they were sufficiently strong to execute all their designs. Finally, they resolved to spread a report, after the blow should be given, that the Puritans were the authors of it.

The Parliament being further prorogued to the 5th of November, the conspirators expected the day with the utmost impatience, not one being touched with remorse of the crime they were going to commit. One of the conspirators, however, conceived a desire to save William Parker, Lord Monteagle, son of the Lord Morley. This Lord going home about seven in the evening, a letter was given him by his servant who received it from an unknown person, with a charge to deliver it into his master's own hand. The letter was without name or date, and expressed in these words:

"My Lord,

"Out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at the Parliament. For God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And think not slightly of this advertisement, but retire yourself into the country, where you may expect the event in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stir, yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurt them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is past so soon as you burn this letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it: to whose holy protection I commend you."

This letter was delivered to the Lord Monteagle, ten days before the meeting of the Parliament. Though it was unintelligible to him, though he imagined it only an artifice to frighten him, he carried it to the Earl of Salisbury, principal Secretary of State. The Earl shewed it to some Privy Counsellors, who understood the meaning of it no more than he. However they resolved to do nothing till the King's return, who was then at Royston.

The King returning to London the last day of October, the Earl of Salisbury read the letter to him, and concluded that it was written by some fool or madman.

* Catesby, Percy, Wright, Fawkes, and Winter, met behind St. Clement's church in London, and upon a primer gave each other the oath of secrecy, and afterwards went into the next room, where they heard mass, and received the sacrament upon the same.

† It was about three yards thick. They that worked in this mine, were, Percy, Catesby, Thomas and Robert Winter, John and Christopher Wright, and Fawkes. They began to work December 11, and about Candlemass had worked the wall half through. They all seven lay in the house, and had shot and powder, being resolved to die rather than yield or be taken. They had provided themselves with baked meats, to have the less occasion for sending out; and they went in the night, and were never seen.

‡ They put in at first but twenty barrels, but fearing they might be damp, they added sixteen more. There were a thousand billets, and five hundred faggots to cover them. In their indictment it is said, they put in thirty barrels and four hogsheads of gun-powder, and laid on them great iron bars and stones.

To convince the King, he repeated this sentence, "The danger is past so soon as you burn this letter." For, said he, if the danger be passed when the letter is burnt, what signifies this warning? But the King, ordering the letter to be read again, explained the words otherwise, and said, "So soon as you burn the letter," was to be interpreted, "In as short a space as you shall take to burn the letter." Then comparing this sentence with the foregoing, "That they should receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet should not see who hurt them," he concluded that some sudden blow was preparing by means of gun-powder. This interpretation being deemed very plausible, it was resolved, that all the rooms and cellars adjoining to the Parliament house should be searched, to see whether there was any powder concealed. This search was however deferred till the day before the meeting of the Parliament, in a belief, that the nearer the execution was, the more signs would be found. The Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain, went himself to search, without noise or hurry. When he came to the cellar where the powder was, and saw the coals and faggots with which it was covered, he asked Whyneard the keeper of the wardrobe, who attended him, to what use he had put the cellar? Whyneard answered, Mr. Percy had hired it, and very probably the coals and wood were the gentleman's fuel for winter. At the same time the Lord Chamberlain, perceiving a man standing in a corner, asked who he was, and being told he was Mr. Percy's servant, did not seem to take any further notice.* This affected negligence made the conspirators think there would be no further search, since nothing was found in the cellar to create any suspicion; and they prepared to execute their plot the next day.

The Earl of Suffolk having made his report to the council, it was thought, if there was any powder concealed, it was in the large cellar under the faggots and coals. But as the Parliament was to meet on the morrow, it was resolved not to search under the wood till midnight, in hopes to find, in or about the cellar, some persons from whom information might be had. Pursuant to this resolution, Sir Thomas Knevet, gentleman of the Privy Chamber, and justice of peace for Westminster, going to the cellar about midnight, found at the door a man in a cloak and boots, whom he immediately apprehended. This was Guy Fawkes, who passed for Percy's servant. Then causing the wood and coals to be removed, they found underneath, thirty-six barrels of powder. After this discovery, Fawkes being searched, there were found upon him a dark lantern, a tinder-box, and three matches. The villain, instead of being dismayed, boldly told them, if he had been taken within the cellar, he would have blown up himself and them together. The King, being acquainted with the discovery, ordered the prisoner to be examined concerning the circumstances of the plot. He confessed the design was to blow up the King and Parliament, and expressed great sorrow that it was not done, saying, it was the devil and not God that was the discoverer. He obstinately refused all that day to name any of his accomplices; but on the morrow, being shewed the rack, confessed all he knew.

The opening of the Parliament, which was to be the same day, being deferred, and the news of the conspiracy beginning to spread in London, Catesby, Percy, Winter, and the two Wrights, fled by several ways to their companions, who were to secure the Princess Elizabeth. These last were ready to execute their design the moment they should hear of the success of the mine at Westminster. As they did not question it would succeed to their wish, and believed they had nothing more to manage, they had the night before broken open a stable, and carried away seven or eight horses. This action had alarmed Sir Richard Verney, sheriff of the county, who had drawn the people together to seize the robbers. Presently after came the conspirators that fled from London, and told their companions, the plot had miscarried. Whereupon they resolved to keep together, to endeavour to make the Catholics rise, and put themselves at their head. But all their efforts ended in raising about four-score horse.

Meanwhile, the sheriffs of the neighbouring counties, having sent notice to one another, called the people to arms, and pursued the conspirators from place to place, till at length the villains were forced to take harbour at Holbeach, in Staffordshire, where the sheriff summoned them to surrender. They prepared to defend themselves, or fight their way through; but, in opening a barrel of powder to charge their muskets, it took fire and blew up part of the house. This accident constrained them to open the gate, and try to escape. Some were killed immediately by the people who surrounded them. Catesby, Percy, and Winter, standing back to back, fought desperately, till the two first were killed with one shot, and the other taken alive, after receiving several wounds. Digby, Rookwood, Grant, and Bates, yielded, or were taken, in trying to escape. Tresham, who staid at London with Robert Winter, brother of Thomas Winter, and Littleton, was discovered and apprehended with his two companions. All the prisoners were sent to the Tower, and strictly examined. Thomas Winter confessed himself guilty, and wrote his confession with his own hand. Digby vindicated his crime, because, having expected the King would grant a free toleration to the Catholics, and not seeing any likelihood of their obtaining it, he was driven by despair to engage in the plot. Tresham said at first, that father Garnet the Jesuit was privy to the conspiracy, but afterwards denied it, by his wife's instigation, as it is pretended, affirming, he had not seen him for sixteen years. But Garnet, who was apprehended after Tresham's death, confessed, he had frequently conferred with him within six months. The Earl of Northumberland was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in the plot. This suspicion was grounded upon his being Captain of the band of gentlemen pensioners, and admitting into it his cousin Percy, without administering to him the oath of supremacy, though he knew his religion. This affair being afterwards brought into the Star Chamber, the Earl was fined in thirty thousand pounds sterling, deprived of all his posts, and imprisoned during the King's pleasure.

The session of the Parliament began not till the 9th of November. The King then made a long speech, representing the heinousness and consequences of this horrible plot and magnifying the mercy of God in the miraculous discovery. But withal, he took great care to clear the Catholic religion, and to observe, that this abominable plot, was to be ascribed to such only as were truly Papists, and imbued with the most detestable principles. He affirmed, that there were not many of these, and it would be extremely injurious to accuse the Catholics in general of following such extravagant maxims.

The speech was much applauded by the courtiers, who admired its wisdom, justice, and equity, and remarked the King's greatness of soul, who at the very time he had so much reason to complain of the Catholics, took care to justify their religion, and hinder the innocent from being confounded with the guilty. But the rest of the people were not of the same opinion. They considered with grief and astonishment, the tender regard the King expressed for the Catholics in general, under pretence of a distinction, which was thought imaginary, or at least very useless, by reason of the difficulty of discerning those who held the maxims condemned by the King, from those who were willing to renounce them. They observed also, the difference which the King made, between the Romish religion and that of the Puritans. The former hindered not its professors from being faithful subjects, but the latter was not to be tolerated in any well governed commonwealth.

* The Lord Monteagle, curious to know the event, was with the Lord Chamberlain, and hearing Percy named, immediately guessed the letter came from him, there being great friendship between them.

As soon as he had ended his speech, the King prorogued the Parliament to the 21st of January.*

A. D. 1606.] The discovery of the powder-plot was universally ascribed to the King's penetration, who alone discovered the meaning of the letter to the Lord Monteagle. Some of his flatterers even did not scruple to say, he could never have found out the mystery, without the immediate assistance of the Holy Ghost.

The King of Spain's and the Archduke's ambassadors testified their joy for this deliverance, by bonfires before their doors, and fountains of wine to the mob. The King publicly declared, he was sure no foreign Prince was privy to the plot. Indeed, all the Princes, as well Catholic as Protestant, expressed their abhorrence of so damnable a design, and congratulated him upon his deliverance.

The Parliament meeting the 21st of January, the King appointed commissioners to try the conspirators. He had till now delayed to give the people the satisfaction to see these villains punished. But perceiving if he did not do it of himself, the Parliament would not fail to petition him, he resolved to give them over to justice. There were but eight executed the 31st of January,† though the number of the guilty was much greater. Some time after, Oldcorn, a Jesuit, saying openly, that the ill success of the conspiracy did not render it the less just, was sent to prison, condemned, and executed. Henry Garnet, provincial of the English Jesuits, having also been arrested, was sentenced to die as a traitor, upon the depositions of those that were already executed. The Jesuits have been pleased to honour these men with the title of martyrs, as if they had suffered only in hatred to their religion. But King James's humour and character will not permit it to be thought, that he put men to death only because they were Catholics.‡

Whilst the Parliament was considering the powder-plot, it was suddenly rumoured that the King was stabbed at Oking with a poisoned knife. This rumour instantly threw the people into the utmost consternation, imagining it was the effect of some fresh conspiracy. But the alarm was soon over. Two hours after came certain advice that the King was alive, and he even returned to London that very day, and published a proclamation to quiet the people. The Spanish ambassador distinguished his affection for the King, by presenting Sir Lewis Lewkenor with a gold chain, for bringing him the news of his safety.

Meanwhile, the Parliament seriously applied themselves to prevent the designs of the Popish recusants, that is, of such as refused to acknowledge the King's independent authority. For the more easy discovery of such persons, the two Houses agreed to draw up an oath, which all subjects, without exception, should be obliged to take. This oath was called the oath of allegiance, that is, of submission and obedience to the King, as sovereign, independent of any other power upon earth. It differed from the oath of supremacy, as it concerned only the King's temporal sovereignty, and his independence of the Pope; whereas the other, enacted in the reign of Henry VIII. obliged the subjects to acknowledge the King for supreme head of the church of England.§

Most of the English Catholics, with the arch-priest Blackwell their superior, made no scruple to comply with the oath; and even when Urban VIII. sent them a brief, dated October 31, 1606, forbidding them to take it, they thought the brief was forged by their enemies, to draw them into a non-compliance. But the Pope spoke more fully the next year, and by a second brief plainly told them, if they took the oath, they forfeited all hopes of salvation. At the same time, Cardinal Bellarmine, under the feigned name of Tortus, wrote a book against this oath, and a letter to the Arch-priest Blackwell, to admonish him to repent, as if in taking the oath he had committed the most heinous offence. This occasioned King James's apology for himself, published some time after, with a preamble addressed to all Christian Princes, wherein he cleared himself from the imputation of being a persecutor of the Catholics.

The common danger, which threatened the whole kingdom, stifled for a time the disputes between the King and Commons, which arose in the first session of the Parliament. The Commons were so far from intending to revive them, that, on the contrary, to gain the King's good will, they granted him one of the largest subsidies that had ever been given to his predecessors in the urgent occasions of the State, though he was then in profound peace, and wanted money only to enrich his favourites. The affair of the union of the two kingdoms was deferred to the next session; and the King having no further occasion for the Parliament, prorogued it from the 27th of May to the 18th of November.

The supply from the Parliament, came very seasonably to the King, to give a splendid reception to his brother-in-law the King of Denmark, who arrived shortly after, to visit the Queen his sister, and the King. During his stay in England, there was one continued, though various, scene of diversions, as plays, sights, entertainments, balls, masquerades, and hunting, in a word, every thing that was thought proper to divert him.

The session of the Parliament, which began the 18th of November, was chiefly employed in the affair of the

* The Lords Mordant and Sturton, suspected of being privy to the plot, were fined, the first ten thousand marks, the other six thousand, though there was no other proof against them, but their not coming to the Parliament. They were sentenced by the Star Chamber, which was then the terror of the great men, and which, for the least offence, condemned the parties accused in exorbitant fines to the King's use. The King gave the Lord Monteagle, the first discoverer of the treason, two hundred pounds a year in fee farm rents, and five hundred pounds a year during his life, as a reward for his good service.

† Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, were executed at the west end of St. Paul's church, January 30; and the next day, Thomas Winter, Ambrose Rookwood, Robert Keyes, and Guy Fawkes, suffered the punishment of traitors, in the Old Palace-yard at Westminster.

‡ The order of the Jesuits was founded by Ignatius Loyola, a Biscayan gentleman, about the year 1538, under the pontificate of Paul III. The dispersion of this order, which had long been formidable throughout the world, was one of the consequences of the French revolution. Since the downfall of Buonaparte, however, it has been restored by the present Pope, by a bull dated August 7, 1814. For a detailed account of the origin and principles of this order, see Robertson's History of Charles V.

§ Here follows the oath which has been, and still is spoken of by many, without well knowing what it is.

I, A. B. do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare, in my conscience before God and the world, that our sovereign Lord King James, is lawful King of this realm, and of all other his Majesty's dominions and countries: and that the Pope neither of himself, nor by any authority of the church or see of Rome, or by any other means whatsoever, hath any power or authority to depose the King, or to dispose of any of his Majesty's kingdoms, or dominions, or to authorise any foreign Prince to invade or annoy him or his countries, or to discharge any of his subjects of their allegiance and obedience to his Majesty, or to give license or leave to any of them to bear arms, raise tumults, or to offer any violence or hurt to his Majesty's royal person, state, or government, or to any of his Majesty's subjects within his Majesty's dominions. Also I do swear from my heart, that, notwithstanding any declaration or sentence of excommunication, or deprivation made or granted, or to be made or granted by the Pope, or his successors, or by any authority derived, or pretended to be derived from him or his see, against the said King, his heirs or successors, or any absolution of the said subjects from their obedience; I will bear faith and true allegiance to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, and him and them will defend to the uttermost of my power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever, which shall be made against his or their persons, their crown and dignity, by reason or colour of any such sentence, or declaration, or otherwise, and will do this my endeavour to disclose and make known to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, all treasons and traiterous conspiracies, which I shall know or hear of, to be against him or any of them. And I do further swear, that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and position, that Princes which be excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, may be deposed and murthered by their subjects or any other whatsoever. And I do believe, and in conscience am resolved, that neither the Pope, nor any person whatsoever, hath power to absolve me of this oath, or any part thereof; which I acknowledge by good and full authority to be lawfully ministered unto me, and do renounce all pardons and dispensations to the contrary. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to these express words by me spoken, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation, or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And I do make this recognition and acknowledgment heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the true faith of a Christian.

So help me God.

union,

union, which the King strongly solicited. Sir Francis Bacon, the King's solicitor, was ordered to move and support it with the best arguments he could devise. But though he was learned and eloquent, he met in the House of Commons, with persons able to withstand him, and to alledge as strong reasons against, as he did for, the union. The chief objections were, the inequality between the state and riches of the two kingdoms, the difference of the laws and customs, and Scotland's perpetual alliance with France. But the most prevailing argument, though it was not publickly insisted upon, was the jealousy of the English, which baffled all Bacon's rhetoric.

A. D. 1607.] The King, hearing the affair was not likely to succeed in the Parliament, sent for both Houses to Whitehall, and endeavoured in a long speech to shew the necessity of the union, and the common advantage it would procure. He answered the objections alledged in the two houses, speaking one while with great mildness, another while with a menacing tone, turning himself every way to attain his ends. He said, it was not reasonable, the English and Scots should consider each other as enemies, whilst subjects of the same King, and consequently it was necessary all hostile laws should cease, meaning the laws made from time to time upon the frequent invasions of the Scots on the borders of England. He added, it was no less reasonable, there should be between the two nations community of commerce, since he was no stranger, but descended from the ancient Kings of England, and could not be natural liege-lord to both, whilst they were strangers to each other. Finally, it was against nature, for people who lived under the same dominion, to be no more united than Frenchmen and Spaniards. In answering the objection taken from the perpetual alliance between France and Scotland, he affirmed, the alliance was not between the two nations, but only between their Kings.

The earnestness which the King expressed for the union of the two kingdoms, was not capable of prevailing with the Parliament. All he could obtain, was the repealing of the hostile laws.

The ill success of this affair extremely troubled the King. Thenceforward he always appeared very averse to Parliaments; as on the other hand, the people began to dislike him. They could not see without grief, so many proclamations, which seemed to suppose the King's will to be the sole rule of the government. The King's needless expences were another cause of complaint, because they were compared with Queen Elizabeth's frugality and good management. All this began to form a cloud, which perhaps would have been followed by a storm, had not the King, on the 4th of July, prorogued the Parliament to the 16th of November, and afterwards to the 9th of February.*

Before the Parliament was prorogued, there were some commotions in Northamptonshire,† where the country people rose in arms, under the conduct of one John Reynolds, who styled himself Captain Pouch; but these troubles were short lived. The sheriff of the county found means to disperse the rebels, without the assistance of any regular troops.‡

April 11, 1608, George Gervis, a seminary priest of Rheims, was hanged at Tyburn; and the 23d of June, Thomas Garnet, a Jesuit, had the same fate. Garnet was offered a pardon, provided he would take the oath of allegiance, which he resolutely refused.

The chief concern of the ministers was to see that the King did not want money. One of the properest meaus devised to procure this, was the monopoly of the sale of cloths, at the solicitation of a certain merchant, who, in all appearance, dearly purchased his patent. At this time, the English were not skilled in the art of dressing and dying English woollen manufactures. They sent them into Holland white, and the Hollanders, after they had dyed them, sent them back, and sold them in England. The merchant just mentioned, intimating to the King and ministry, that a great profit would accrue to England, if the cloths were dressed at home, obtained a patent to dress and dye them, exclusive of all others. Then the King published a proclamation, forbidding all persons to send any white cloths abroad. Whereupon the Hollanders prohibited the importation of dyed cloths from England. So the merchant who obtained the patent, not being able to sell his dyed cloths any-where but in England, was forced to dress and dye only a small quantity. This raised such clamours amongst the cloth weavers, that the King was obliged to permit the exportation of a certain quantity of white cloths. At length, the court by degrees connived at the offenders, and the woollen trade continued upon the same footing as before.§

Archbishop Bancroft never ceased to plague the Puritans, to oblige them to conform to the church of England. For this reason, great numbers of these people resolved to go and settle in Virginia, discovered in the late reign by Sir Walter Raleigh. Accordingly, some departed for that country; but the Archbishop, seeing many more ready to take the same voyage, obtained a proclamation, enjoining them not to go without the King's express licence. The court was apprehensive, this sect would become in the end too numerous and powerful in America. This very year the Archbishop made a fresh attempt concerning the twenty-one articles formerly mentioned: but the opposition of the judges was so strong, that the King, however desirous he was to please the prelate, durst not proceed.

A. D. 1609.] In the spring of this year, after a long negotiation, was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, that war which, for nearly half a century, had been carried on with such fury, between Spain and the States of the United Provinces. Never contest seemed, at first, more unequal; never contest was finished with more honour to the weaker party. On the side of Spain were numbers, riches, authority, discipline: on the side of the revolted provinces, were found the attachment to liberty and enthusiasm of religion. By her naval enterprises the republic maintained her armies; and, joining peaceful industry to military valour, she was enabled, by her own force, to support herself, and gradually to rely less on those neighbouring Princes, who, from jealousy to Spain, were at first prompted to encourage her revolt. Long had the pride of that monarchy prevailed over her interest, and prevented her from hearkening to any terms of accommodation with her rebellious subjects. But, finding all intercourse cut off between her provinces, by the maritime force of the States, she at last agreed to treat with them as a free people, and solemnly so renounce all claim and pretension to their sovereignty.

This chief point being gained, the treaty was easily brought to a conclusion, under the joint mediation and guarantee of France and England. All exterior ap-

* In this session it was enacted, that every person who is drunk, shall forfeit for every offence five shillings, to be paid to the churchwardens of the parish.——In the beginning of this year, 1607, was begun a new English translation of the Bible, which was published in 1611, and is the same as is now in common use.

† And in Warwickshire, Leicestershire, &c. The cause of their dissatisfaction was, the enclosing of commons and other lands; and so all the mischief they did, was to break down hedges, fill up ditches, and lay open all enclosures.

‡ The Earl of Tiroen, the famous Irish rebel, pardoned by Queen Elizabeth, and brought to London the beginning of this reign, shortly after, returned to his native country. He not only attempted once more to raise a rebellion in Ireland, but also applied to foreign Princes for assistance. His secret practices not succeeding to his expectation, he was afraid of being apprehended, and chose to leave Ireland, taking with him the Earl of Tirconnel, whom he had drawn into his plots. When he had come to a place of safety, he gave out, that the outrages committed in Ireland upon the Catholics had constrained him to forsake his estate and country.

§ The same year, the King engrossed to himself the selling of alum, which had been lately discovered in England, and prohibited the importation of foreign alum, by proclamation. A proclamation was also published, prohibiting all foreign nations to fish on the coasts of Great Britain. This occasioned the next year a treaty, whereby the Hollanders engaged to pay an annual sum for leave to fish. The King would have afterwards broken the treaty, and taken from them the license he had granted them; but they maintained their privilege against his consent, by guarding their fishing boats with men of war. James, being a pacific Prince, did not think this a sufficient motive to quarrel with them.

pearances of honour were paid equally to both crowns: but very different were the sentiments which the States, as well as all Europe, entertained of the Princes who wore them. Frugality and vigour, the chief circumstances which procure regard among foreign nations, shone out as conspicuously in Henry as they were deficient in James. To a contempt of the English monarch, Henry seems to have added a considerable degree of jealousy and aversion, which were sentiments altogether without foundation. James was just and fair in all transactions with his allies;* but it appears from the memoirs of those times, that each side deemed him partial towards their adversary, and fancied that he had entered into secret measures against them. So little equity have men in their judgments of their own affairs; and so dangerous is that entire neutrality affected by the King of England!†

A. D. 1610.] The King's proceedings increased the discontent of most of the English. The proclamations which were every day published, and whereof several were upon subjects not used to be decided by the former Kings without the concurrence of the Parliament, bred suspicions and jealousies, which the King was not sufficiently careful to stifle in their birth. On the other hand, his condescension for the Roman Catholics, whose cause he espoused on all occasions, their access and credit at court, even to their being admitted to the most important offices, and into the ministry itself, created fears in the people, and caused them to suspect some plot was formed against the Protestant religion. The ministers, knowing these dispositions, were justly apprehensive of meeting great difficulties in the Parliament, which was to sit the 9th of February. The King intended to procure money, of which he was in great want, though he had no war upon his hands, nor any affair which seemed to require an extraordinary aid. It was therefore necessary at least to give the Parliament good words, and try to palliate his immense expences, since his accession to the crown. But James, believing it to be derogatory to the dignity of a Sovereign, to make an apology himself to his subjects, ordered the Earls of Suffolk and Salisbury to do it for him. The Earl of Salisbury's speech, however, produced not the effect hoped by the King and his ministers. Some of the Commons loudly complained of the King's prodigality, and excessive bounty to the Scots.

But what made most noise in the Lower-House was the High-Commission, which exercised in the kingdom a kind of inquisition on matters of religion and state.‡

The King being informed of what was talked in the Parliament, sent for both houses to Whitehall, and endeavoured to show, he was unjustly complained of. But withal, he intimated by some expressions which plainly discovered his sentiments, that if he did not rule with an absolute sway, it was not for want of power, but entirely owing to his equity.§ The whole speech tended, either plainly, or ambiguously, to establish in the King an absolute and despotic power. The English had not been used to hear their Kings speak in this manner. Henry VIII. the most arbitrary of all, managed the Parliament, in order to procure acts in favour of the Sovereign, but never pretended to establish his authority upon such principles. So, the Commons, evidently perceiving what the King had in his thoughts, resolved strenuously to oppose his designs. But it was not yet a proper season to begin. They feigned therefore to take no notice of the maxims the King would have established, and granted a subsidy, though a much smaller than he expected. This done, the Parliament, having sat till July 23, was prorogued to the 16th of October.‖

Before the end of the session, the King created his eldest son Henry, Prince of Wales, and settled his household, so that the young Prince kept his court at St. James's, whilst the Queen kept her's at Somerset House, to which she gave the name of Denmark House; but it was called so only during her life, and among her own people.¶

Whilst James lived in profound tranquillity, the eyes of all Europe were fixed upon Henry IV.'s grand project to humble the house of Austria. But whilst he was preparing for this expedition, he was murdered by Ravaillac, a Friar, in his own coach, in the midst of Paris.

The murderer's confession,†† discovered, that this regicide was committed in consequence of that doctrine of the Romish church, which was so disagreeable to King James, and the Jesuits were universally believed to be concerned in it. Wherefore, James, finding how much it behoved him to remove from his person, men who held so detestable a doctrine, issued out a fresh proclamation, commanding all Jesuits, and priests,

* The plan of accommodation which James recommended, is found in Winwood; and is the same that was recommended by Henry, as we learn from Jeanin. It had long been imagined by historians, from Jeanin's authority, that James had declared to the court of Spain, that he would not support the Dutch in their pretensions to liberty and independence. But it has since been discovered, by Winwood's Memorials, that that report was founded on a lie of president Richardot's.

† The fifteen years' letters patent granted by Queen Elizabeth to the East-India Company expiring about this time, King James granted them, in May this year, an enlargement of their privileges, and a Charter whereby he incorporated them for ever.

‡ For the better understanding of this cause of complaint, it must be remembered, that when Henry VIII. was declared supreme head of the church of England, he appointed Cromwell for his Vicegerent in religious affairs, with power to exercise the supremacy in his name. After the tragical end of this first and only Vicegerent, this office was executed by commisioners. And this is what was called the High-Commission, which continued during the lives of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. and ceasing in Mary's reign, was revived by Elizabeth. In her reign the High-Commission exercised its authority with great moderation. But the case was otherwise under James I. This Prince, as frequently observed, mortally hated the puritans, and after his proclamation for uniformity, it was the High-Commission's business to see his injunctions executed. It may easily be guessed that the Commissioners, who were all named by the King, were not favourable to the puritans. Accordingly, they very rigorously exercised their power. Had they stopped there, this severity upon a set of obstinate people, as they were reckoned, and whose number was small in comparison of the Episcopalians, would not have excited the complaints of the Lower-House. But, because the puritans were against the Hierarchy, the King inferred they were also against monarchy, and there were but too many who laboured to confirm him in this notion. For this reason, all who were not very submissive to the King's orders, or great assertors of the privileges of the people, were affectedly called puritans. Under this pretence the High-Commission proceeded against them, and wanted not means to molest them. Thus, to be really a Protestant and member of the church of England, the communicating in that Church, and complying with the external worship, were not sufficient, the King's authority was also to be acknowledged as extensive as his flatterers were pleased to make it. They who ventured to censure his conduct, and question his unlimited power, were deemed infected with puritanism, and to reason upon puritanical principles. So, there were then two sorts of puritans, church-puritans, and state-puritans. But the High-Commission affected to confound them one with another, in order to exercise authority upon both. This was the occasion of the complaints in the House of Commons.

§ He wished, however, that three things especially were reformed in the common law:

I. That it were written in the vulgar tongue, and made plain to the people's understanding.

II. That it might have a settled text in all cases, and the exposition of it were fixed by act of Parliament.

III. That the divers contrary reports and precedents, and the several statutes and acts of Parliament that crossed one another, might be reviewed and reconciled.

‖ The acts made in this session were these:

I. That all such as are to be naturalized, or restored in blood, shall first receive the Sacrament, and take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy.

II. An act for the due execution of divers laws and statutes against rogues, vagabonds, and other lewd and idle persons; whereby it is provided, that there shall be a house of correction erected in every county, to set such persons to work.

III. An act to avoid the double payments of debts.

¶ All historians affirm, the Prince of Wales was of a very different character from that of the King his father. Though he was but sixteen years old, there appeared in him principles of equity, justice, moderation, magnanimity, which so gained him the love and esteem of the English, that the King could not forbear being jealous. His court was well regulated, no extravagancies or indecencies were seen there, except perhaps the too frequent masquerades, which were then much in vogue, because the Queen was passionately fond of them. As for the King, it is said, he did not spend much of his time in state-affairs, but entirely trusted to his ministers.

 Soon after this, viz. August 19, King James renewed the league between the kingdoms of England and France; and received from Lewis XIII. sixty thousand pounds sterling, due to the crown of England.

†† At his examination he boldly confessed he did it, because the King did not take arms against the Huguenots, and that making war against the Pope, is the same as to make war against God, "Seeing the Pope was God, and God was the Pope."

to depart the kingdom, and all recusants not to come within ten miles of the court. Then he caused all his subjects to take the oath of allegiance, which the Parliament, then sitting, had first taken.

The court of Spain was generally suspected of contriving the King of France's murder, because, that Prince was known to be making great preparations against the house of Austria, and that house was not seen to prepare to oppose his designs. Meanwhile, whether James did not believe it, or thought it adviseable to gain the friendship of a house so formidable to the Protestants, he sent to Sir Charles Cornwallis, his Ambassador, to negotiate a marriage between the Prince of Wales, and the King of Spain's eldest daughter.*

Parliament meeting the 16th of October, the Commons were in a humour which pleased not the King. Therefore he determined to dissolve the Parliament by proclamation, the 31st of December, having first prorogued it.†

On the 1st of September, Prince Maurice became master of Juliers, with the aid brought by the Marshal de la Chatre from France, and the English forces that were in the service of the States, under the command of Sir Edward Cecil, the Earl of Salisbury's brother.

The King being freed from the incumbrance of the Parliament, and resolving never to call another, the courtiers greatly applauded his design. The three courts were a continual scene of mirth and diversions, and especially the Queen's, where scarcely any thing else was regarded. She had her favourites, as the King had his, that is, persons whose avidity was to be satisfied. The King, however, had not yet a favourite, according to the usual sense of the word, though whilst he reigned in Scotland, he had plainly showed he could hardly be without one. This Prince's taste was very different from that of most others. Neither virtue, nor merit, nor eminent qualities, had any charms for him. He was to be captivated only by something external and dazzling, as youth, gracefulness of person, fine cloaths, and the like. It was not, however, till 1611, that the Scots found means to gain the advantage of their rivals, by giving the King a favourite of their nation.

Robert Carr, a young Scotch gentleman about twenty years of age, just come from learning his exercises in France, going to court to wait on the Lord Hay, his countryman, to whom he was recommended, that Lord had no sooner cast his eyes on him, but he imagined him a fit person to fix the King's affections. With this view, he resolved to show him at court, and surprize the King, by presenting to him, as by chance, this new object. One day, at a tilting, he chose Carr to present his shield and device to the King, according to custom. The King being on horseback, and Carr advancing to perform his office, his horse by some accident happened to start, throw him down, and break his leg. The King, sorry for this misfortune, asked who the young man was, and hearing his name was Carr, remembered he had a page of that name in Scotland, which proved to be the same. This made him still more concerned for his fall, and was the cause of his ordering him to be lodged in the palace, and all possible care to be taken of him. The tilting was no sooner over, but he visited Carr in his room. Next day he came again. In short, as long as Carr kept his bed, not a day passed but the King spent an hour or two with him. He found in this young Scot no great depth of learning or experience, yet such a calm outside, as made him think there might be a fit harbour for his most retired thoughts. Wherefore he resolved to fix his inclination upon this object, hoping to render him, by his instructions, as great a man as any of his ministers. As soon as Carr was recovered, the King made him a Knight, and Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and took the pains himself to teach him Latin. In a word, Carr became a perfect favourite. All suits, all petitions, were addressed to him, and no favours granted but by his means. Happily for him George Hume, Earl of Dunbar, a Scotchman, who was very much esteemed by the King, died about this time. So Carr enjoyed the King's favour without a rival, and was raised to the office of Lord Treasurer of Scotland, vacant by the death of Dunbar.

The King's new inclination hindered him not from interposing in the disputes caused in Holland, by the diversity of opinion upon certain religious points, between the Gomarists and the Arminians or remonstrants.‡

* Richard Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, and grand adversary of the puritans died about this time. He had procured the King's patent to found a college at Chelsea, for the maintenance of a certain number of able controversists, who were to combat with their sermons and writings, the adversaries of the church of England, as well puritans as papists, but his death put an end to the project. George Abbot, who succeeded him, was of a very different character. He was even suspected and accused of being a puritan, because he would not, like his predecessor, persecute that sect, nor blindly follow the maxims of the court with respect to government.

† The ministers, finding by the motions made in the Lower-House, that a resolution was taken to use the most effectual methods to redress the grievances, thought it against the King's and their own interest, to suffer the Commons to execute this project. The pretences for dissolving the Parliament set forth in the proclamation, were,

"That the King had proposed many things for the differing and surpassing the graces and favours of former times, both in nature and value, in expectation of a good conclusion of some weighty cause, which had been there in deliberation, and not only for the supply of the necessities of his Majesty's estate, but for the ease and freedom of his subjects: but these being, the two last sessions, little taken notice of; and that the members, by reason of the length of Parliament, were debarred from the hospitality they kept in the country, and that divers shires, cities, and boroughs, had been burdened with expence of maintaining their members; for these reasons he dissolved them." This Parliament, being the first of this reign, had sat seven years. From its dissolution to the year 1614, it was the ministry's business to devise ways and means to supply the King's wants.

‡ Franciscus Gomarus and Jacobus Arminius, both divinity-professors in the University of Leyden, had some years since discovered a difference in opinion, concerning absolute predestination, inadmissibility of grace, and some other theological points. They began their disputes at the end of the last century; but the war at that time not permitting people to attend to their controversy, it was confined to their schools till the year 1608. Gomarus followed the opinion of the first Reformers, and Arminius took a contrary course. At last, the States of Holland, perceiving a schism was forming in their church, endeavoured to prevent it by means of conference, which served only to inflame it. The disputes continued; each strengthened his party; and the States, being then employed in the important affair of the truce, could not attend to this, and prevent its consequences. Arminius dying in 1608, his disciples and followers continued the dispute. At length they presented to the States a petition, containing the articles of the faith; and as, instead of the term petitioners, they used that of remonstrants, they were so called, and gloried in the name. The Gomarists presented likewise their petition, styling themselves Contra-Remonstrants.

Arminius's professorship was filled by Conrade Vorstius, divinity-professor at Steinfort, in the county of Bentheim. This divine had published a Treatise concerning God, which had so excited the Gomarists against him, that he was obliged to clear himself in a printed apology from their imputations. But notwithstanding, before he came to Leyden, he was represented as a real Socinian. In 1611, he was attacked by some divines, who offered to show damnable errors both in his Treatise concerning God and in his Apology. These two books being sent into England, the King read them, and presently after sent to Sir Ralph Winwood, his Ambassador at the Hague, a list of the errors he had remarked, ordering him withal, to declare to the States, that he was resolved to publish in print, how much he detested such abominable errors, and the allowers and tolerators of them. This was directly falling upon the States, who had acquitted Vorstius. The Ambassador presented therefore on this occasion a memorial, to which the States returned a modest answer, though they had reason to complain of the haughtiness the King treated them with. Before the King received the answer, he had ordered some of Vorstius's books to be publicly burnt at London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Notwithstanding all this, Vorstius was received at Leyden, and the King wrote against him to the States with so much vehemence, that, in his opinion, burning was too good for him. He even threatened, that in case they continued to tolerate this professor, he would cause the churches of England and Scotland to withdraw from the communion of that of Holland, and exhort all her reformed churches to follow the example.

Though the States of Holland thought it very strange to be thus checked, they believed it was proper to show a regard to the King of England, though without complying with what he required. To this end, they answered the Ambassador, that they had provisionally ordered, that Vorstius should forbear the functions of his office till the next assembly upon this affair, and in the meantime remain at Leyden only as an inhabitant. Winwood took this answer for a denial, and complained in very haughty terms, of their little respect for the King his master. Not long after, the King published a declaration against Vorstius, wherein he used the States of Holland very roughly. Then the States, who were unwilling to quarrel with him, ordered

It is difficult to guess the true cause of the King's great zeal on this occasion. It seems, on the contrary, that he ought not, upon many accounts, to have interposed in a theological dispute, about which the States had not asked his advice, and which concerned a church, over which he could not challenge the least jurisdiction. Probably, as he pretended to be very learned in divinity, he imagined, that having declared for one of the opinions, he was bound in honour to support it. Secondly, looking upon himself still as a Protector of the States, he had a mind to exert his authority on this occasion, and oblige them to do as he required. Thirdly, he was willing to favour Prince Maurice, who had declared for the Gomarists, against the Arminians, who had pensioner Barnevelt at their head.

The King's fondness for his new favourite continually and swiftly increased. The favours the King loaded him with, seemed to exceed all bounds. He created him, the 25th of March, 1612, Baron of Branspeth, and Viscount Rochester. A month after, he made him Privy-Counsellor, and then Knight of the Garter.*

Carr behaved at first very wisely, as favourite. He was neither greedy nor insolent; he did every one what service he could, and especially the English, whose friendship he preferred before that of his countrymen. He had but one Scotch servant, and one friend of that nation, a cousin-german. This conduct rendered him agreeable to the English. The Prince of Wales alone affected sometimes to mortify him, because they were both enamoured of the Countess of Essex, who gave the preference to the favourite. This was sufficient to gain him the Prince's enmity, who, nevertheless, would not be revenged of him. He chose rather to turn into contempt, his love for the lady, who, as we shall see presently, was not worthy of such a lover. Except this amour, which proved his ruin, the favourite carried himself very prudently, being guided by the counsels of Sir Thomas Overbury, a man of parts and great wisdom, who took care to keep him clear of those rocks, on which favourites seldom fail to run.

But though the Viscount Rochester carefully avoided being troublesome, his modesty served only to inflame the King's desire to render him instantly rich and powerful. This, added to the many bounties he bestowed on his courtiers, both English and Scotch, and to the maintenance of three several courts, threw him perpetually into straits. His ministers were incessantly devising means to raise money without a Parliament, of which he would not hear the least mention.

The King, to his great misfortune, lost in May the next year 1613, the Earl of Salisbury, who was perfectly acquainted with the affairs of the state, and genius of the English. He was a check to the rest of the ministers, and hindered them from running upon precipices, the danger whereof they did not know so well as he. Moreover, he had a wonderful art of diverting the King himself from hurtful resolutions, though he did not always succeed. The Earl of Suffolk was made Lord Treasurer: but he was very different from the person he succeeded, both for parts and uprightness. Besides, he had a wife who was greedy of money, and made no scruple to take bribes with both hands.

About the middle of the year, Robert Chreighton, Lord Sanquir, a Scotch nobleman, was condemned to be hanged, for hiring two of his countrymen to murder a fencing-master.† Nothing could prevail with the King to pardon him, who thought this example necessary to curb the insolence of the Scots, who had already committed several outrages in England. His clemency to some had produced such ill effects, that he did not think proper to continue the same course, for fear, in the end, of a general quarrel between the two nations, which must have been to the disadvantage of the Scots.‡

Shortly after, arrived in England a very extraordinary embassy. Sir Robert Sherley, an Englishman, who had served the King of Persia many years in his army, desiring to see his native country, obtained of that monarch the character of his Ambassador, and a letter of credit to the King, with the offer of a free trade to the English throughout the Persian dominions. This Ambassador had passed through the Hague, where he demanded audience of the States, to propose to them a treaty with the King of Persia. But because he came from Spain, where he had made some stay, the States suspecting he had some other design, asked to see his instructions, and upon his scrupling to show them, he was desired to withdraw. As he had been also at other courts, it was believed, he had put the King of Persia in hopes of engaging all the Christian Princes in a war with the Turks, who were preparing to invade him. He had married a Persian wife, who was delivered of a son in England, to whom the Queen stood godmother, and Prince Henry godfather. After a year's stay in England, he returned into Persia.§

The arrival of this ambassador did not make so much noise as that of Frederic V. the Elector Palatine, who came in October to marry the Princess Elizabeth, the King's daughter. He was received with all the respect imaginable; and for some time nothing was seen at court but entertainments and diversions on his account. But amidst the universal joy for this marriage, the Prince of Wales was seized with a distemper, which at first was not thought dangerous. It began on the 10th of October, a few days before the Elector Palatine's arrival: but he himself believed it of so little consequence, that he accompanied the Elector every where for some days. He was not forced to keep his bed till the 25th of the same month, and died the 6th of November, at the age of eighteen years. He was a most accomplished Prince, sober, chaste, temperate, religious, full of honour and probity. He was never heard to swear, though the example of his father, and the whole court, was but too apt to corrupt him in that respect. He took great delight in the conversation of men of honour; and those who were not reckoned as such, were looked upon with a very ill eye at his court. He ordered Vorstius to remove from Leyden to Gouda, where he had another settlement provided for him.

* One day, it is said, the King having given him an order under his own hand, to receive 20,000*l.* at the Exchequer, the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, being surprised at the immenseness of the present, considering how little money there was then in the Treasury, successfully used a statagem, to demonstrate to the King, the excess of his bounty. He ordered the money, all in silver, to be laid on four tables in a room of his house, and inviting the King to an entertainment, caused him to pass through the room as by accident. The King failed not, as the Lord Treasurer foresaw, to ask, for what all that money was designed; to which Salisbury carelessly answered, It was for the Viscount Rochester, according to his Majesty's command. When the King understood his meaning, or had not considered the greatness of the present, he said, it was too much for one man, and bade the Treasurer give him but five thousand pounds.

† This young Lord, it seems, having a mind to disgrace one Turner, a fencing-master, in his own art, had one of his eyes thrust out by him. Some time after, the King of France asked him, "How he lost his eye?" And Sanquir telling him, "it was done with a sword," the King replied, "does the man live?" This question made such an impression upon the young Lord, that at his return to England, he caused Turner to be pistolled, at his house in White-Friars. He was tried in the court of King's Bench, June 27, and executed before Westminster-hall gate, the 29th.

‡ Ramsey switched Philip Herbert, the Earl of Pembroke's brother, over the face at a horse-race, which he not resenting, the King made him a Knight, a Baron, a Viscount, and an Earl, in one day. Mr. Edward Hawley of Gray's-Inn, coming to court one day, Maxwell led him out of the room by a black string he wore in his ear, a fashion then much in use. But this had like to have cost warm blood; not only Gray's-Inn society, but all the gentry in London, thought themselves concerned in the affront, and Hawley threatened to kill Maxwell wherever he met him, if he refused to fight, which so alarmed the King, that he sent for the benchers, and made up the quarrel. One Murray, a Scot, killed a serjeant that came to arrest him; which things, with Sanquir's pistolling Turner, and other insolencies, occasioned the following verses on the Scots:

They beg our lands, our goods, our lives;
They switch our nobles, and lie with their wives;
They pinch our gentry, and send for our benchers;
They stab our serjeants, and pistol our fencers.

§ He was second son to Sir Thomas Sherler of Sussex, and had been abroad fifteen years, five whereof he had spent in the service of divers Christian Princes, especially the Emperor Rodolphus, who made him a Count of the Empire. He afterwards travelled into Persia, and served that Emperor ten years, who made him General of the artillery, and gave him in marriage, the Lady Teresia, sister to one of the Queens of Persia. He left his young son in England.

had naturally a greatness of mind, noble and generous thoughts; and was as much displeased with trifles, as his father was fond of them. He frequently said, if ever he mounted the throne, his first care should be to try to reconcile the Puritans to the church of England. He was naturally gentle and affable: but however, in his carriage had a noble stateliness without affectation, which commanded esteem and respect. He showed a warlike genius, in his passionate fondness for all martial exercises. A French Ambassador coming to take his leave of him, found him tossing a pike, and asking him, "what service he would command him to his master?" the Prince bade him tell him, what he was doing. The King his father is said to have been jealous of him, and to have asked, one day, "If his son would bury him alive?" Some authors have even insinuated, though assuredly without foundation, that the King caused him to be poisoned. Others are contented with accusing the Viscount Rochester of this crime, but without any manner of proof. His head and body were ordered to be laid open, in the presence of many physicians and surgeons, who gave their opinion upon oath, that no marks of poison appeared. But what reflected most upon the King, was his commanding that no person should appear at court in mourning; whether he was willing to remove all melancholy objects from his sight, that might constantly renew his concern, or did not think proper to interrupt the diversions prepared for his daughter's marriage is uncertain. Decency obliged him, however, to defer the nuptials a few weeks, as the Prince's funeral could not be performed till the 7th of December.

Presently after, the King held a Chapter of the Order of the Garter at Windsor, wherein the Elector Palatine, and Prince Maurice, Stadtholder of Holland, were made Knights. They were installed in February following, both on the same day, the one at Windsor, the other at the Hague.

The beginning of the year 1613, was wholly spent in preparations for the Princess's wedding, which was solemnized the 14th of February. To this end the King demanded aid-money of his subjects, according to the ancient custom, observed when the Kings married their eldest daughter. Though it was now a hundred years since this custom had been used, there having been no occasion since the reign of Henry VII. few or none durst refuse to give what the King demanded. The Elector and the Princess staid in England till April, during which time there was nothing but entertainments, balls, masquerades, and other diversions. The City of London made the new married couple a splendid feast; after which, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen presented the bride with a chain of oriental pearl, worthy the greatness and richness of that metropolis.

By the departure of the Elector and Electress, the court became a little more quiet, as to public rejoicings, which had held several months without ceasing. But at the same time, a private scene was acting, the plots whereof began to open this year, but were not quite unravelled till two years after.

Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, was a mortal enemy to the late Earl of Essex, and one of the chief instruments of his ruin. The Earl left a son, who being but nine years old, did not give Cecil much uneasiness, though the King, at his coming to England, restored him to his estate and honours. Meanwhile, as this able minister could not be ignorant of the King's affection for the father, he was apprehensive, that, one time or other, he should be made to pay for all his artifices to ruin that Lord. It was chiefly upon that account, that, in order to preserve the King's favour, he judged it proper to unite closely with the Howard family, by his son's marriage with the Earl of Suffolk's eldest daughter. After which, perceiving the Earl of Essex to grow up, and fearing he might one day prove a thorn in his side, he believed it for his interest to be reconciled to him, and to confirm the reconciliation with the marriage of this young Lord to the Earl of Suffolk's second daughter, younger sister of his daughter-in-law. Besides his own advantage by this alliance, he gave the King the pleasure to see in strict union three families, for which he had the greatest affection; namely, those of Howard, Devereux, and Cecil. This marriage was accomplished in 1606, the Earl of Essex being then in his fifteenth, and Frances Howard his bride in her thirteenth year. As the married couple were yet very young, their relations thought fit the Earl should travel into France and Germany, till they were both a little more advanced in years. During his absence, his Countess became a perfect beauty, and eclipsed all the court ladies.

The Earl of Essex returned to England in the year 1610. He found his Countess in the prime of beauty: but withal, extremely proud of her own merit, by reason of the praises bestowed on her by all. He was himself charmed with her, but met not with that return he expected. She daily coined fresh excuses to delay the consummation of the marriage, and showed as much reluctance as he did eagerness. He bore it patiently for some time, being unwilling to use compulsion. Shortly after, he fell so dangerously ill of the small-pox, that his life was despaired of: but the strength of his constitution overcame his distemper, though it was long before he was quite recovered.

In this interval it was that Robert Carr became the King's favourite. When he gained his master's heart, he made a conquest almost at the same time of the Countess of Essex's, who suffered herself to be taken with the charms of this young Scot, and entirely gave herself over to this new passion, without daring however to reveal it to the person that caused it. Meanwhile, the Earl of Essex finding himself perfectly recovered, pressed his spouse to consent to the consummation of their marriage: but he found her reluctance the greater, as she was enamoured of another. In short, after trying all ways to prevail with her, without being able to succeed, he had recourse to the Earl of Suffolk his father-in-law, and entreated him to use his endeavours to vanquish his daughter's obstinacy. The Earl of Suffolk, surprised at what his son-in-law told him, sharply reprimanded his daughter, and positively told her, she must resolve to consummate the marriage. The Countess, not daring to disobey her father directly, desired only a little longer delay. She believed, in case she could avoid consummating her marriage with the Earl of Essex, it would not be impracticable to procure a divorce, and then marry the Viscount Rochester. Indeed, the Viscount knew nothing yet of her passion: but she had too good an opinion of her charms, not to hope an easy conquest, as soon as she should have occasion to discover it. On the other hand, the great credit of Rochester, and the Earls of Suffolk and Northampton, did not suffer her to question, that if the favourite undertook to marry her, he would easily accomplish it. But she wanted some time to lay her measures, wherein however she met with great opposition both from her husband and father.

In this extremity, not knowing how to proceed, she opened her mind to one Mrs. Turner, a physician's widow, a woman of a dissolute life, and capable of the basest actions. As this woman had no good advice to give her, she persuaded her to apply to one Dr. Foreman, who passed for a conjuror. He had perhaps some secrets of nature, but was not sorry to be thought skilled in the magic-art, because many women came to consult him, and paid him well for it.* To this man the Countess of Essex told her secret, and desired two things of him: First, to manage it so, that the Earl of Essex should be incapable to consummate his marriage. Secondly, to make the Viscount Rochester in love with her. Foreman very confidently promised both, and gave her certain powders for her husband to take, and to be put amongst his linen, with instructions how she should behave to him. As for Rochester, he himself undertook to perform upon him the necessary operations.

Meanwhile, the Countess could no longer disobey her father's command, so was forced at last to cohabit with her husband. But though they lay together, the marriage was not consummated. However this be, the Earl of Essex imagined, that his living in London and at court might contribute to his misfortune, and therefore resolved to carry his lady to Chartley in Staffordshire, a country-seat, about a hundred miles from London. The Countess could not be excused from going with her Lord: but all the while she was there, she shut herself up in a room, and would not so much as suffer the light of the sun to enter, giving herself over to an excessive melancholy, whether out of vexation or policy, the better to deny her husband. After this manner she lived some time with her husband in the country, who did not understand the meaning of this strange behaviour, In the meanwhile, she wrote several letters to Mrs. Turner and Foreman, telling them, "She was afraid Foreman's powders were not strong enough," &c. These letters were found in Foreman's study, and read in open court, upon an occasion to be mentioned presently.

At last, the Earl of Essex seeing himself in so uneasy a situation, resolved to carry his lady back to London, and give her full leave to live as she pleased. He began to perceive there was something extraordinary in her carriage, which he chose rather to be ignorant of than endeavour to discover.

The Countess being returned to court, and mistress of herself, no longer delayed to let Rochester know what she endured for his sake. There was no occasion to use magic to produce the desired effect. He was young, and she the finest lady in the kingdom. So, any advances from the Countess were more than sufficient to kindle a flame in the favourite's breast. As soon as they began to understand each other, assignations became frequent. They were at first very private: but in time, the two lovers used so little caution, that not a courtier was a stranger to their amours. The King probably was informed of it, since nothing delighted him more than to hear of the love-intrigues of his courtiers. The Earl of Essex, who had also notice of it, chose to shut his eyes, and scorn an object so unworthy of his love.

The Countess of Essex having succeeded in her intended conquest, and finding herself sure of her lover's heart, would not allow his passion time to cool. Every thing seemed to favour the execution of her designs, that is, her divorce from the Earl of Essex, and marriage with the Viscount Rochester. Essex saw her no more, and seemed to concern himself very little about her, and Rochester was so beloved by the King, that, in all appearance, nothing would be impracticable. So she let her lover know her desires, and without much difficulty brought him to second her projects. But as he was wont to impart his most serious affairs to Overbury, he believed he ought not to conceal this from him, and the more, as he expected from him some good advice to accomplish it. But so far was Overbury from approving such a project, that he used his utmost endeavours to dissuade him from it. He represented to him the injustice and indignity of the thing, his danger of being ruined by such an action; and lastly, the little value he ought to have for a woman, who, though married, scrupled not to throw herself into the arms of another man: that she had already lost her reputation in the world, and when she should be his wife, all the dishonour would reflect upon him. Rochester, who did not expect so great opposition from his friend, could not forbear showing some resentment. He had the address, however, not to give him room to think he would proceed notwithstanding his advice, and continued, as usual, to communicate to him his other affairs. The Countess was in a violent rage when she heard Overbury's advice, and from that moment ceased not to excite her lover to revenge. She was the more incensed against Overbury, as she feared, that being acquainted with the design, he would labour to render it abortive. In short, Rochester was so complaisant and blind, as to promise her to sacrifice his friend. It is pretended, that to strike the more surely, he consulted the Earl of Northampton, uncle to the Countess of Essex, and by his advice used this artifice to ruin him. He extolled to the King Overbury's abilities: but intimated withal, that he took too much upon him, and was grown intolerably insolent; and therefore he should be very glad to have him removed, by some honourable employment, praying his Majesty to send him Ambassador to Russia. The King liking the proposal, instantly appointed Overbury for the Embassy. Rochester having proceeded thus far, acquainted Overbury with the King's intention, and pretending he could not live without him, intreated him to refuse the employment, promising to procure him a better at court.

Overbury fell into the snare, and when the King sent for him to acquaint him with the employment designed for him, he most humbly besought his Majesty to make choice of some other person. As soon as he was retired, Rochester aggravated his pride and insolence, in daring thus to refuse his master's gracious offer, adding, it was requisite to chastise him: that he was himself affected by it, for he should be infallibly blamed for using his interest for him. In short, by Rochester's instances, the King commanded Overbury to be sent to the Tower. Some days before, the favourite had caused Sir Gervase Elways, his creature, to be made Lieutenant of the Tower. Overbury was closely confined, and not suffered to keep one of his servants, or receive any visits from his relations and friends, a rigor not used even towards the greatest offenders. He was now where the Viscount Rochester and the Countess of Esssex wished him, in order to dispatch him more easily. However, there were still some difficulties. It could not be done by stabbing, because the Lieutenant of the Tower would not have suffered it, and besides, a murder openly committed in one of the King's prisons, would have made too much noise in the world. It was resolved therefore to make use of poison. To that end Mrs. Turner provided a trusty person, one Weston, who had been a servant to her husband, and Sir Thomas Monson recommended this man to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to wait on the prisoner as footman. But even this was not sufficient. Whatever was brought to Overbury to eat being dressed in the Lieutenant's kitchen, it was almost necessary to engage him in the plot. Some say, the Earl of Northampton spoke to him of it, hinting that every thing was done with the King's privity. Others affirm, the Lieutenant refusing to be concerned in the crime, and not daring however, to discover it, by reason of the quality of the parties, took care to sieze the victuals sent from time to time by the Viscount Rochester to the prisoner, and throw them into the common sewer; and this is most likely, since, otherwise, Overbury would have been soon dispatched. He could not however hinder Weston from giving him a certain jelly sent by Sir Thomas Monson, which almost killed him. Whereupon the Lieutenant of the Tower was still more careful, that Overbury should be seen but by Weston alone. This was a check upon Weston, because he perceived none could be accused but himself: wherefore he durst not make such haste as Overbury's enemies desired. There arose however an inconvenience from this delay, which was that every one was surprised, to see the King use so great rigor upon a friend of the Viscount Rochester's for so slight an offence, if the refusing to go in embassy to Russia could be deemed any crime at all. It could not be conceived, and it was vainly endeavoured to discover the cause of the extreme severity with which Overbury was treated.

Whilst the unfortunate prisoner languished in his confinement, the Viscount Rochester and the Countess of Essex were thinking of executing their project, that is of annulling the Countess of Essex's marriage, that she might afterwards espouse the Viscount. To effect this, without Rochester's appearing to be concerned, the Earl of Northampton, who was in the two lovers' secrets, undertook to speak to the King. Some say the Viscount Rochester had already acquainted the King with the Countess's design to be divorced, and had prayed his Majesty to procure him the lady when the marriage should be dissolved. However, the Earl of Northampton presented to the King the Countess of Essex's petition, to this effect: that the Earl her husband being incapable of consummating their marriage, she besought his Majesty to let her complaint be examined, and if found well grounded, to have liberty to marry another. Upon this petition, the King commissioned the Archbishop, several other Bishops, and some laymen, to hear and determine the affair. This court proceeded very gravely to the trial of the cause, and entered into such particular and secret examinations, as did not very well become clergymen. The Earl of Essex being examined, briefly answered, he had never consummated his marriage, neither did he think he should ever be able to consummate it: but did not feel the same inability with regard to other women. Though this confession greatly favoured the Countess's cause, the court deemed it proper to be certain of the truth by another method, and ordered the Countess to be inspected by a jury of matrons assisted, by some midwife. This inspection being made, the matrons declared she was a virgin; but it is pretended, the Countess, under colour of saving her modesty, was permitted to appear in a veil before the matrons, and that a young gentlewoman of her age and stature, was introduced in her place. It suffices to say in a word, that, by the sentence, the marriage was dissolved, contrary to the opinion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who even publicly published his reasons against it. But the King himself took the pains to answer the Archbishop's arguments, and to maintain the justice of the sentence, upbraiding the prelate with founding his opinion on puritanical principles. Dr. Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, one of the judges, having spoken very strenuously to prove the nullity of the marriage, his son was soon after knighted. But the public was so malicious as to call him Sir Nullity Bilson. This affair made great noise, and brought little honour to the Judges, most of whom could not be ignorant of the Countess of Essex's ill character.

The sentence was hardly published, when the Viscount openly made his addresses to the lady, and their marriage was quickly concluded. The King not only gave his favourite leave to marry the Countess, but also made him Earl of Somerset on the 4th of November, that the second husband might be of equal rank with the first. The nuptials were solemnized a month after, with such extraordinary rejoicings, that had the King's own son been married, there could not have been greater. The City of London signalized itself on this occasion, by a splendid entertainment which the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen gave the new-married couple, and to which the King, Queen, and whole court, were invited. For some time nothing was talked of but banquets, balls, masquerades, and other diversions, in honour of the new Earl of Somerset's nuptials.

These things gave occasion to the disaffected to talk freely of the King. They reported, that in Scotland the Earl of Arran, formerly the King's favourite, married the Earl of Athol's daughter, having procured, by the like means, and on the same account, a dissolution of that lady's marriage with the Earl of March. It was thereby insinuated that the King had taught his favourite the way to attain his mistress. But these insinuations reached not the King's ear, those about him not being such bad courtiers as to carry him such reports.

Whilst the Countess of Essex's marriage was annulling, the unfortunate Overbury was closely confined, without having the comfort of seeing any of his friends, as though he had been guilty of the most heinous of crimes. He had been extremely sick with the poison that was given him, without knowing the cause of his illness. But when he heard what was transacting, he no longer doubted concerning the author of his misery. In this lamentable state, he saw no other remedy but to write to the favourite, intreating him to deliver him out of his wretched condition. Rochester answered, that, the King being still highly incensed, he had not been able to speak in his behalf, but hoped to do it within a few days. In short, the two lovers, being impatient to see a man live so long, who might one day be their ruin, caused an impoisoned clyster to be administered by one Franklin, an apothecary's apprentice, which ended his miseries with his life. Some say, that Weston and Franklin, seeing the extraordinary effect of the clyster, and fearing, if they suffered the poison to operate any longer, it would leave marks on the body, which would rise in judgment against them, smothered him with the bedclothes. When he was dead, he was speedily buried, without any ceremony; and a report spread, that, dying of a syphilitic affection, he was so rotten, he could not be kept any longer. This was the Earl of Northampton's account in his letter to the favourite, to acquaint him with Overbury's death, admiring withal, the justice of God upon such wicked instruments.

The Earl of Somerset thought it a great advantage to have dispatched Overbury. But on the other hand, he found himself much embarrassed in the management of affairs, since he was no longer assisted by that faithful Counsellor. As his small experience rendered every thing difficult, he was forced to chuse another friend; and it was the Earl of Northampton that supplied Overbury's place. But there was a great difference between these two counsellors. Overbury's sole view was to procure his friend honour and glory, and the Earl of Northampton's chief aim was to make use of his credit to countenance the Catholics. When he came to rule the favourite, he acted without any reserve. As he was Warden of the Cinque-Ports, the Jesuits and Romish priests could safely land there without being examined at their arrival. By this means their number so increased in a very short space, that the people loudly murmured at it, and cast the blame on the Earl of Northampton. Wherefore, to silence those who talked too freely, he took out a writ of Scandalum Magnatum against some of them. He believed it was not possible to convict him of a thing founded only upon common report, and that, such evidence not being valid in law, he should silence his enemies by the punishment of some of the most forward to speak against him. But the Archbishop of Canterbury broke his measures, by producing a letter under the Earl's own hand to Cardinal Bellarmine, wherein he said, "That however the situation of affairs of England, and the instances of the King compelled him to be a Protestant in show, his heart stood firm with the Catholics, and he would be ever ready to countenance them to the utmost of his power." Upon this letter the parties accused were discharged. The King even so reprimanded the Earl, that he retired to his country-house, where he died soon after.* He declared in his last will and testament, that he had always been a Catholic, and would die in that religion.

A. D. 1614.] In the spring of this year, some Presbyterian families resolved to go and settle in New England, to enjoy there that peace which they could not find at home. As it was not impossible, by the increase of Presbyterian families, the English plantations might become nurseries for non-conformists, the court gave orders not to let them depart. But afterwards, such as desired to remove being examined, some were allowed to pursue their voyage, and others were detained as sureties for those that went away.

The King's excessive liberality reducing him continually to straits, he had at last recourse to a project, formed by the late Earl of Salisbury; namely, to create knights, baronets, a sort of middle nobility, between barons, knights, and bachelors. Their number was not to exceed two hundred: but the King, at the first promotion, made only ninety. To purchase this honour, which was to be hereditary, every baronet was obliged to pay to the King a thousand pounds. But in order to give some colour to this new institution, every baronet was obliged by his patent, to maintain thirty foot soldiers in Ireland for three years, at eight-pence a day each soldier.* Afterwards it was hinted to them, that if they would compound with the King, and pay the whole sum at once, part should be abated, and the King would maintain his troops in Ireland himself. The King, it is said, received only about a hundred thousand pounds of the baronets, and the maintenance of the troops in Ireland cost him much more.

* He died on June 15, at the house he had built at Charing-Cross, called in his life-time, Northampton House, but leaving it to the Earl of Suffolk, it was for a time called Suffolk House, and now Northumberland House.

Besides this method, the King made use of others to fill his empty coffers, without being obliged to have recourse to the Parliament.

I. The King, by his letters patent, granted monopolies to private persons, exclusive of all others, and raised great sums by these sorts of favours.

II. He issued out commissions for reviving obsolete laws, for making men who could expend forty pounds a year, to compound for not being knighted. Formerly, an estate of forty pounds a year in land was considerable: and therefore the owners of such an estate were deemed proper to be made knights, and as such, to serve the King in his wars, or find soldiers. But in James I.'s time, such a revenue was inconsiderable: there were infinite numbers who had more, but, not desiring to be knights, chose rather to give the King money, than be obliged to receive an honour, which rendered them dependent.

III. The King made a certain number of Knights of Nova Scotia,† each of whom paid him such a sum.

IV. The dignities of Baron, Viscount, and Earl, had a fixed price set upon them. The King received for making a Baron ten thousand pounds, for a Viscount fifteen thousand, and twenty thousand for an Earl. Thus, whoever had money, might be made a Peer of the realm.

V. The same honours were rated likewise in Scotland and Ireland, though at lower prices.

VI. Those who had defective titles, were obliged to compound with the King for rectifying them, otherwise they were declared null and void.

VII. The Star-Chamber condemned, in excessive fines, to the King's use, such as were cited thither.

VIII. To all this, may be added the sums levied by the King upon his subjects, when the Prince his son was knighted, and his daughter married.

He would have had also a good means of raising money, if he had demanded of the United Provinces the sums that were due to him. But if we believe certain historians, he durst not claim his due, for fear of engaging in a war in case of refusal.

The King's revenue not answering his expences, recourse was to be had to a Parliament. The King was very loth to consent: but at length a Parliament was summoned to meet in April.

The very first day, the King demanded an aid of money for the marriage of his daughter, and told the Commons, after dispatching that affair, he would give them leave to examine the grievances of the nation. But the Commons thought proper to invert the method prescribed them, and begin with the grievances. Instead therefore of granting the money first, as the King expected, they examined to what uses the revenues of the crown had been put. The result was, that the King had bestowed on the Scots excessive grants both in land and money, and that the Scots, having sold these lands to the English, had conveyed the money into Scotland, to the great detriment of England. If what the King had given to the English had been as carefully examined, it would have been found ten times more, but herein was not seen the same inconvenience.

Then, the House inquired into the causes of the increase of Popish recusants; since it should rather seem, that the laws enacted after the gun-powder plot should have very much lessened their number. The first cause appeared to be the King's admitting into his council Popish Lords, publicly known for such. A second was, the negotiations abroad for the marriage of the late Prince Henry and Prince Charles with Popish Princesses.

After this, the Commons took into consideration the monopolies authorised and licensed by the King's letters patent, to the great prejudice of trade: and the extraordinary levies of money, without the consent of the Parliament. Upon all these grievances, it was resolved to represent them in a petition to his Majesty, and to pray him to redress them, and especially to hinder the future settlement of the Scots in England.

The carriage of the Commons was so different from that of the courtiers, who never spoke of the King but with admiration, that his Majesty had not patience to bear it. So, on the 7th of June, he dissolved the Parliament, after a session of about two months, wherein not one statute was enacted. The Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but the King committed to prison several members of the House of Commons, who had spoken the most freely, without admitting them to bail.

The Parliament not answering the King's expectation, and his exchequer being empty, there was a necessity of recurring to new expedients to fill it. To that end, certain persons diligently searched into history, to discover what had been done by former Kings in the like cases. Among all these methods, the court chose the way of benevolence, invented by Edward IV. abolished by Richard III. and once revived by the Parliament itself in the reign of Henry VIII.

The resolution being taken, not only to demand but extort a benevolence, all the sheriffs were ordered by the council, to ask of all private persons within their district a free gift, in proportion to the King's wants. At the same time, they were expressly commanded to return to the council the names of such as should refuse to contribute, or not give according to their abilities. This method however was not so successful as the King had expected. The more eager the sheriffs and court party were to excite the people's liberality, the more industrious were others to dissuade them from it, by setting before them the consequences. So, if we may believe the author of the Annals, the benevolence procured the King but 52,909*l.*

The money arising to the King from the benevolence, though no great sum, came very seasonably for the King of Denmark's reception, who made him a second visit, with a train of forty persons only. During the fortnight he stayed in England, entertainments and diversions never ceased. Shortly after, the King received with great pomp the Russian ambassador, sent by the Czar, to desire him to be mediator between him and the King of Sweden, on account of their differences.

Hitherto, the Earl of Somerset possessed the King's heart so entirely, that the Queen herself grew jealous. Some say, she inwardly grieved for the death of Prince Henry, and suspected him to be the author. Others say only, that his greatness had so blinded the favourite, that he was wanting in his respect to the Queen. However this be, she had conceived a very violent hatred of him, and to ruin him the more easily, she thought proper to gain Sir Ralph Winwood, who was still Secretary of State, but without exercising the office, at least in important affairs, because the Earl of Somerset had seized the management of every thing. Winwood readily joined with the Queen, to ruin this Lord, who left him only the title of Secretary. This was a preparative to the revolution which happened the next year.‡

‡ This year, Sir Hugh Middleton completed his project of supplying London with water by the New River, conveyed through various soils

In his winter progress, in the year 1615, the King passed through Cambridge, where the scholars entertained him with a comedy called Ignoramus, which ridiculed the common law. He was so delighted with this play, that he caused it to be acted twice in his presence, during his short stay at Cambridge. Then it was, that the King was struck with a new object, which made the same impression upon his mind as Robert Carr did the first time he saw him.* This was George Villiers, a young gentleman who appeared before him with all the advantages of a good mien, a fine shape, and a handsome and well made suit of clothes. Every one perceived he looked upon this young man with pleasure, and from that moment it was thought Villiers might supplant the Earl of Somerset.† Indeed with this view it was that certain Lords had brought him before the King. The King looked with admiration on George Villiers. He took care however to conceal it as much as possible, not to alarm the Earl of Somerset: nevertheless he resolved to have Villiers near his person. So he privately caused him to purchase a cup-bearer's place, and to be instructed how to behave.

What care soever the King might take to conceal his new inclination, the courtiers did not fail to discover it. Somerset, as most concerned, was harder to be deceived than the rest. His office of Lord Chamberlain giving him a great authority over the King's servants, he did not want opportunities to vex and mortify Villiers, who bore all with patience; and the King feigned not to perceive it. At last, an accident happened which suffered not the King to dissemble any longer. It was customary for the cup-bearer whose turn it was to be in waiting, to have the first place at the table where the cup bearers dined. Villiers having begun his month, sat at the upper end during the whole time of his service, without any opposition. But offering to sit in the same place after his month was expired, the person, whose turn it was to wait, rudely thrust him from thence, which greatly confounded him. Some days after, the same cup-bearer carrying a glass of wine to the King, let it fall accidentally or designedly on Villiers, who gave him a box on the ear. It is a law of a long standing at court, that whoever strikes another in the King's palace, is to lose his right hand, with many formalities. It is the Lord Chamberlain's business to see crimes of this nature punished; and the Earl of Somerset failed not to do all that lay in his power, to have the law executed to the utmost rigour. But the King granted Villiers a pardon, without enjoining any satisfaction to the party offended. This was the first public mark of his affection for Villiers.

Thenceforward, the Earl of Somerset's enemies laboured incessantly to ruin him in the King's favour. The truth is, that even before he had seen Villiers, the King began to be weary of Somerset, who was not so agreeable as when he was first taken into favour. Since his marriage with the Countess of Essex, he had grown very melancholy, of which probably Overbury's death was the cause, and become more careless of his person and dress. He had lost that vivacity which rendered him so agreeable to the King; and his temper, now gloomy and sullen, induced him harshly to oppose some wanton tricks which were now and then played in the King's anti-chamber, and wherein his Majesty took a singular delight.

The whole court perceived the alteration in the King since he had Villiers about him, and every one strove to thrust the old favourite down the precipice. The best way to that end, was to oblige the King to declare for Villiers: but there was a great obstacle to be removed. The King, by a very gross artifice, would have no favourite but of the Queen's recommending, that in case she complained of him afterwards, he might say, he had received him at her hands. The King fancied by such a device, to impose upon the Queen and the whole court. The business therefore was to prevail with the Queen, to recommend Villiers to the King. But she was already prejudiced against this young man, and, not seeing with the King's eyes, perceived nothing in him worthy of so great an advancement. Somerset's enemies, knowing how the Queen stood affected to Villiers, thought the Archbishop of Canterbury alone able to persuade her to what they desired. The Archbishop, who neither loved nor valued the Earl of Somerset, readily undertook to speak to the Queen: but his first attempt was in vain. The Queen, who was perfectly acquainted with the King's temper, told the prelate, that neither he, nor they who set him on, knew what they did; adding, "I know the King better than you all, for if this young man be once brought in, the first persons he will plague, must be you that labour for him; yea, I shall have my part also. The King will teach him to despise and hardly ill-treat us all, that he may seem to be beholden to none but himself."

Afterwards the Archbishop so pressed her, that at length she desired the King to receive Villiers as a favourite. The King sent immediately for Villiers, knighted him with the Prince of Wales's sword, and ordered him to be sworn gentleman of the bed chamber. As soon as he was out of the King's presence, he waited upon the Archbishop, and, acknowledging himself indebted to him for his good fortune, desired his instructions how to behave. The prelate told him, he had three lessons to give him: first, to pray without ceasing for the King's prosperity, and for grace to serve his master faithfully. Secondly, to labour continually to preserve a good union between the King, Queen, and Prince. Thirdly, to tell the King nothing but truth. The Queen's prediction, however, proved but too true with regard to the Archbishop, who was one of the first to whom Villiers became ungrateful.

The Earl of Somerset, perceiving he daily declined in favour, thought of securing himself from the danger to which he might be exposed by Overbury's murder. So, spying a favourable opportunity, he cast himself at the King's feet, and represented to him, that having served him some years in a very dangerous post, it was difficult not to fall into some miscarriages, and therefore besought him to grant him a general pardon, which might secure him from the malice of his enemies. The King readily complied with his request, and ordered as ample a pardon as possible to be drawn. This was accordingly done; but, whether through the ignorance or malice of the person who drew the instrument, the King was made to say in it, that, "he pardoned not only all manner of treasons, murders, felonies, and outrages whatever, already committed, but also those which should be hereafter committed by the Earl of Somerset." The King signed this pardon without any scruple, and perhaps without reading it. But the Lord Chancellor Egerton refused to put the seal to it, saying; soils for a course of 60 miles. This junction of two streams was begun in 1608. The projector encountered great difficulties in his undertaking, but his persevering spirit and ingenuity overcame them all. King James, who held some shares in the concern, conferred on Middleton, first the honour of knighthood, and afterwards the title of Baronet. He also incorporated the proprietors by the name of the New River company. Sir Hugh, who greatly injured his circumstances by this scheme, gave one share to the Goldsmiths' Company, for the benefit of poor members of their body. He died about 1636. The shares, originally of 100*l.* were, for many years, at a heavy discount; but, in process of time, they became so valuable, as to be sold for 18,000*l.* each. It is probable, however, that the number of new water companies, established within these few years, in the metropolis, will operate unfavourably on the overgrown wealth of the old company.

* Dugdale states, that it was not at Cambridge that the King first saw Villiers, but at Apethorpe in Northamptonshire.

† George Villiers was of a good and ancient family in Leicestershire, son of Sir George Villiers, of Brokesby, by a second wife, who bare him three sons, of whom this George was the second. After the death of Sir George, his widow married Sir Thomas Compton, brother of the Lord Compton. As George Villiers was but a younger son of a second bed, his fortune could be but small; nevertheless, his mother took great care of his education. After he had finished his studies, she sent him into France, where he made himself perfect master of the French tongue, with all the exercises proper for a gentleman, especially dancing, wherein he excelled. When he returned from his travels, his mother sent him to court to make himself known, and endeavour to procure himself friends and a place. He no sooner appeared there, but the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Bedford, and some other Lords, enemies to the favourite, and who sought his destruction, fancied this young man might be subservient to their design.

as there had never been an instance of such a pardon, he should incur a Præmunire if he passed it; and when he told the King the reason of his refusal, he easily satisfied him, he could not answer setting the seal to the pardon. Nothing was more easy than to draw another pardon, without the clause disliked by the Chancellor: but whether the Queen was against it, or Somerset did not care to discover too plainly the occasion he had for a pardon, or the King was now informed of the circumstances of Overbury's death, nothing more was said of it. At length, the fatal blow was given, at the court's return from the King's summer progress, to Royston.

Franklin, who administered the poisoned clyster to Overbury, made use, to compose it, of one Reeve, an apothecary's boy, who was afterwards sent into Flanders, or perhaps ran away from his master. This Reeve, being at Flushing, where some business had brought Sir William Trumbull, his Majesty's envoy at Brussels, got acquainted with some of his servants, and informed them of what he knew concerning Overbury's death. The servants telling their master what they had heard, he examined Reeve himself, and drawing from him what he desired, found means to detain him at his house. Then, he wrote to Winwood, desiring him to obtain the King's leave for him to come to England, because he had some things to reveal, which he could not trust to paper. Leave being granted, he acquainted Winwood with what he had learned, and Winwood told it the King, who commanded them both to keep it private till further orders. The King, however, being come to Royston, to begin his winter progress, expressed no displeasure against Somerset, but lived with him as he was wont. But some days after, he sent, in the night, a messenger to Lord Chief Justice Coke, with a letter, ordering him to make a warrant to apprehend the Earl of Somerset, at Royston, and his Countess at London, with Franklin, Weston, Mrs. Turner, and Sir Geryase Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower. The messenger was sent back to Royston, at four o'clock in the morning, with an officer of justice to execute the warrant. At his arrival, the officer found the King with his arms about Somerset's neck, who was just going to London, and affectionately saying to him, When shall I see thee again Somerset?* At that very instant the officer arrested the Earl by Sir Edward's warrant, who exclaimed, that such an affront was never offered to a Peer of the realm in the King's presence. The King, feigning ignorance, and asking what was the matter, said jestingly, "Nay, man, there is no remedy, for if Coke sends for me I must go." Then, accompanying him to the steps before the door, he desired him, as he was going down, to return speedily, saying, he could not live without him. As soon as Somerset was in his coach, the King said, in the hearing of some persons, who told it again afterwards, "Now the deel go with thee, I will never see thy face more." If this be true, it must be owned, it was a needless and very strange dissimulation: but King James took delight in things of this nature.

At his coming to London, the Earl of Somerset was sent to the Tower; his Countess, and the rest of the accomplices, having been arrested and committed, whilst he was on the road. The same day, Chief Justice Coke going to Royston, the King told him all he had heard from Trumbull, and enjoined him, with all possible scrutiny, to search into the affair, without partiality or respect of persons. He concluded with saying, "God's curse be upon you and yours, if you spare any of them: and God's curse be upon me and mine, if I pardon any one of them."

Coke, receiving such strict orders, was very active in the affair. Some even pretend, he was too active, and that finding in the Earl of Somerset's papers, indications of his being concerned in the death of Prince Henry, he had not the prudence to conceal them. However this be, most of the parties accused were tried in October and November, and, being found guilty, were condemned and executed.† Sir Thomas Monson, who was also arrested, appeared twice before the judges, and, at the second time, Coke received a note from the King, which obliged him to send back the prisoner to the Tower, with these words, "Take him away, we have other matters against him of a higher nature."‡

The trial of the Earl of Somerset and his Countess was deferred to May the next year, 1616; but not to be obliged to return to this affair, I shall relate here the circumstances of the trial. If we may believe Sir Anthony Weldon, author of a little book intituled, "The Court and Character of King James," which is properly but a satire, the King had assured the Earl of Somerset he should not be brought to a trial. For this reason, when George More, Lieutenant of the Tower, came and told him he must prepare for his trial on the morrow, he answered, that positively he would not appear, unless he was carried by force in his bed. The same author adds, the King, being informed of it, sent him word, he could not hinder his appearing before the judges, but would prevent the passing of any sentence upon him. By this artifice, says Weldon, the Earl was prevailed with to appear in court, where he pleaded in his defence from eight in the morning, till seven in the evening, when, contrary to his expectation, sentence of death was passed upon him, as guilty of Overbury's murder. The same author says, the King was terribly uneasy all that day, neither was he at rest till the news came of his condemnation. This author's aim, in relating these and many other circumstances, was to insinuate, that the King was afraid the Earl of Somerset, to save his life, would reveal some secrets he had a mind to conceal. But these secrets are not explained, and probably are only chimeras.

The Countess of Somerset, being brought before the court, pleaded only with a shower of tears, which raised some compassion in her judges, but however, hindered her not from being condemned to die as well as her Lord. The King granted them a reprieve, which was often renewed till the year 1621, when they had liberty to go and live at a country seat, without however being released from their sentence. At last, in 1621, about four months before the King's death, a pardon was granted them. After the Earl of Somerset was condemned, the King gave him four thousand pounds a year in land, which he took in his servants' names. This noble present, the pardon granted the Earl, notwithstanding the curse denounced by the King against himself and posterity, if ever he pardoned the guilty, his restlessness during the trial, the note sent to the Chief Justice whilst he was trying Sir Thomas Monson, have given occasion to King James's enemies to insinuate, he was conscious of some guilt, and they have been pleased to apply the whole to Prince Henry's death.

To finish what relates to the Earl and Countess of Somerset, we shall briefly add, that their love, which had engaged them to commit such abominable deeds, turned at last to hatred. They lived together many years in one house, as strangers to each other, and at

* The words at length, as related by Weldon, were, "For God's sake when shall I see thee again? On my soul, I shall neither eat nor sleep, until you come again." The Earl told him on Monday, (this being on the Friday,) "for God's sake, shall I, shall I?" Then lolled about his neck; then, "for God's sake, give thy lady this kiss for me:" in the same manner at the stairs head, and at the middle, and foot of the stairs.

† Weston was tried and condemned, October 19, 23. Mrs. Turner, November 9, Sir Gervase Elways, November 16. Franklin, November 27.——Weston was executed November 25. Ann Turner, November 14. Franklin, about the beginning of December, all at Tyburn. And Sir Gervase Elways on Tower hill, November 20.

‡ Simon Mason servant to Monson, who had been employed to carry a poisoned tart to Overbury, being likewise brought before the court, the judge said to him, Simon, "Thou hadst a hand in this poisoning business." "No, my good Lord, (answered Simon) I had but one finger in it, which cost me all my hair and nails." He had, it seems, out of liquorishness, as he was carrying the tart, tasted with his finger a little of the syrrup. This ingenuous answer caused him to be acquitted: for it was thought he would not have tasted the syrrup, had he known it to be poisoned.

last the Countess died of an uncommon disease. The Earl lived long enough * to see his daughter married to the Duke of Bedford, who had by her the Lord Russel, beheaded in the reign of Charles II.†

A. D. 1616.] The Earl of Somerset's affair ending the dispute between the two favourites, the court was restored to its former tranquillity, under the management of Villiers, who engrossed the King's affection without a rival.‡ The new favourite behaved in much the same manner as his predecessor. He suffered himself at first to be guided by such as he thought wiser and more experienced than himself: but in time he thought himself the most able person in the kingdom. His first care was to dismiss by degrees the Earl of Somerset's creatures, and confer the places on his own relations and friends. Nothing more material was transacted at court for some years, except the two usual affairs of this reign, wherein the promotion of the new favourite made no alteration—the advancement of the prerogative royal, and the methods of raising money without the Parliament.§

Prince Charles, the King's only son, was created, this year, Prince of Wales. The King thought of marrying him; but there was not a Protestant Princess of royal extraction in Europe, and his father could not resolve to marry him to any but a King's daughter. He chose rather, to seek him a wife in a house sworn enemy to the Protestant religion, than to marry him to one of his own religion, not royally descended. This infatuation is to be considered as the source of the rest of the occurrences of this reign, and of all the vexations James had to endure, as well from foreigners as his own subjects. He would have married his eldest son, Prince Henry, to Anne of Austria, who afterwards espoused Lewis XIII. King of France: but, having at last discovered that the court of Spain carried on the negotiation only to amuse him, he gave over his design. The French King's marriage being solemnized this year, 1616, James sent ambassadors to France and Spain to congratulate the two Kings. The Lord Hay, a Scotchman, was chosen for the French embassy,‖ and the Lord Ross for the Spanish. They had both orders to sound the two courts concerning the Prince of Wales's marriage, with the Princess, eldest sister of Lewis XIII. or with the Infanta Maria, daughter of Philip III. The Lord Hay quickly found, his negotiation would be fruitless, since the Princess of France was already promised to the Prince of Piedmont, son to the Duke of Savoy. Count Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador in England, a man of great abilities, so insinuated himself into the King's favour, that, for many years, he caused him to do almost whatever he pleased, by putting him in fear that the marriage would miscarry, if the Spanish court was not managed. We may judge of the policy of that court, by the length of this negotiation, which was made to last seven years. At first, the Spaniard intended only to hinder King James from concerning himself in the war of Cleves, and assisting the Protestant Princes. But afterwards, a more important affair made it his interest, more than ever, to amuse the King of England, and to keep him at bay.

James's conduct was very extraordinary. Under colour of being at peace with all the world, he meddled not with any foreign affairs. He beheld, without concern, France openly labouring the destruction of the Huguenots; and the house of Austria forming projects to enslave all Europe, and daily increasing in power, to the just dread of the rest of the States, and especially the Protestant. Moreover, he expressed a strong desire to be allied to that house, by a marriage which could not but be prejudicial to the established religion of England. Without any war upon his hands, he had consumed immense sums, and alienated almost all the crown lands, to enrich a dozen favourites, who had never done him any considerable service. The Earl of Somerset had, before his disgrace, amassed two hundred thousand pounds in money, plate, and jewels, besides nineteen thousand pounds a year in land, though he had been but five years in favour. The Earl of Salisbury, younger son to the Lord Burleigh, who had no estate but what he derived from the crown, had left his son as rich as any Peer in the kingdom. The Earl of Northampton, younger brother of the late Duke of Norfolk, had built a stately palace in London, since called Northumberland house, and left a vast inheritance to his nephew, the Earl of Arundel, though he had little or nothing from his family. The Earl of Suffolk, youngest son of the Duke of Norfolk, had built a country seat, which cost above two hundred thousand pounds, and he did not, as may be judged, expend his whole substance on this structure. The Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Dunbar, the Lord Hay, had remitted great sums into Scotland, and Sir Henry Rich, afterwards Earl of Holland, though a younger son, had found means to raise an immense estate. Amidst all these favourites so rich and powerful, the King was in extreme want, continually giving more than he could afford, and running into needless expences, without ever regulating his treasury. To all this was added a new favourite, who, being no less greedy than the rest, was also to be enriched, and had a numerous kindred, whom he did not mean to leave in want. Another effect of the King's great wisdom was, to quarrel with his Parliament, in support of a prerogative which he would have carried higher than any of his predecessors, and thereby put himself under a necessity of using means to

* He died in July 1645, and was buried in the parish church of St. Paul, Covent Garden.

† Arabella Stuart, first cousin to the King, died in the Tower the 27th of September 1615. The cause of her disgrace was, her privately espousing, without the King's consent, Sir William Seymour, grandson of the Earl of Hertford. Sir William Seymour, upon his marriage, was committed to the Tower, but Arabella was confined to her house at Highgate. After some time they appointed to meet at a certain place on the Thames, in order to fly beyond sea. He, leaving his man in his bed to act his part with his keeper, got out of the Tower in disguise, and came to the place appointed. She, dressed like a young gallant, followed him from her house, but happening to stay beyond the limited time, he went away, leaving word, if she came, he was gone before to Dunkirk. She, full of tears, and lagging in her flight, was apprehended and sent to the Tower. After her death Sir William got leave to come home, and married afterwards the Lady Frances, sister to the Earl of Essex.

‡ In the beginning of January, he was made master of the horse, and July 7, Knight of the Garter. The King bestowed upon him the best part of Somerset's estate.

§ Waller, the poet, used frequently to repeat the following story. When he was young, he had the curiosity to go to court; and he stood in the circle, and saw James dine; where, among other company, there sat at table two Bishops, Neile, and Andrews. The King proposed aloud this question, "Whether he might not take his subjects' money when he needed it, without all this formality of Parliament?" Neile replied, "God forbid you should not: for you are the breath of our nostrils." Andrews declined answering, and said he was not skilled in Parliamentary cases: but upon the King's urging him, and saying he would admit of no evasion, the Bishop replied pleasantly, "Why then I think your Majesty may lawfully take my brother Neile's money: for he offers it."

In one of James's Parliaments, a composition was made with the King, in lieu of wardships and purveyances; by which the subject was at length freed from those oppressive imposts. After much dispute, James agreed to give up these prerogatives, for 200,000*l.* a year. We learn from Winwood's Memorials, the reason assigned for this particular sum. "From thence my Lord Treasurer came to the price; and here he said, that the King would no more rise and fall like a merchant. That he would not have a flower of his crown (meaning the court of wards) so much tossed; that it was too dainty to be so handled: and then he said, he must deliver the very countenance and character of the King's mind out of his own hand-writing; which, before he read, he said he would acquaint us with a pleasant conceit of his Majesty. As concerning the number of nine-score thousand pounds, which was our number, he could not affect, because nine was the number of the poets, who were always beggars, though they served so many muses; and eleven was the number of the apostles, when the traitor, Judas, was away; and therefore might best be affected by his Majesty: but there was a mean number, which might accord us both; and that was ten: which, says my Lord Treasurer, is a sacred number; for so many were God's commandments, which tend to virtue and edification." If the Commons really voted twenty thousand pounds a year more, on account of this pleasant conceit of the King and the treasurer, it was certainly the best paid wit, for its goodness, that ever was in the world.

‖ This was one of the most magnificent embassies recorded in history. Among other things, the Lord Hay, at his public entry into Paris, had his horse shod with silver shoes slightly tacked on; and when he came over against houses or balconies, where persons, or beauties, of eminency were, his horse prancing in humble reverence, flung his shoes away, which the surrounding mob scrambled for; then one of his train, out of a velvet bag took others, and tacked them on; which lasted till he came to the next troop of grandees.

raise money, which could not but alienate from him the love of his people. Lastly, let us add his weakness, in suffering himself always to be so governed by his favourites, that he could not, or would not, see but with their eyes. At the time we are now speaking of, his cabinet council consisted solely of the new favourite, a young man without experience, through whose hands never any affair of moment had passed, and who, notwithstanding, thought himself the most able man in the kingdom. The Earl of Suffolk was more versed in affairs, though he was never counted a great genius: but he was now upon the decline of his favour, Villiers being far from supporting the Earl of Somerset's father-in-law. Bacon, Lord Keeper, was well versed in the laws of the land, and capable of giving good advice: but he made it his whole study to adapt himself to the King's humour, and make his court to the favourite. Meanwhile, the treaty of the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta, procured the King an unexpected supply of money. Queen Elizabeth had settled, with the States of the United Provinces, the arrears they owed her, amounting to eight millions of florins. This sum was due to James, as Elizabeth's successor. The States would have paid the debt long since, had they not found their account in remaining debtors to England, because they thereby engaged that kingdom to support them. But after the twelve years' truce was concluded, the face of affairs was altered. The States no longer wanted the King's protection; and besides, he held, in their provinces, places which gave him opportunity to treat them with haughtiness, as he had done in the affair of Vorstius. It was therefore time for them to recover these places, since they had not the same interest now to leave them in the King's hands, when their dread of Spain was much lessened by the truce. But the sum they were to pay was so considerable, that they waited a favourable opportunity to procure them some abatement. This opportunity offering not till the present year, they embraced it more eagerly as they were under an urgent necessity to withdraw their towns from the English. The King treating of his son's marriage with the Infanta, it was to be feared, the restitution of these towns, to which the Spaniard laid claim, would be one of the articles of the marriage treaty, especially as a clause in the treaty of 1604, between England and Spain, gave them just cause to fear. On the other hand, the present juncture was favourable to them, because the King's coffers were quite empty, and there was no likelihood of his venturing to call a Parliament, by reason of the people's discontent. All the difficulty therefore was to order it so, that the offer of restoring the towns should come from the King himself, because, in that case, the States might pretend inability to pay so large a sum, and that would naturally lead to a negotiation for an abatement of the debt. To bring the King to this point, they ceased for a time to pay the garrisons of the places in possession of the English; though, till then, they had punctually executed the treaty which obliged them to pay them. The garrisons complained, and the States, without, however, refusing payment, found several pretences to defer it. This delay constrained the English forces, who were without money, to apply to the King, who was not in condition to satisfy them. He complained to the States, who answered with great moderation, insisting upon the ill state of their affairs, by reason of their vast expence during the war. In a word, this affair did not end, and the English garrisons still remained without pay. At last, Caron, the Dutch envoy in England, intimated as of himself, to some one of the ministers, that he believed, if the King would offer to restore the towns in his possession, the States would do their utmost to discharge the whole debt, by borrowing money at a high interest. This intimation produced the desired effect. The King, having no money, and seeing a near prospect of drawing from the States a large sum, which the courtiers had already devoured in their thoughts, readily determined to surrender the cautionary towns. Pursuant to this resolution, he wrote to the States, "That he knew them to be his good friends and confederates, both in point of religion and policy, therefore he apprehended not the least fear of difference between them: in contemplation whereof, if they would have their towns again, he would willingly surrender them." Upon this letter they sent Pensionary Barneveldt to the King, who so artfully managed this affair, that they were discharged for two millions seven hundred and twenty-eight thousand florins, in lieu of eight millions, which they had promised to pay to Elizabeth, besides eighteen years' interest. By this agreement, the cautionary towns were delivered to the States, the 14th of June 1616.

They who were not pleased with the court, greatly censured this treaty, which robbed the crown of England of the advantage of holding the United Provinces in a sort of subjection. But it was much worse, when it was seen in a very short space, that the money paid by the States was vanished, without a possibility to guess what was become of it. The King had paid none of his debts: the navy was suffered to decay, for want of money to repair it; and nothing had been sent to his army in Ireland, which had not received one penny for several years, and whose wants had served for pretence to treat with the States.

At length it was discovered, that the Lord Treasurer, Suffolk, had converted to his own use, good part of the money received for the cautionary towns. The favourite missed not this opportunity to ruin a man whom he could not consider as his friend, since he was father-in-law to the Earl of Somerset. The Lord Treasurer was therefore accused in the Star Chamber, of sundry misdemeanors in the exercise of his office, and especially of having kept for himself great part of the money received of the Hollanders. Sir Edward Coke, who was his accuser, aggravated his misdemeanors, his extortions, his mismanagement of the King's treasures, his boldness to apply them to his own use, the corruptions of his Countess, the artifices of his deputy, Bingley, to ensnare such as had business with his master. After that, he cited many precedents of treasurers, who in former reigns had been punished for slighter crimes than those of the Earl of Suffolk, and showed the dangerous consequences resulting from the ill administration of the treasurership, when it was not managed by uncorrupt persons. If the Lord Treasurer had cast himself upon the King's mercy, he would have been easily acquitted. But he strove to justify himself, and not doing it to the satisfaction of his judges, he was fined thirty thousand pounds, and condemned to imprisonment during the King's pleasure, and Bingley was fined two thousand pounds. Till the King should make choice of a treasurer, that office was executed by commissioners, the first of whom was Sir Henry Montague the favourite's creature.*

A. D. 1617.] Ever since his coming to England, the King kept the Puritans so low, that it was not in their power to give him any disturbance. But the church of Scotland was still Presbyterian. Indeed, Episcopacy was not entirely suppressed in that kingdom; but it was in such a state, that the Bishops had no manner of jurisdiction. The several Presbyteries, and the general assembly of the clergy, had engrossed the whole ecclesiastical authority, and left the Bishops only an empty name without power. There were also many other points wherein the Scotish church differed from the English, so that Puritanism triumphed in Scotland, at the time it was looked upon in England as a sort of rebellion. James had therefore resolved to put the church of Scotland upon the same footing with that of

* The Earl of Suffolk was not the only sacrifice to Villiers's policy, who by degrees removed Somerset's creatures. Sir John Bennet, judge of the prerogative court, was turned out, and fined twenty thousand pounds. Sir Henry Yelverton the King's attorney also lost his place, as well as several others whom it is needless to mention. Secretary Winwood dying about this time, Sir Robert Naunton a Protestant, and Sir George Calvert a Papist, were made secretaries. On the 27th of August the King created Sir George Villiers, Baron of Whaddon and Viscount Villiers; and on the 1st of January following, he was made Earl of Buckingham.

England; but perceiving, that to compel the Scots all at once to a perfect conformity with the English church, would be too difficult an undertaking, he meant to lead them to it by degrees. Pursuant to this project, he had now sent to the general assembly of the Kirk, certain articles, which he desired might be inserted in the canons of the church. These articles were:

I. For the future, the holy communion should be received kneeling.

II. The eucharist should not be denied to the sick, with three or four persons to communicate with them.

III. Christmas, Easter, Ascension-Day, and Whit-Sunday, should be kept as holy-days, and the preachers should make choice of texts suitable to the occasion.

IV. Confirmation should be practised after this manner: when the children were eight years old, the ministers should catechise them, and then the Bishops in their visitations should bless them with prayer for God's grace, and the gifts of the holy ghost.*

The King did not desire that confirmation should be received in Scotland, as practised in the church of England, because he was not fully convinced of its usefulness. But as the business concerned one of the episcopal functions, he would that the Bishops should have something at least to do in it.

The King's design being to compass his ends by degrees, he had selected these articles as least liable to give offence to the ministers, in order to leave them without excuse in case they rejected them. The general assembly of the Scotish church, perceiving the King's aim, declared, if the churches of England and Scotland differed only in these four articles, they might be received for peace' sake; but as they were innovations incapable of producing a perfect union, there was no necessity of inserting them among the canons. The King, offended with this refusal, resolved to compel the Scots, not only to receive these articles, but also many more which he had not thought fit to meddle with at first, being persuaded he had a right, by virtue of his royal authority, to impose upon his people of Scotland, the religion which to him seemed the best. To this purpose, he resolved to go in person to Scotland, under colour of visiting his native country, where he had not been these fourteen years.

Before his departure, he ordered a proclamation to be published in Scotland, wherein he said, he was going to visit his old kingdom, "Not to alter the civil and ecclesiastical state, but to reform certain abuses in the church and commonwealth." At the same time, he sent beforehand some officers of his household, all English, with orders to adorn his chapel at Edinburgh in the same manner as that at Whitehall; and these men forgot not to carry with them some pictures, and even statues, of the apostles. As soon as they began to adorn the chapel, the people of Edinburgh exclaimed at the sight, saying, "Images were begun to be introduced, and the mass would quickly follow."

The King, being come to Berwick, prorogued the Parliament of Scotland, to open it himself, as he did indeed, with a long speech, according to custom. He contented himself, at first, with requiring, that a certain number of commissioners should be appointed to examine and settle the affairs of religion. The Parliament consenting to his demand, the King staid not for the Parliament's nominating the commissioners, but chose them himself, and appointed the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, and the Clerk of the Rolls, who were all three his creatures. But as the Parliament scrupled to stand to this nomination, he fell into a violent passion, thinking it very strange they should pretend to name others, after he had made known his pleasure. In short, as they durst not resist him to his face, he obtained whatever he pleased.

These commissioners immediately settled an article, after which there was nothing more to be examined. The article was, "That whatsoever his Majesty should determine in the external government of the church, with the advice of the Archbishops, Bishops, and a competent number of ministers, should have the strength of a law." The King himself had dictated the article. "Not (said he) that I am against the advice of the grave and learned ministers, but to be over-ruled, as in your former general assemblies, I will never agree; the Bishops must rule the ministers, and the King govern both in matters not repugnant to God's law."

Meanwhile, the ministers in and about Edinburgh, perceiving that, by the prevarication of the commissioners, their church was going to be overthrown, since the King was impowered to make what alterations he pleased, met together to consult how to prevent it. They found no other remedy than a protestation against the article passed by the commissioners, and when they had drawn it, they committed it to one Hewet, to present it to the King. Hewet being come into his Majesty's anti-chamber, in order to execute his commission, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's civilly accosted him, desiring to see the Protestation; which the minister readily showed him. As soon as he had it in his hands, he would have put it in his pocket, but Hewet seized the paper, which could not be done without making some noise. Upon which, the King, coming out and hearing the occasion of the bustle, spoke so roughly to the minister, that the poor man, all in a fright, fell on his knees and begged pardon, protesting never more to meddle in the affair.

But though the King had obtained what he wanted of the commisioners, he found he should never attain his ends without the consent of the ministers, especially as their protestation was public, and many copies, which continually increased, were already dispersed. He therefore addressed the Bishops, and ordered them to summon the ministers to meet on the 10th of July, at St. Andrew's, where he would come and speak to them in person. The ministers obeying the summons, the King called them all to witness his great care of the church of Scotland, as well before as since his accession to the crown, adding, he expected however no thanks for his zeal for the true worship of God, and for maintaining good order in the church. Then he told them, that before he departed for Scotland, he had sent them four articles to be inserted in their canons, which were rejected, and yet he was silent; that having lately desired it might be declared, that by virtue of his prerogative, he had power to make ecclesiatical laws, they mutinied and protested against him: however, he was very willing to pass by all these, with many other, affronts, received at their hands. "But now," continued he, "the errand for which I have called you, is to know your reasons, why this same power ought not to be admitted. I mean not to do any thing against reason; and, on the other part, my demands being just and religious, you must not think that I will be refused, or resisted." He spoke these last words knitting his brows, and looking at them, says the author of the Annals, with a majestical and stern eye, which made them all fall down on their knees. Then, continuing his speech, he said, "It is a power innate, and a special prerogative, which we that are Christian Kings have, to order and dispose of external things in the policy of the church, as we by advice of our Bishops shall find most fitting. And, Sirs, for your approving or disapproving, deceive not yourselves, I will never regard it, unless you bring me a reason which I cannot answer."

The ministers, seeing how peremptory the King was, desired leave to confer among themselves. Their request being granted, they returned in a few hours, with a petition for a General Assembly, that what his Majesty proposed might be received with common consent. "Aye," says the King, "but what assurance have I of their consenting?" Whereupon some of them said, they saw no reason to the contrary. "But," says the King, "if the General Assembly be of another mind, and your reason now be none of theirs then, and the articles are rejected, my difficulty will be the greater; for when I shall hereafter use my own authority in establishing them, I shall be pulpited a tyrant and persecutor; Ye were wont to do so." Then all cried out, that none durst be so mad. "Yet experience tells (says the King) that it hath been so; therefore, unless I be made sure, I will not give way to an assembly."

It was, however, easy to perceive, that without an assembly, the King could not possibly compass his ends. So, he agreed at length, that a General Assembly should be held at St. Andrew's in November. In this interval, Symson, the minister who drew up and signed the protestation, was committed to Edinburgh castle, and Catherwood, who carried letters to other ministers to encourage them to adhere to it, was banished. After this, the King returned to England.

The General Assembly, held at St. Andrew's in November, resolved to defer the reception of the four articles, till all the churches of the kingdom were informed of this affair; and then separated. The King was extremely incensed, and, looking upon this delay as a contempt of his authority, ordered the payment of the ministers' stipends to be stopped for a year. But finding this only exasperated the people, and retarded his design, he gave leave at length that another General Assembly should be held at Perth, on August the 25th the next year. And there, by fair or foul means, he obtained the church's consent to the four articles. But withal, he sowed in Scotland the seeds of those troubles, which distracted the kingdom in the following reign, and deprived the King, his son and successor, both of crown and life.

Before he left Scotland, the King made the Earl of Buckingham Privy-Counsellor of that kingdom, as he had been so some time in England.

Whilst the King was returning to London, he received a petition from some servants, labourers, mechanics, and other vulgar persons, complaining, that they were debarred from dancing, playing, church-ales, in a word, from all recreations on Sundays after Divine Service. Whereupon it was suggested to the King, that the Puritans meant to persuade the people, such diversions were contrary to the regard due to the Lord's-day: that these men went upon erroneous principles, namely, that Christians were obliged to keep the day of rest with the same strictness as the Jews, and therefore affected to call Sunday the Sabbath. This was a sufficient inducement to the King to condemn this puritanical scruple, and the rather, as he was not himself very scrupulous in this point. A book therefore was published in his name, wherein he maintained, by several arguments, that pastimes on Sundays, after evening service, were allowable, and withal, commanded that none should be hindered or discouraged from any lawful recreations. This book* made a great noise, neither was it exclaimed against by the Presbyterians alone. Many churchmen disapproved of it, and particularly the Lord Mayor of London, who, notwithstanding the prohibition, commanded the King's own carriages to be stopped, as they were passing through the City on a Sunday. But the King himself, regardless of these murmurs, and willing to support what he had done, enjoined all ministers to read his book publicly in their churches; and those that refused were severely punished by the high-commission.†

We shall close the events of the year 1617, with the sad catastrophe of Sir Walter Raleigh. He had been a prisoner twelve years,‡ ever since his condemnation, during which time, he had employed himself in writing his History of the World. At last, he obtained his liberty, though without the King's pardon.§ As his estate was all forfeited, and given to the Earl of Somerset, he was much embarrassed when he came out of prison. The court, where he was entirely unknown, was like a strange country to him. For this reason, he formed the project of seeking his fortune in distant climates. He had formerly traversed the seas of America, and knew all the coasts, particularly that of Guiana. He found means to acquaint the King, that he knew of a very rich mine in America, whence he hoped to bring mountains of gold, if his Majesty would be pleased to grant him a private commission. The mine lying in a country belonging to the Spaniards, it could not be seized without breaking the peace with Spain. The King, tempted no doubt with the golden hopes inspired by Raleigh, granted him a commission, directed to Our beloved and faithful Walter Raleigh, Knight, &c.‖ It was said afterwards, the King granted the commission with this limitation, that he should not injure the subjects of Spain.

However, Raleigh, by virtue of his commission, engaged several persons in this project. He was supplied with money to fit out twelve sail, and departed in August 1617, in the search of the mine. At his arrival upon the coast of Guiana, he found not the marks he had left there, neither could he know again the place he thought to have so well observed. He detached however his son, and Captain Keymis, with five ships, to sail up the river Oroonoko as high as possible, in order to discover the mountain where the supposed mine lay. The mountain not appearing, the English landed, and putting the Spaniards to flight who opposed their descent, pursued them to the town of St. Thomas, which they took and plundered. Sir Walter Raleigh's son was killed in the assault. Then, leaving a garrison in the place, they advanced farther into the country, without being able to find the so-much-desired mine. At last, weary with searching, they returned to Sir Walter Raleigh, who, finding himself disappointed of his hopes, threatened Keymis with the King's indignation, and, some days after, Keymis was found dead in his cabin.¶ The sailors, vexed at this ill success, loudly complained of their being drawn into a chimerical project, and compelled Sir Walter to sail back for England. When they arrived at Kinsale in Ireland, he would have persuaded them to go with him into France; but, instead of listening to his proposal, they carried him against his will to Plymouth, where he was arrested by the King's orders, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

During his absence, Count Gondemar, the Spanish Ambassador, making great complaints about Sir Walter's commission, which was become public, the King found no better way to appease him, than by disowning

* It was called the Book of Sports. No recusant was to have the benefit of this liberty.

† The favourite's eldest brother was made Viscount Purbeck this year; his younger brother, Earl of Anglesey; his mother, though a papist, was created Countess of Buckingham, without her husband's enjoying the same honour. All his female relations were married into the richest and most noble families of the kingdom. The favourite's mother being a papist, and ruling her son with the same ease as he himself governed the King, it was not very strange, the papists conceived great hopes, and swarmed in the kingdom. The King gave himself little trouble about it. Provided a man took the oath of allegiance, and was not a puritan, every thing else was indifferent to him. He was almost wholly employed in his diversions, and as he very frequently hunted, his admirers pretended he took those times to consider of the affairs of the government.

‡ Prince Henry used to say, that no other King but his father would keep such a bird as Sir Walter Raleigh in a cage, i. e. the Tower.

§ He was released in 1516. Some say, that after the publication of his history, he petitioned the King, whose love to learning induced him at last to grant Sir Walter his liberty.

‖ There is in Rhymer's Fœdera, a commission for him, directed only to Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, without any other addition of beloved, or faithful. In that commission he hath "authority and licence to go into the South parts of America, or elsewhere, within America, possessed and inhabited by heathen and savage people, to the end to discover and finde out some commodities and merchandizes in those countries that be necessary and profitable for the subjects of theis kingdomes and dominions, whereof the inhabitants there make little or no use or estimation; whereupon alsoe may ensue some propagation of the Christian faithe, and reformed religion, &c." But not a word of the Spaniards. In this commission, Sir Walter is said to stand in the perill of the lawe.

¶ He first shot himself; but, that not doing his business, he thrust a knife into his body, up to the haft, and expired.

 Sir Walter gave King James a plan of his design, together with the number of his men, burden of his ships, the country and river he was to enter, &c. which the King promised to keep secret, but it was sent by Gondemar to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before Raleigh went out of the Thames; and that very original paper was found in the Spanish Governor's closet at St. Thomas's.

it, or at least by assuring, that Raleigh had express orders not to act against the Spaniards.* Raleigh returning without gold, his cause was so much the worse. Besides, the Ambassador openly insisted upon his being punished, and told the King, there was no other way to continue the treaty of the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta. Wherefore the King determined at length to sacrifice Raleigh to the Spaniard. But as he could not be tried upon his late expedition, for which he had a commission in form, it was resolved he should lose his head, by virtue of the sentence passed upon him fourteen years before. In vain did he plead that his commission, wherein the King styled him faithful servant, and gave him power of life and death over those who were under his command, was equivalent to a pardon. The Judges told him, "That treason could not be pardoned but by express words." So, without being called to an account for his late expedition, it was ordered that the former sentence should be executed.†

Thus died Sir Walter Raleigh, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. He was a man that deserved a better fortune, and had a large share of merit. He had also some faults, which are lessened or aggravated, in order to render his execution more or less odious, according as the historians are for or against King James. Certain it is, he fell a sacrifice to the mortal hatred conceived by the Spaniards against him in Queen Elizabeth's time, and to the King's unhappy desire to accomplish the Prince his son's marriage with the Infanta of Spain.‡

A. D. 1618.] The negotiation with Spain for the marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta was still prolonged; and James continued to be amused with the expectation of a large dowry with that Princess. Hitherto the Spaniard had only the succession of Cleves in view. But this year the affairs of Germany and Bohemia began to give occasion to fear, a religious war would be kindled in those countries. This was a fresh reason for the Spaniard's amusing King James, lest he should side with the Protestants, and send them a powerful aid.§

In the beginning of the year 1619, the Earl of Northumberland, who had been in the Tower ever since the gun-powder plot, obtained his liberty, by means of the Lord Hay, his son-in-law, lately made Viscount Doncaster.‖

In March this year, the King lost his Queen, in the forty-sixth year of her age. Shortly after, he was himself seized with a great illness, which brought him to the brink of the grave.

The Emperor Matthias dying the 20th of March 1619, Ferdinand, his cousin and adopted son, was proclaimed King of Bohemia, as well in consequence of his election, as in virtue of his pretended hereditary right to that crown. Meanwhile, as the chief aim was to obtain the Imperial dignity, and as he stood in need for that purpose of the Protestant electors, he feigned a willingness to end amicably the war now begun in Bohemia, by giving the States a reasonable satisfaction with respect to their privileges. But the States thought

* So it is said in the warrant for apprehending Sir Walter, "We did," says the King, "by express limitation and caution, restrayne and forbid them, from attemptinge any act of hostility, wronge, or violence whatsoever upon the territories, states, or subjects of any forrayne Princes with whome we are in amity, and more particularly of those of our deare brother the Kinge of Spayne, in respect of his domynions and interestes in that continent, &c."

† He was not beheaded till October 29, 1618. It was done in the old Palace-yard at Westminster.

‡ Notwithstanding what has been stated it is the opinion of many, founded upon very plausible reasons, that Sir Walter Raleigh's mine never existed, but in his own fabricated report to the King; that his expedition was altogether of a marauding nature; that his fellow adventurers were seduced into the plan, by his specious representations; that his object was, to retrieve his own desperate fortunes by the plunder of the Spaniards; and that, by the wealth which he should thus be enabled to amass, he might secure his pardon at home, or a safe and affluent retreat in some foreign country. Sir Walter Raleigh unquestionably knew; that the situation of his pretended mine was in the territory of the Spaniards; it is exceedingly improbable that James would have sanctioned any attempt on the property of that people; and it is certain that Sir Walter Raleigh did not voluntarily return to England. He died with great firmness. When he felt the edge of the axe by which he was to be beheaded; "it is a sharp remedy," said he, "but a sure one for all ills." His harangue to the people, from the scaffold, was calm and eloquent. No measure of James's reign was attended with more public dissatisfaction, than the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh.

§ In Bohemia were two religions established by law; the one was called sub unâ, and the other sub utràque. The former was professed by the Catholics, who communicated in one kind only, the latter by the Hussites, who received the Eucharist in both kinds, and, since the Reformation, were become true Protestants. The Emperor Sigismund was forced, in order to be owned for King of Bohemia, to grant the Hussites an edict, whereby, among other privileges, it was decreed there should be no magistrate or inhabitant in Prague but what was of their religion. This edict, granted in the year 1435, was observed till 1570, when, by order of Maximilian II. a Catholic was made citizen of Prague. Another of the same religion obtained the same favour in 1599, and withal, a place in the magistracy. From that time, Sigismund's edict was frequently violated, and at last the Jesuits were admitted into Prague, and built there a stately college. Thus, by degrees, the number of the Catholics was considerably augmented in the city, by means of the governor's and the Emperor's other officers who were all of the same religion. The more they increased, the higher they carried their pretensions, and at last the edict of Sigismund was continually transgressed. However, in the reign of Rodolphus II. the Protestants, by the intercession of Prince Matthias, obtained of the Emperor a second edict, which, under colour of confirming their privileges, put them upon a sort of equality with the Catholics, though they had enjoyed the superiority for one hundred and fifty years. This equality was as much as they could expect, considering the present juncture. But, though it was far short of their ancient privileges, the Emperor's officers in Bohemia, thinking such an edict prejudicial to the Catholic religion, refused to publish it, affirming, it was extorted from the Emperor whilst at war with the Turk.

Rodolphus II. dying in 1612, his brother Matthias succeeded him both in the kingdom of Bohemia, and the imperial dignity. Under this new King the privileges of the Protestants were violated much more openly, and with greater haughtiness than under the last. But this was not all: Matthias having adopted his cousin, Ferdinand of Austria, had a mind also to secure him the crown of Bohemia. The execution of this project would doubtless have been very difficult, had not the Emperor used artifice. Silesia, Moravia, Upper and Lower Lusatia, being annexed to Bohemia, had a right to send deputies to the assembly of the states of that kingdom. But as these countries were Protestant, their deputies very probably would join with those of Bohemia, of the same religion, and frustrate the Emperor's design. Wherefore he convened the States of Bohemia, without summoning the others. The Protestants complained of this innovation, and not to authorise it, refused, for the most part, to send deputies to the States. This was what the Emperor foresaw and wished: for the Catholic deputies being the majority, Ferdinand was declared Matthias's presumptive successor, and shortly after crowned at Prague, after which he resided at Gratz. The defenders, for so were called a certain number of eminent persons, chosen and appointed by the States to see the edicts put in execution, perceiving the designs of the Imperial court, summoned the States pursuant to their power, and forgot not to call the incorporated provinces. This assembly only drew a petition to be presented to the Emperor, wherein the States demanded the execution of the laws of the kingdom, and a just reparation of the injuries done them. Meanwhile, as they could come to no resolution before the Emperor's answer was received, they adjourned to the Monday after Rogation-week, in the year 1618.

The Emperor, instead of being inclined to send a favourable answer to the States' petition, ordered his Lieutenant in Bohemia to hinder the next assembly, called without his license. But the Lieutenant was not quite strong enough to execute the order. His opposition serving only to exasperate the States who were assembled on the day appointed in the college of Charles IV. they went in a body to the chancery, and seizing the Emperor's officers, pitched upon three, and threw them out of the castle-window. After that, they drove the Jesuits out of Prague.

Things being come to these extremities, the States published an apology to acquaint the public why they had punished these officers. But as they believed the Emperor would not hear their reasons, they signed a confederacy, promising mutual aid against all opposers. In the meantime, hearing the Emperor was making preparations to attack them, they chose four and twenty protectors, empowering them to raise forces, and lay upon the kingdom and the incorporated countries what taxes they should judge necessary. Thus, a war being unavoidable, every one took such measures as he deemed requisite, whether to attack or defend.

At the time, the Bohemian States were taking these resolutions, the Cardinal Infant was preparing an army in the Low-Countries to assist the Emperor. Whilst this army was levying, he sent Charles de Bucquoy, Count de Lonqueval, to the Emperor, who made him General of the army designed against Bohemia. The States chose for their Generals, Count Ernest of Mansfeldt, and Count de la Tour. This war was of so great moment to the house of Austria, that it is not very strange the Spaniard should still continue to amuse King James with the hopes of seeing the projected marriage speedily concluded.

‖ James Lord Hay it seems had married Lucy, the Duke's youngest daughter, without his consent, and he was so much displeased with the match, that he could hardly be brought to accept of his liberty from the hands of his son-in-law. The fine of 30,000*l.* which he had been condemned to, was compounded at 11,000*l.* His daughter was the same lady, who under the title of Countess of Carlisle, made the most shining figure in the court of Charles I. as a beauty, wit, and politician. The old Duke, when he came out of the Tower, hearing that Buckingham was drawn about with six horses in his coach, (being the first that was so) put on eight to his, and in that manner was drawn through the city, in his way to the Bath.

not fit to trust to his promises. In the mean time, he endeavoured to gain the Electors, and make alliances with the Catholic Princes of Germany. James, who gloried in being styled the pacific King, thought himself obliged, as such, to try to appease, by his mediation, the troubles of Bohemia. To this end, he chose the Viscount Doncaster to go and endeavour to procure a peace between Ferdinand and the Bohemian states. The embassy, however, proved entirely fruitless, and served only to show the little account Ferdinand made of the King of England's mediation.

The time appointed for the election of an Emperor approaching, the Elector of Mentz summoned the rest of the Electors, and particularly Ferdinand as King of Bohemia. The States of that kingdom protested against the summons, saying, Ferdinand could not be received as elector in quality of the King of Bohemia, since he was not in possession of the kingdom. But their opposition was ineffectual. Ferdinand was not only acknowledged for the King of Bohemia and elector, but was also chosen Emperor, the 18th of August 1619. Then the States of Bohemia, seeing they had not been able to hinder Ferdinand from being Emperor, took an oath never to own him for their Sovereign, and at the same time, namely, on the 5th of September, chose for their King, Frederic, Elector Palatine, and sent deputies to acquaint him with the election, and pray him to repair to Prague. Frederic did not want much solicitation to accept of a crown offered him by those who, in his opinion, had a right to dispose of it. He dispatched however Baron d'Aulné to the King his father-in-law, for his advice, but it was as a mere compliment. Assembling some troops, he came to Prague, where he was crowned the 4th of November.

Before Frederic's envoy reached England, James, hearing the news of his son-in-law's election, called a council, to debate whether the elector ought to accept or refuse the crown of Bohemia. The Archbishop of Canterbury, not being present, by reason of the gout which confined him to his bed, wrote to Secretary Naunton, "That it was his opinion the Elector should accept of the crown, and England openly support him. And therefore as soon as there should be certain news of his coronation, the bells ought to be rung, guns fired, and bonfires made, to let all Europe see the King was determined to countenance him." But this advice was not followed. The King maintained, in the council, Ferdinand's cause against the States of Bohemia, and, without knowing any thing of their privileges, as he afterwards owned, decided that the Bohemian States were in actual rebellion.* It was therefore resolved, the King should admonish the Elector to refuse the offered crown, not only because it was agreeable to the King's principles, but for another, and no less strong, reason, namely, the King rightly judged that the Elector's acceptance could not but be extremely prejudicial to the negotiation of the Spanish match, considering the strict union between the Princes of the house of Austria.

But the Elector Palatine had broken these measures by accepting the crown, without expecting the council of England's resolution. The King was so angry, that he refused to give Baron d'Aulné audience, who, since his departure, had received orders to excuse the Elector from the necessity he was under of proceeding with all possible expedition. The very Ambassadors, sent by King James on this occasion to the Emperor, and several German Princes, had express orders to disavow Frederic's proceedings; and of all the Protestant Princes, James alone never gave him the title of King.

Though the Elector was crowned, the King his father-in-law fancied, he could persuade him to quit the crown, and induce the States of Bohemia to acknowledge Ferdinand. To that purpose, he sent two Ambassadors to Prague, namely, Richard Weston a papist, and Sir Edward Conway a Protestant. Conway being afterwards made Secretary of State, the King used to say to him merrily, that never Prince had such a Secretary, who could neither read nor write. This embassy was fruitless.†

Meantime, the King of Spain did not forget to do the Emperor good service, keeping King James in his pacific disposition. Nothing was talked of at the court of Madrid, but the King of England's generosity, justice, and equity. In fine, to amuse him the better, the negotiation of the marriage was renewed, having been interrupted, in expectation of the Pope's dispensation. It was even intimated to Cottington, that if the dispensation did not quickly arrive, the marriage should be concluded without it, or means found to force the Pope to grant it. Cottington, who knew the Spanish court, fell not into the snare. He sent word to England, that nothing more was to be expected concerning the marriage; that the King of Spain's intent was only to amuse his Majesty, and therefore he believed, the negotiation ought to be broken off. But instead of seeing his advice followed, he received orders to declare to the King of Spain, that his master was not concerned in the acceptance of the crown of Bohemia: that his son-in-law had proceeded without his approbation and knowledge, and therefore he entirely disowned him.

A. D. 1620.] The affair of Bohemia put several of the Princes of Europe in motion, and held the rest in suspense. Ferdinand and Frederic had each their friends and allies, who were preparing to assist them, whilst James stood neuter, imagining, that by making a show of neutrality, he should induce the two competitors to make him arbiter of their difference. But both were jealous of him, the one because he was a Protestant, and father-in-law of his adversary; the other because he had openly declared, he disapproved of his conduct. So, without much regarding his solicitations, both sides prepared to decide the quarrel by arms.

The whole kingdom was extremely surprised at the King's insensibility for his son-in-law, his daughter, and the children: but for his part, he looked upon the quarrel between the Emperor and Frederic in quite another light. He was just going to be strictly united with the house of Austria, by his son's marriage with the Infanta of Spain; and at this very time, the Elector, his son-in-law, had broken all his measures by a rash, unjust, and inconsiderate action; for so he termed the acceptance of the crown of Bohemia. "Is it reasonable, said he, I should suffer myself to be drawn, by a son-in-law's ambition and humour, into a war against the house of Austria, who have done me no wrong? Must I alter all my projects, all my measures, because the Elector Palatine has been pleased to accept the crown of Bohemia, without so much as asking my advice?" However, by much persuasion, he was prevailed with at length to suffer a regiment of two thousand two hundred men to be raised, which was done mostly at the charge of some Lords. Sir Horatio Vere, who had long served in Holland, where he had acquired great reputation, commanded this regiment, having under him Burroughs and Herbert for Major-Generals. The Earls of Oxford and Essex accompanied him, and commanded each a company of gentlemen volunteers.

This regiment, being raised with extreme speed, was transported to Holland. Then they passed the Rhine below Wezel, to avoid Spinola, who was at Aix la Chapelle. It was not without danger, that the English crossed so many countries to reach the Palatinate: even they durst not have attempted it, if Prince Frederic Henry of Nassau, with two thousand horse, and some foot, had not conducted them to Francfort, and deceived Spinola's vigilance, who expected them on another road. It was the 1st of October before they joined the

* He was so possessed of the opinion of a Divine right in all Kings, that he could not bear, that even an elective and limited King should be called in question by his subjects.

† It was a pleasant remark of the King's, that Stenny had given him three notable servants: a Gemleman of the bed-chamber (Clark) who could not help him to untruss a point, for he had but one hand; a chaplain (Dr. Preston) who could not say prayers, for he scrupled the use of our liturgy; and a Secretary of State (Conway) who could neither write nor read. Conway had been bred a soldier, being Governor of the Briel, when England gave up the cautionary towns.

army of the King of Bohemia's allies, commanded by the Margrave of Anspach.

Spinola, who departed from Brussels the 8th of August, being come to Coblentz, opened his orders in the presence of the English Ambassador, who had accompanied him thus far. The orders were, to make war upon all who should declare for the Elector Palatine. This was all Edmonds could know of Spinola's designs. The rest was easy to be guessed, considering which way he was marching. He arrived in the Palatinate before the English had joined the confederate army, and took several small places. The two armies tried one another for some time, and were once in sight of each other, ready to engage, but no action of moment ensued. The season, which daily grew worse, obliging them at last to retire to winter quarters, the confederate Princes led home their troops, leaving the English in garrison at Heidelbergh, Manheim, and Frankendal.

In April this year the King of France sent to the Emperor and several German Princes, the Duke of Angoulême, the Duke of Bethune, and Mr. Despreaux, to endeavour to appease the Bohemian and Hungarian troubles. At the same time, James dispatched Sir Henry Wotton on the same errand, and to exhort to peace all the Princes engaged in the quarrel between the Emperor and the Palsgrave. Wotton, having seen the Princes of both parties, brought back only general expressions, which showed how little the King his master was regarded. At last he came to Vienna, where he found the French Ambassadors. In the audience he had of the Emperor, he made two propositions. It must be observed, the Emperor had now published a ban against the Elector Palatine, wherein he had fully set forth the reasons moving him to come to such extremeties: that Spinola was marching to the Palatinate: that the Duke of Bavaria was leading his troops to Bohemia to join the Emperor's forces, and the Elector of Saxony going to invade Lusatia. In this juncture, Wotton made his two propositions; but the Emperor, affecting not fully to understand the discourse, desired a clearer and more circumstantial memorial, that he might be able to give a suitable answer. The memorial was never presented, and thus ended this embassy.

The Elector of Saxony, the Duke of Bavaria, and the Marquis of Spinola, commissioned to execute the imperial ban, began all three to act in September. The Elector of Saxony, at the head of twenty thousand men, entered Lusatia, and by the end of October conquered the whole country, which he kept for himself, according to his agreement with the Emperor.

Whilst the Elector of Saxony was in Lusatia, the Duke of Bavaria, having subdued Upper Austria, the beginning of September, joined Count Bucquoy, who commanded the imperial army in Bohemia. As Frederic had all his forces there, the Emperor's two Generals were obliged to take some places, before they could advance to Prague. At length, having opened a passage, they came in the beginning of November within sight of that metropolis, and of the enemy's army posted between them and the city. A few days after * was fought the famous battle of Prague, wherein Frederic's army was entirely routed. This Prince, who stayed at Prague during the battle, hastily retired with his wife and children, leaving all his baggage and money in the city, which on the morrow opened her gates to the imperialists and Bavarians. Weston and Conway, the English Ambassadors, followed the King in his flight; But finding he intended to withdraw into Holland, they obtained a passport to return to Prague, where they remained not long, their stay being entirely needless.

The victory lately gained by the Emperor's arms produced great effects; the first whereof was that the Palsgrave was forsaken by most of the Princes his confederates. The Prince of Anhalt himself, who commanded his army, entered into the Emperor's service. Count Mansfeldt alone remained faithful, and was still serviceable to him.†

The campaign of the Palatinate was no sooner ended, than the Earl of Essex posted away, to represent to the King the impossibility of saving that country, without a speedy and powerful aid. But it was not by arms that James meant to support his son-in-law's interest. Count Gondemar ruled him as he pleased, by feeding him with good success of the marriage, provided he would not disturb the negotiation by proceedings offensive to the King of Spain. Count Gondemar had bribed with presents and pensions, all those who had the King's ear, and who took care to cherish him in this vain project.‡ The King verily believed there was no other way to save the Palatinate, than to preserve a good understanding with the King of Spain and the Emperor by standing neuter. This he declared himself to the council, adding however, if his instances were rejected he would have recourse to arms at last. Not that he had any intent to go to war with the house of Austria let what would happen, but hoped, this would be a good pretence to draw money from his subjects, and to send a letter signed by the council to all the nobility, and to the Lord Mayor of London, for a benevolence. But probably this method was unsuccessful, so much were the people dissatisfied with the government.§

The affairs of the Protestant religion in Germany and France were in a very ill situation. On the other hand, the King of Bohemia, being driven out of the kingdom, saw himself upon the point of losing also the Palatinate. All the world murmured to behold the King's extreme indolence with respect to these two affairs, wherein he was particularly concerned as a father, as a King of England, and as a Protestant. These murmurs produced at length a Parliament. Not that the court's intent was to satisfy the people: but it was judged, since they were so desirous that proper measures should be taken for the defence of religion and the Palatinate, the House of Commons would be ready to grant the King an aid answerable to so important a design. A Parliament was therefore summoned to meet on the 20th of January, 1621.

The Parliament being assembled, the King made a speech to both Houses, which he divided into three heads. In the first, he told them what a Parliament was, under colour of reminding them of so necessary and fundamental a point. The second contained the reasons of their meeting. In the third, he spoke of the grievances, which the people thought to have cause to complain of, and endeavoured to justify his conduct.

The occasion of calling the Parliament was so plausible, that the Commons easily perceived, if they began, according to the custom, with the consideration of the grievances, before they gave the King money, he would not fail to say, that a delay in so important a juncture was the same as a denial. The people were extremely incensed against Spain for invading the Palatinate. They dreaded the Prince's marriage with the

* On the 8th of November. There were six thousand Bohemians slain, and more taken prisoners.

† This same year, the Huguenots of France being vigorously pushed by Lewis XIII. James sent Sir Edward Herbert to solicit him in their behalf. He had even orders to use menaces, if the court of France refused to regard his remonstrances. Herbert discharged his commission so bluntly, that the constable Luynes being offended at it, caused him to be recalled. Herbert would have afterwards sent a challenge to the constable for misrepresenting his words, but the King would not suffer it. The Viscount Doncaster, lately made Earl of Carlisle, was sent to France in Herbert's room. He spent immense sums, without effecting any thing for the Huguenots. This is not surprising, since the French court knew King James was neither able nor willing to assist them.

‡ Wilson says, he bribed the very ladies, especially those who talked much, and to whom much company resorted, that they might allay such as were too sour in their expressions, and stop them if they ran on too fast. But it seems he had neglected the Lady Jacobs, who upon his passing by her window in his chair, instead of answering his salutation as usual, only gaped with her mouth, which repeating again next day, he sent to know the reason; she replied, "that she had a mouth to be stopt as well as other ladies."

§ The Marquis of Buckingham, about the end of the year, married the Earl of Rutland's only daughter, the richest heiress in the kingdom. Some say, he debauched her before marriage, and the Earl of Rutland sent him word, if he did not espouse her, the King's favour should not screen him from his revenge. Buckingham readily complied, since it was a very advantageous match for him.

Infanta, and the destruction of the Protestant religion abroad. So to deny the King money on this occasion, would be justifying his indolence. Some members, however, believing the King had no design to make war, were desirous to spare the people's purses. But the rest demonstrated to them, the necessity of sacrificing a sum of money, whether the King employed it in defence of the Palatinate, or put it to other uses. In the first case, the public would have what they wished, and the money given the King, would be only a small part of what was further to be expended in support of the war. In the second case, the King's intentions would be manifestly known, and that would afford a just motive to refuse him money hereafter for imaginary undertakings. So, without any solicitation, the Commons granted the King two entire subsidies, with which he was satisfied, in expectation of obtaining much more hereafter on the same account.

The subsidy act was no sooner passed, but many petitions were received by the House of Commons, as well against the increase of popery, and impunity of recusants, as against monopolies, informers, or projecters. Of the monopolies, three were chiefly complained of. The first was concerning inns, which no man could keep without a licence from certain persons, to whom the King granted a patent. The second was of the same nature with respect to ale-houses. The third was the most enormous. It was a patent granted by the King to Sir Giles Monpesson, and Sir Francis Michel, for the sole making and selling of gold and silver lace. By this means, they sold great quantities of counterfeit gold lace instead of real, and if any person presumed to make or sell any other, he was thrown into gaol, and fined severely. The two patentees against being informed against in the House of Commons, were immediately committed to prison: but Monpesson, Buckingham's creature, found means to make his escape. As soon as he was safe, the King published a proclamation, promising a reward to any person that should take him.

Meanwhile, the two Houses applied themselves closely to the affair of monopolies. The Commons would know how these two persons obtained their patent, whilst the Lords were diligently forming their process. In the mean time, the King was very uneasy. He saw, this affair was examining in such a manner, that the odium could not but fall upon himself or favourite. To prevent the consequences, he came to the House of Lords, and made a speech full of tender and affectionate expressions. He affirmed, he was ignorant of the ill effects his patent had caused, and charged them to bring the offenders to speedy and severe justice: adding, his intention was to revoke all his patents which had been so injurious to the people, and particularly that of gold and silver lace, which was a kind of false coin. He exhorted them, moreover, to dispatch the bill they were preparing against informers and projectors, saying, he had before, in the Star-Chamber, shewn his dislike of such people, and to be rid of them, would be the greatest ease to himself, and all those about him. "For," continued he, "Buckingham told me he never found such quiet and rest, as in this time of Parliament, from projectors and informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours." In short, he told them, he thought till then the people had never been so happy as in his reign: but now he was ashamed to consider how his people had been vexed and polled, by the vile execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and the like, which have more exhausted their purses than subsidies would have done. Having thus obviated the complaints which could be made against him, by condemning first the occasion of them, he taught the Lords how they were to proceed in equitably judging the matters before them, namely, not to suffer themselves to be carried away with an inconsiderate zeal for justice, in hearkening to those who accused the innocent as well as the guilty.

Every one knew that he meant to hinder the Marquis of Buckingham from being attacked, who was reckoned the chief author of our monopolies. He had indeed the satisfaction to see that the Parliament did not carry this affair very far. But though he had ordered his speech to be printed, and dispersed, he could not hinder reflections to his disadvantage.

The Lords were satisfied with punishing Monpesson and Michel. They confiscated Monpesson's estate, who had made his escape, and degraded him of his knighthood.* Michel was likewise degraded, fined a thousand pounds, imprisoned for life, and carried on horseback with his face to the tail, through the public streets in London.

Shortly after, the King, hearing complaints were brought before the Peers against Chancellor Bacon, came to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, made a speech, wherein he chiefly insisted upon the necessity of punishing corruption and bribery in Judges. Then he thanked the Commons for the two subsidies, but said, the money had been employed before-hand for the defence of the Palatinate, and maintenance of his children, who were fled to Holland for refuge: that he had procured a short truce, and hoped soon to obtain a general peace; but the great charges of sending Ambassadors over all Europe, or an army into the Palatinate in case his negotiations became fruitless, required a much larger sum than what had been granted him. He concluded, with protesting before God, he would not dissolve the Parliament till the affairs in agitation were finished.

The House of Commons, having demanded a conference of the Lords, represented to them, that the Chancellor being accused of several crimes, it was not fit he should continue any longer in so eminent a post if he was guilty, or be exposed to calumny if innocent. Whereupon the Lords sent the Chancellor to the Tower, and prepared for his trial. He used all possible endeavours to avoid the shame of a particular and full confession. To that end, he presented an humble submission to the House, confessing himself guilty in general, and imploring pardon, or at least, that his punishment might not extend farther than the taking of the Great Seal. But the Lords were inexorable. They required him to confess the particulars of the charge, which consisted in the enumeration of several bribes he had taken. He was so very express, that he confessed, one of his servants took a dozen of buttons as a gift, in a cause depending before him.† But this confession, however full and plain it was, did not hinder him from being declared unworthy, not only of the office of Chancellor, but even of having a place for the future in the House of Peers,‡ though he had been created Baron Verulam, and Viscount of St. Albans. He was likely to have been even deprived of his dignity.§ He was a very great genius, and one of the most learned men in Europe, but a servile flatterer, extremely haughty whilst fortune smiled upon him, and cringing when she frowned. After his disgrace, he composed several works, and amongst others, the History of King Henry VII. to whom certainly he has not given a just character. This is not surprising; for as his estate was forfeited by the sentence passed upon him, and as he lived only on a pension from the King, who always spoke of Henry VII. his great-grandfather with high-commendations, he made his court to the King, by representing that Prince as a pattern of wisdom and virtue.‖

† That dozen of buttons was valued at 50*l*. The reader may see an account of the proceedings against him, (which continued from March 15, to May 3,) in State-Trials.

‡ He was also condemned in a fine of 40,000*l*. (which was afterwards remitted) to be imprisoned during the King's pleasure; and declared for ever incapable of filling any office or place.

§ To heighten his misery the more, many others were crushed by his fall, for he was vastly in debt, and, notwithstanding his pension, he wanted to his last, living obscurely in his lodgings at Gray's-Inn. ——His too great indulgence to his servants, was the cause of his ruin; he connived at their takings, and they were profuse and expensive, and had at command whatever he was master of. His decrees in chancery were generally made with so much equity, that never was any one of them reversed as unjust.

‖ He was of middling stature, his countenance indented with age,

It was properly in this third Parliament that two parties were formed, the one for the court, the other for the people, who began from this time to oppose one another on all occasions. The people had the strongest party among the Commons, and the King in the House of Lords. Not but that the Kings had always their adherents in both Houses, and the ministers and favourites their enemies and enviers. But till this Parliament, there were not properly any formed parties, or, if any, they were not long-lived. But those that began to be formed this year, continually increased. These are the same parties which still subsist, under the names of Tories and Whigs; the first of which labours incessantly to stretch the prerogative royal as high as possible, when favoured by the King; and the other is always insisting on the rights and privileges of the people. When all parliamentary affairs came to be transacted with a spirit of party, every thing tended by degrees to confusion. As one of the parties was always ready to increase the King's power, the other used its utmost endeavours, not only to keep it within due bounds, but also to lessen it, for fear the King's prerogatives might serve him for steps to mount higher. Thus both went too far. James I. gave birth to these two parties, by haughtily establishing these two prerogatives, which perhaps would never have been questioned, had he not founded them upon principles that opened a door to arbitrary power. He met, however, with great opposition, not only in the House of Commons, but among the Peers themselves, several of whom did not scruple to contradict him openly. Of this number were the Earls of Essex, Oxford, Southampton, and Warwick, the Lords Say and Seal, the Lord Spenser, and some others. It was then become customary, that when one Lord had spoken for or against the government, he was answered by another of the opposite party, and very often with a heat and passion unbecoming the dignity of the House.*

The Commons, finding the King made no preparation for war, but had only sent Digby to the Emperor, were not forward to give him a fresh supply, especially as they knew the two subsidies already granted had been put to other uses. They were not ignorant, moreover, that the King built all his hopes upon the Spanish match, and consequently would not easily resolve to take arms against the house of Austria, and the more, because Gondemar had still a great influence over him. The truth is, had the King really intended to wrest from the Spaniard what was taken from the Palatinate, it was not natural for the Spanish Ambassador to have so much influence at court. The people were extremely displeased with it, and looked upon the Spanish marriage as a very great misfortune to the nation, and the Protestant religion. Of this they gave Gondemar himself a sensible proof, who was reviled and insulted by the populace in London streets. The King hearing of it, ordered one of the insolent mob to be publicly whipt by the hangman.

The King, perceiving the Commons would never think of granting him a fresh aid, before it was more certainly known whether there would be peace or war, ordered the Lord-Treasurer to go, in his name, on June the 4th, and adjourn the Parliament to the 14th of Nov. The spirit of jealousy, which then reigned among the Commons, caused them to consider this adjournment as an encroachment upon their privileges. They pretended, the King had indeed power to prorogue and dissolve the Parliament, but that adjournment was the peculiar privilege of each house. So they desired a conference with the Lords, to persuade them to concur with them in presenting a petition to the King upon this occasion. But the King acquainting the Lords, that such a petition would be very displeasing to him, and that he would not suffer his power to call, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve the Parliament, to be disputed, the Lords refused to join with the Commons. Whereupon the Commons declared, that they were extremely concerned at the King's resolution, because it deprived them of the means of finishing what was begun for the public good.

This declaration brought the King to the House of Peers, and after thanking their Lordships for acknowledging his prerogative, and refusing to join with the Commons, he told them, if they desired it, he would grant them a delay of eight or ten days; but would not do it at the request of the Commons. Upon this offer, the Lords, after a conference with the Commons, moved the King to continue their sitting for fourteen days, which was granted. Some days after, the committee of both Houses attending the King, he took occasion to tell them, how ill he took it that the Commons should dispute his undoubted right to adjourn the Parliament. The Commons, seeing the Lords, who were equally concerned in the affair, refuse their concurrence, proceeded no farther. Nevertheless, on the day they were to break up, they drew the following declaration, "That taking into most serious consideration, the present state of the King's children abroad, and the generally afflicted estate of the true professors of the same Christian religion, professed by the church of England in foreign parts, and being touched with a true sense and fellow feeling of their distresses, as members of the same body, they do with unanimous consent declare——they shall be ready to the utmost of their power, both with their lives and fortunes, to assist his Majesty, so as that he may be able to do that with his sword, which by a peaceable course shall not be effected."

Presently after, the King published a proclamation, wherein he set forth, that as many great affairs debated in Parliament, could not be brought to perfection in so short a time, the Commons thought it convenient to continue the same session in course of adjourment. That as for the grievances, they were such as he needed not the assistance of Parliament to reform the same, and would have redressed them himself, had they been sooner made known to him. Adding, that by his own regal authority, he annulled and revoked the patent for gold and silver thread, and some others mentioned in the proclamation; at the same time a second proclamation was published against such as were so bold as to talk of state-affairs, notwithstanding his Majesty's former command, with threats of severe punishment, as well against the concealers of such discourses, as against audacious tongues and pens.

On the 20th of July, John Williams, Dean of Westminster, was sworn Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, the Chancellorship having been vacant ever since Bacon's condemnation.

The day after the battle, the city of Prague surrendered at discretion, and the Duke of Bavaria returned to Munich, leaving his army in Bohemia under the command of Count Tilly his General. On the other hand, Count Bucquoy departed the 12th of December for Moravia which voluntarily submitted, as despairing of assistance. After Bucquoy had spent part of the winter in Moravia and at Vienna, he went and commanded the imperial army in Hungary, where he was slain, after some progress. A little before, Silesia had likewise submitted to the Emperor.

Philip III. King of Spain died the 31st of March, this year, and was succeeded by his son Philip IV.

In France, Lewis XIII. vigorously pressed the Huguenots, and invested Montauban; but the long resistance of the besieged, compelled him to desist.

The Emperor, to gain time, or, to be freed from Digby's importunities, told him, he intended to grant a truce for the Palatinate, if the Duke of Bavaria would before he was old; his presence grave and comely, of a high-flying and lively wit, striving in some things to be rather admired than understood; yet so quick and easy when he would express himself, and his memory so strong and active, that he appeared the master of a large and plenteous store-house of knowledge.

* One day, as the Lord Spenser was speaking about the government, and alledging several examples of their great ancestors, Arundel suddenly interrupted him, saying, "My Lord, when these things you speak of were doing, your ancestors were keeping sheep." Spenser instantly replied, "When my ancestors (as you say) were keeping sheep, yours were plotting treason." Whereupon, the House ordering them both to withdraw; it was resolved, in spite of the most zealous courtiers, that the Earl of Arundel, as aggressor, should give the Lord Spenser satisfaction, which he refusing, was sent to the Tower, and not released till he had submitted to the commands of the House.

would consent to it. He even advised him to go and negotiate the truce with the Duke. Digby, leaving Vienna the 11th of September, came into the Upper Palatinate, where the Duke of Bavaria then was, at the time Mansfeldt was concluding a truce with Tilly. When Digby talked of a truce, the Duke told him, "There was no need to labour for a truce, for the wars were at an end, in that he had agreed with Count Mansfeldt; nor did he doubt of keeping both Palatinates in peace, till the Emperor and Palsgrave were agreed." The Emperor, hearing by Digby this answer, wrote him word, that, the face of affairs being altered in the Upper-Palatinate, by Mansfeldt's fault, who had entered that country with his troops, the Duke of Bavaria was under a necessity of raising an army to drive him thence, and it was not reasonable he should be at that charge to no purpose. Then it was that Digby, having informed the King of the state of affairs in Germany, brought Mansfeldt into the Lower-Palatinate, where his coming saved Frankendal. After that, he borrowed, upon his own credit, ten thousand pounds sterling, to pay the English troops, who had for a long time received nothing.

The King, being informed, by his ambassador's letter, of the Duke of Bavaria's answer, wrote to the Emperor, to complain of the invasion of the Palatinate, and to tell him, in what manner he conceived, the elector Palatinate was to give him satisfaction, in order to fix the sense of the word.

I. That he should renounce the crown of Bohemia.

II. That, as Prince of the empire he should submit, to his Imperial Majesty.

III. That he should ask pardon on his knees.

IV. That for the future, he should remain quiet, and raise no disturbance in the empire.

V. That he should be reconciled to all the Princes.

VI. That if this was not sufficient, he would undertake to procure what other terms should be deemed reasonable. Lastly, he told him, that if he could not obtain his son-in-law's pardon by fair means, he was resolved to have recourse to arms. The Emperor, without being frighted at this menace, still continued to amuse him, and, the better to persuade him he was inclined to peace, he dispatched Count Schwartzenburgh to settle with him the conditions of a truce.

The King had further adjourned the two Houses from the 14th of November, to the 8th of February 1622. But Digby's return occasioned his ordering them to meet the 20th of November. As he was a little indisposed, he commanded the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Digby, to acquaint the Parliament with his intentions. The Lord Keeper said, that, since the last adjournment, the King had taken great care of the nation, reforming by his proclamations thirty-seven several grievances complained of by the people, without demanding any thing in return for these favours, as was usual in former times. That he had reassembled the Parliament, upon the declaration of the Commons to assist him powerfully in the recovery of the Palatinate. That he had used his endeavours to procure a good peace, but with little success, as the Lord Digby would inform them. Then, he put them in mind, that the King had advanced forty thousand pounds to keep together an army in the Lower-Palatinate: "But," continued he, "unless the Parliament take further resolution, and imitate rather ancient than modern principles, and be more expeditious in what they do, his Majesty's endeavours will fall to the ground." He concluded with saying, the King had resolved to continue the session till seven or eight days before Christmas, and renew it the 8th of February.

The Lord Digby, speaking next, gave a brief account of his embassy to Vienna, and said, he plainly discovered, it was the Emperor's intent to give the Upper Palatinate to the Duke of Bavaria. Adding, that a good sum of money was absolutely necessary, both to keep Count Mansfeldt's army together, and to send a strong supply of English troops to the Palatinate.

The Lord Treasurer said, the King's coffers were empty, his treasure being exhausted by the sums employed in the defence of the Palatinate. Nevertheless, though the King declared for war, he was resolved to conclude the Spanish marriage.

The King demanded money to enable him to make the necessary preparations, and, in a word, required that the affair should be left entirely to his management. But the Commons had no confidence in James I. He demanded money for a war, to which, they were persuaded, he had no inclination. Therefore they could not help fearing, that the money which should be granted him, would be employed other ways than in a war with Spain. On the other hand, the Commons were taken in their own nets. To show that the delay of a war, deemed necessary by all the world, did not proceed from them, they had promised to put the King in condition to begin and pursue it vigorously. But when this promise came to be performed, their little confidence in the King, made them very reserved. It was necessary however to satisfy the public, and show, they meant to keep their promise, provided they could be certain, it would be for the advantage of the state. To this end, they framed a remonstrance, which they intended to carry to the King. They represented, that the enormous growth of the Austrian power threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progress of the Catholic religion in England bred the most melancholy apprehensions, lest it should acquire an ascendancy in the kingdom; that the indulgence of his Majesty towards the professors of that religion had encouraged their insolence and temerity; that the uncontrolled conquests, made by the Austrian family in Germany, raised mighty expectations in the English papists; but, above all, that the prospect of the Spanish match elevated them so far as to hope for an entire toleration, if not the final re-establishment of that religion. The Commons, therefore, entreated his Majesty that he would immediately undertake the defence of the Palatine, and maintain it by force of arms; that he would turn his sword against Spain, whose armies and treasures were the chief support of the Catholic interest in Europe; that he would enter into no negotiation for the marriage of his son, but with a Protestant Princess; that the children of Popish recusants should be taken from their parents, and be committed to the care of Protestant teachers and schoolmasters; and that the fines and confiscations, to which the Catholics were by law liable, should be levied with the utmost severity.

The King had taken great care, at the opening of this Parliament, to mark out the bounds which the Commons were not to exceed. Above all things, he intimated to them, that they ought not to give him advice without being asked. They neglected this charge very much, in their remonstrance, and plainly showed, they did not believe it belonged to the King to determine, how far the duty of the people's representatives in Parliament reached. The King's principles were so different from those of the Commons, that it is no wonder their inferences were directly contrary. The King did not expect, the Commons should advise him; and the Commons pretended, it was their indispensible duty to represent to him the dangers of the church or state, with the properest remedies. The King rested upon the prerogative royal, but the Commons did not agree to the extent he gave this prerogative, by virtue whereof he pretended to hinder them from taking care of the church and state, when they were in danger, or their concerns neglected.

The King was at that time absent, at Newmarket; but as soon as he heard of the intended remonstrance of the Commons, he wrote a letter to the speaker, in which he sharply rebuked the House, for openly debating matters far above their reach and capacity; and he strictly forbade them to meddle with any thing that regarded his government, or deep matters of state, and especially not to touch on his son's marriage with the daughter of Spain, nor to attack the honour of that King, or any other of his friends or confederates. In order the more to intimidate them, he mentioned the imprisonment of Sir Edwin Sandys: and though he denied that the confinement of that member had been owing to any offence committed in the House, he plainly plainly told them, that he thought himself fully entitled to punish every misdemeanour in Parliament, as well during its sitting as after its dissolution; and that he intended thenceforward to chastise any man, whose insolent behaviour there should minister occasion of offence.

This letter being read and examined in the House, the Commons did not think proper to keep silence, but to let the King see, his threats should not deter them from doing their duty, as they pretended. They drew therefore a petition, in which they still insisted on their former remonstrance and advice; and they maintained, though in respectful terms, that they were entitled to interpose with their counsel in all matters of government: that to possess entire freedom of speech, in their debates on public business, was their ancient and undoubted right, and an inheritance transmitted to them from their ancestors; and that, if any member abused this liberty, it belonged to the House alone, who were witnesses of his offence, to inflict a proper censure upon him.

This petition, with the former remonstrance annexed, was sent to the King by twelve members, at the head of whom the House affected to set Sir Richard Weston, a Privy-Counsellor, a known Papist, and thought to be the person that most incensed the King against the Commons. Then the House resolved to proceed to no other affair, till they had an answer to their petition. The King received the twelve members very roughly. Some say, he called for twelve chairs for them, saying, "Here are twelve Kings come to me." His answer was prompt and sharp. He told the House that their remonstrance was more like a denunciation of war, than an address of dutiful subjects; that their pretension to inquire into all state-affairs, without exception, was such a plenipotence as none of their ancestors, even during the reign of the weakest Princes, had ever pretended to; that public transactions depended on a complication of views and intelligence, with which they were entirely unacquainted; that they could not better show their wisdom, as well as duty, than by keeping within their proper sphere; and that, in any business which depended on their prerogative, they had no title to interpose with their advice except, when he was pleased to desire it. And he concluded with these memorable words: "And though we cannot allow of your style, in mentioning your ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, but would rather have wished that ye had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for the most of them grew from precedents, which shows rather a toleration than inheritance;) yet we are pleased to give you our royal assurance, that as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges, as ever any of our predecessors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative."

The last part of the King's answer was so clear, as to want no explication. He had contented himself hitherto with insinuating certain principles, the consequences whereof he had carefully concealed; but now, whether he gave way to his passion, or was glad at last to speak his thoughts clearly, he put the Commons under a necessity either of granting his pretensions, or opposing them openly. The Commons, having read the answer, the consequences whereof they plainly perceived, and knowing the Parliament was about to be dissolved or prorogued, drew up the following protestation:

"The Commons now assembled in Parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry liberties franchises, and privileges of Parliament, amongst others here mentioned, do make this protestation following, that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdiction of Parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the King, state, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England, and the maintenance and making of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of counsel and debate in Parliament; and that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses, every member of the house of Parliament hath, and, of right, ought to have, freedom of speech, to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion, the same; and that the Commons in Parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters in such order, as in their judgments shall seem fittest; and that every member of the said House hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by censure of the House itself) for, or concerning, any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament or Parliament business: and that if any of the said members be complained of, and questioned for any thing done or said in Parliament, the same is to be shewed to the King by the advice and assent of all the Commons assembled in Parliament, before the King give credence to any private information."

The King now hurried to town, sent for the journals of the Commons, and, with his own hand, before the council, tore out this protestation; ordering his reasons to be inserted in the council book. Six days after, he dissolved the Parliament by proclamation; declaring, he was not obliged to give an account thereof to any, since the dissolving of the Parliament, when he pleased, was confessedly in his power. That, however, he was willing to inform the public, it was, because the Commons took the liberty not only to treat of his high prerogatives, which belonged not to them, but also to speak disrespectfully of foreign Princes: that they spent the time in disputing about their privileges, without regarding the public wants: that some ill-tempered spirits sowed tares among the corn, and by their cunning devices, had imposed upon him a necessity of discontinuing the present Parliament, without putting it to the name or period of a session. Then, he declared, that though the Parliament was broken off, he intended to govern well, and should gladly embrace the first occasion to call another at a proper season.

This proclamation was followed by another, forbidding under severe penalties, to talk of state affairs, and charging the judges in their circuits, to put the laws in force against licentious tongues.

But the King's resentment did not end here. Some of the Commons, who had appeared most zealous to maintain the privileges of the House, as Sir Edward Coke, Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallery, were committed to prison. Likewise Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Nathaniel Rich, and Sir James Perrot, were ordered into Ireland, to execute a certain commission; the King intending thereby to remove them from their homes, and punish them with a sort of banishment. On the other hand, the Earls of Oxford and Southampton were sent to the Tower on some studied pretence: but it was easy to see, it was for speaking too freely in the House of Peers, of the King's conduct.

A. D. 1622.] Whilst the nation was in a state of fermentation, the King wanted money. He had a mind to send Digby to Spain, and Weston to Brussels, to finish at once the marriage, and the affair of the Palatinate. Though a Parliament could have been persuaded to give the King money, it would not have been till after their privileges were secured at the expence of the prerogative royal, and the King thought the remedy worse than the disease. Recourse therefore was to be had to extraordinary methods. The speediest, and most sure, seemed to be, the exacting from the people a contribution under the name of benevolence. As the court knew, if some constraint were not used, the people's liberality would not go very far, the judges were ordered in their circuits to demand a benevolence, and to intimate withal, that the King would not be satisfied with what should be voluntarily offered, if it was not proportionable to the giver's abilities.*

The

* To that purpose, the council directed a circular letter to the judges, concluding with these words: "Nevertheless, if any persons shall, out of obstinacy or disaffection, refuse to contribute herein, proportionably to their estates and means, you are to certify their names

The King's project was to conclude the Prince his son's marriage, and receive the dowry of two millions of pieces of eight, or 600,000*l.* sterling, before he demanded the restitution of the Palatinate, for fear the Spaniard should pretend that this restitution was to be in compensation of the dowry. After that, he hoped the King of Spain, out of friendship, and in consideration of their alliance, would surrender the Lower Palatinate to his son-in-law, and oblige the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria to restore him the Upper. He accordingly sent Digby ambassador extraordinary to Spain, to conclude the marriage-treaty jointly with Sir Walter Aston, who had been some time at the court of Philip IV. The articles concerning religion were already settled, but the rest were not to be talked of, till the Pope's dispensation was obtained.

When Digby, who was this year created Earl of Bristol, set out for Spain, the King sent Gage to Rome, to solicit the dispatch of the dispensation, without which the new ambassador could not proceed at Madrid. But to render Gage's instances more effectual, it was necessary to shew the Pope, the King was not a persecutor of the Catholics. He, therefore, released all the imprisoned recusants; to the number, it is said, of 4,000. This was done publicly and openly, by writs under the Great Seal to the justices of assize, with a letter from the Lord Keeper, Williams, exhorting them punctually to obey the King's orders.*

The King of Bohemia, perceiving the King, his father-in-law, made use of very ineffectual methods to restore him to his dominions, believed it adviseable to proceed some other way. He was still master of Manheim, Heidelberg, and Frankendal; and Count Mansfeldt, though withdrawn into Alsatia, had it still in his power to re-enter the Lower Palatinate. In order to improve this remedy, he agreed with Prince Christian of Brunswick, administrator of the Bishopric of Halberstadt, who had accompanied him to the Hague, to raise an army in Westphalia, and join Mansfeldt. At the same time he made the like agreement with the Prince of Baden-Durlach, who promised also to levy an army for the same purpose. It is likely, the Hollanders supplied the money for these levies, on account of the advantage they should reap from this powerful diversion. These two Princes kept promise with the King of Bohemia, and each headed ten or twelve thousand men. The difficulty was, how to enter the Lower-Palatinate, where the Spaniards were very strong. However, the thing not appearing impracticable, the Prince of Brunswick took the field in Westphalia, and seized some place in the county of Marck. This drew upon him a detachment of the Spanish army, from the Low-Countries, commanded by Count Henry de Bergh, who was joined by the Count of Anhalt with another detachment of the army of Bavaria, commanded by Count Tilly in the Palatinate. By this means, Prince Christian saw himself detained some time in Westphalia. But at length, the Count of Bergh being recalled, he was at liberty to advance. On the other hand, it was not easy for the Prince of Baden to enter the Palatinate, all the passages being stopt up by Count Tilly and Gonsales of Cordova.

In the meanwhile, the King of Bohemia, departing privately from the Hague, on board a small vessel, and landing at Calais, travelled through France and safely arrived at Mansfeldt's army, who was advanced to Germersheim. Here they impatiently expected the approach of the two armies coming to their assistance. It would be needless to give a particular account of the march of these two armies, and the obstacles they met with from the Spaniards and Bavarians. It will suffice to say, the Prince of Baden was defeated the 6th of May: that afterwards, the King of Bohemia, and Mansfeldt, marching to Prince Christian, met Count Tilly, who put them to rout, and forced them to retire to Manheim. This battle was fought the 12th of June. Eight days after, Tilly also attacked Prince Christian, who was advanced to the borders of the Palatinate, and though he gained some advantage over him, could not however prevent his passing to Manheim with good part of his troops.

Some time after, the Spaniards and Bavarians were so strongly recruited, that their army consisted of above fifty thousand men, with which they almost surrounded their enemies, who were encamped between Manheim, and Heidelberg. Wherefore the King of Bohemia, despairing ever to recover what he had lost, returned to Holland. After his departure, the Prince of Brunswick and Count Mansfeldt, resolved to join Prince Maurice in the Low-Countries, and marched through Lorraine. As they were obliged to take a compass, Gonsales de Cordova, parting from Tilly, went and expected them at Brabant, to hinder their passage. The two armies, meeting between Namur and Brussels, fought with equal success; but the Prince of Brunswick lost an arm by a cannon ball. After the battle, Mansfeldt continued his march towards Holland.

Meanwhile, Count Tilly, having no enemy to oppose him in the Lower Palatinate, carried Heidelberg by storm, took Manheim by a long blockade, and then besieged Frankendal.

Whilst the King of Bohemia was in the Palatinate, conferences were held at Brussels, to procure a truce for that unfortunate country, according to the King of England's desire, though he was not empowered by the King, his son-in-law, for whom, at this juncture, a truce was not convenient. In this negotiation two difficulties immediately occurred, which served to prolong it. The first was, the English ambassador had not sufficient powers from the King of Bohemia and his allies. James had doubtless imagined, that, since this truce was negotiating on his account, it sufficed to treat with him. But the Spaniards gave to understand, they could treat only with the principal parties. There was occasion therefore to send to the Palatinate for full powers from the King of Bohemia, who was not in haste to despatch them, whilst he had any hopes of succeeding in his enterprise. But at last, sending these powers when he saw his affairs declining, another difficulty of the same nature occurred at Brussels. The Archduchess had no other power than the Emperor's bare letter, desiring her to consult with the English ambassador concerning a truce for the Lower Palatinate. From that time, the King of Bohemia's affairs daily growing worse, the Archduchess and Count Schwartzenburgh prolonged the affair on divers pretences, till Heidelberg was taken, and Manheim closely blocked up. Then James wrote to the King of Spain, to desire him to order that the affairs of the Palatinate might remain in their present state, till the conclusion of the truce, and the blockade of Manheim was raised. Philip feigned to have this condescension for him, but before his letter to the Archduchess was received, Manheim was taken. It did not even hinder Count Tilly from besieging Frankendal, which he would have also taken without scruple, had not the overflowing of the rivers forced him to raise the siege. Thus was the King amused with vain hopes, whilst the conquest of the Palatinate was compleating.† He perceived it at last, but, at the same time, was told, the Prince his son's marriage names unto this Board. And so recommending this service to your best care and endeavour, and praying you to return unto us notes of the names of such as shall contribute, and of the sums offered by them."

* As this affair made a noise among the people, the Lord Keeper was ordered to vindicate the King by a public writing. This vindication begins with this noble comparison: "As the sun in the firmament appears to us no bigger than a platter, and the stars but as so many nails in the pummel of a saddle, because of the enlargement and disproportion between our eye and the object: so is there such an unmeasureable distance between the deep resolution of a Prince, and the shallow apprehensions of common and ordinary people, that as they will ever be judging and censuring, so they must needs be obnoxious to error and mistaking."

† To shew how little account was made of James's negotiations abroad, there is a pleasantry mentioned by all his historians, which, for that reason, shall have a place here. In a farce acted at Brussels, a courier was introduced carrying the doleful news that the Palatinate would soon be wrested from the hands of Austria, so powerful were the succours which, from all quarters, were hastening marriage was so near a conclusion, that he could not think of hazarding a miscarriage in that affair, by insisting too strenuously on the restitution of the Elector's dominions.

In fine, after a long expectation, Gage was sent back from Rome, where he had been soliciting the dispensation, with a treaty consisting of nineteen articles, to each of which the Pope had put a postil or, short note, after the manner practised in the capitulations of places.*

When Gage came from Rome, the King was terribly embarrassed. The Palatinate was almost lost. The negotiation at Brussels did not advance, and he could not but perceive, he was imposed upon by the Emperor and King of Spain. In this perplexity, rather than break with Spain, and so lose the desired dowry, with the hopes of recovering the Palatinate, he chose to be exposed to the reproaches of his subjects. He drew therefore a memorial, which he signed with his own hand, containing his offers in favour of the Catholic religion, and sent it to the Earl of Bristol.

Hitherto the Spaniard had fed the King's hopes concerning the marriage, only to amuse him. But since he plainly saw, by the articles and offers signed with his own hand, that James was resolved to conclude at any rate, he thought, so fair an opportunity should not be missed to restore the Catholic religion in England, which very probably might be accomplished by means of this match. So Philip, suddenly altering his mind, appeared as eager to conclude, as he had seemed unwilling before. From that time, that is, from the end of the year 1622, the marriage was resolved at the court of Madrid. The business was only to extort from the King such terms as should lead to what was intended. All the King of Spain's proceedings, from the time we are speaking of, evidently show, that he was inclined to the marriage, in case he could obtain what he promised himself for the advancement of the Roman religion in England, and which James's impatience gave him room to expect.

A. D. 1623.] The late alteration in the projects of the Spanish court, procured the Earl of Bristol a letter from Philip IV. to the Infanta Isabella, to desire her to raise the siege of Frankendal, and renew at London the conferences for a truce, which were broken off at Brussels. This request was a real order, which the Infanta obeyed, and the negotiation of the truce was begun at London, where it ended the 27th of March. The sole point was to hinder, by means of this truce, Frankendal, the only place in the Palatinate where was an English garrison, from falling into the Emperor's hands. But on the other side, the Emperor had reason to fear, if James remained master of this place, he would make use of it to carry war into the Palatinate, and the more, as he had sometimes threatened to have recourse in the end to arms. To adjust the different interests of the Emperor and the King, this expedient was devised. Frankendal was to be delivered to the Infanta Isabella, and a truce made for fifteen or eighteen months, after which, the Infanta was to restore the place to the English. But withal, the Elector was to break his alliance with the Prince of Brunswick and Count Mansfeldt.

Before the truce was concluded, the Emperor, going to the diet of Ratisbon, invested the Duke of Bavaria with the electoral dignity and the Upper Palatinate, notwithstanding the opposition of several Princes who were possessed of hereditary dominions, and to whom such a precedent was a just occasion of fear. Such was the effect of King James's three years' negotiation, in favour of his son-in-law, who was at length stript of his dominions and dignities.† But the Spanish match was to recover all.

The Spaniard, being satisfied with the articles sent from England, which were much more advantageous to the Catholics than those agreed upon with the Earl of Bristol, demanded time to send them to Rome, and obtain the Pope's dispensation. It was thought, the dispensation might come in March, or April at farthest; and it was agreed, the nuptials should be solemnized four days after its arrival: that the Infanta should set out within twenty days after the celebration of the marriage, and whilst the dispensation was expected, the other articles, which were called temporal, to distinguish them from those concerning religion, should be settled. Pursuant to this agreement, the Earl of Bristol and Sir Walter Aston, jointly with the Spanish ministers, prepared these articles by the beginning of March, to the mutual satisfaction of both parties. The 22d of March, the Condé d'Olivarez and Gondemar came to the English ambassadors, and showed them a writing, with the King of Spain's hand to it, whereby he approved of the temporal articles, and ordered them to finish the affair. These articles concerned only the portion and dowry, without any mention of the Palatinate. Besides that he had commanded the Earl of Bristol, in his instructions, not to make the restitution of the Palatinate one of the marriage articles, this command was repeated in the King's letter to him of the 30th of December 1622, that is, two or three months before. Moreover, at this very time, the truce and sequestration of Frankendal were negotiating at London.

The affair of the marriage being in this situation, and, very probably, near a conclusion, the end of April was to be expected with patience, to see whether any new difficulty would occur, for, thus far, every thing seemed to be settled to the King's satisfaction. But the face of this affair was suddenly changed by a most extraordinary adventure. The Marquis of Buckingham persuaded the Prince of Wales, to go to Spain and fetch home his mistress, the Infanta, himself. He told him, "The more uncommon such a gallantry was among Princes, the more it would redound to his honour: the Infanta herself would be charmed with it: his presence would immediately put an end to all formalities, and remove whatever difficulties might yet occur: as after the marriage, there was an affair of moment to be negotiated, namely, the restitution of the Palatinate, an intercessor like him, would do more in three days than ambassadors could do in as many months." In a word, he so artfully represented this project, that, the Prince, transported with the thoughts of so noble an adventure, never rested till he had accomplished it. The difficulty was to obtain the King's consent. The Prince asked it before Buckingham, and expressed so earnest a desire to make the journey, that the King granted his request without much hesitation, and put off till next day to consider of means to effect it. But, after he had more seriously reflected on this affair, his mind was quite changed on the morrow, when the Prince and Buckingham came to him. He represented to them, how fruitless such a journey would be in the present situation of the marriage affair, and the inconveniences it might be attended with. But instead of answering his reasons, Buckingham rudely told him, to the relief of the despoiled elector; the King of Denmark had agreed to contribute to his assistance a hundred thousand pickled herrings, the Dutch a hundred thousand butter-boxes, and the King of England a hundred thousand ambassadors. On other occasions, he was painted with a scabbard, but without a sword; or with a sword which nobody could draw, though several were pulling at it.

* In this treaty, nothing could reasonably be found fault with, except one article, in which the King promised, that the children should be educated by the Princess, till ten years of age. This condition could not be insisted on, but with a view of seasoning their minds with Catholic principles; and though so tender an age seemed a sufficient security against theological prejudices, yet the same reason which made the Pope insert that article, should have induced the King to reject it. Besides the public treaty, there were separate articles, privately sworn to by the King; in which he promised to suspend the penal laws enacted against Catholics, to procure a repeal of them in Parliament, and to grant a toleration for the exercise of the Catholic religion in private houses.

† Thus by King James's amazing negligence, was the Protestant religion entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the electoral dignity transferred from the Palatine family, and the liberty of Germany overthrown. And all this chiefly through Gondemar's artful management, who wrote in one of his letters to the Duke of Lerma, that he had lulled King James so fast asleep, as he hoped neither the cries of his daughter, nor her children, nor the repeated solicitations of his Parliament and subjects in their behalf should be able to awaken him.

he had given his word, and if he broke it, would be never more credited.* This conversation ended with the King's permission, extorted by the Prince and Buckingham, for this strange, rash, and very dangerous, journey. It was resolved, that Buckingham should accompany the Prince, with two more only, namely, Sir Francis Cottington, who had been the King's agent in Spain, and came from thence in September, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of the bed-chamber to the Prince, who had been bred at Madrid: that they should go post through France, and the secret be kept, that they might be at a distance before their departure was known.† This resolution being taken, the Prince and Buckingham desired only two days to prepare.‡ They set out post the 17th of February, and came to Paris, where they ventured to appear at court, and be present at a ball, where, though disguised, they were in some danger of being discovered. However, they arrived safely at Madrid the 17th of March, and alighted at the Earl of Bristol's, who was not a little surprised to see the Prince.§ When he made himself known, the Prince met with all the rèspect due to his birth, and all possible caresses to testify the satisfaction at his gallantry to the Infanta, and his candour in confiding in the King's generosity. The only thing in which great ceremony was used, was his not being permitted to visit the Infanta in private. The Spanish way did not admit of such a familiarity, and the more because the dispensation not being yet come, he could not in strictness be considered as the Infanta's future spouse.

No sooner was the Prince arrived in Spain, but all the Spaniards thought he was come to change his religion before he espoused the Infanta, no one imagining there could be any other motive of his journey. Count Gondemar very seriously desired the Earl of Bristol, not to oppose so pious a design; and, if the Earl is to be credited, the Count intimated to him, that the Marquis of Buckingham was not against it. The Earl of Bristol, perceiving, if the court of Spain had any such hopes, it would be apt to retard the marriage, spoke of it to the Prince, and conjured him to impart the secret to him, if there was really any thing in it. But the Prince firmly denied it, and expostulated with the ambassador for having so ill an opinion of him. Whereupon the Earl of Bristol intreated him, neither to do nor say any thing whatever that might feed the hopes of the Spanish court in that respect, for fear of obstructing the marriage. Nevertheless he was attacked several times, one while by Ecclesiastics, who took all occasions to dispute with him about religion, another while by courtiers, who represented to him how powerful England would grow, if she would return to the obedience of the Pope. He even received a long letter from Gregory XV. exhorting him to come into the bosom of the church, and imitate his glorious ancestors, who had done so great things for the defence of religion.

Since the Prince's arrival in Spain, the state of the marriage treaty was somewhat altered. The dispensation arrived about six weeks after, that is, about the beginning of May. But the Pope had annexed certain conditions, without which it was to be of no force. That the children by this marriage should be left to their mother's care till they were ten years old: that the nurses should be Catholics, and appointed by the mother: that the King of England should give security for the performance of the articles agreed upon concerning religion.

After the Prince and Marquis of Buckingham came to Madrid, they managed the affair of the marriage exclusively of the Earl of Bristol. There was some debate upon the articles annexed to the Pope's dispensation. The Prince of Wales said, he had no power to make the least addition to the articles signed by the King his father, and the Spanish ministers maintained, his Catholic Majesty could not reject the conditions on which the Pope had granted the dispensation: that it lay in the Pope's breast to grant his favours on what terms he pleased, and that the dispensation was void without these conditions. In short, it was thought proper to consult the King of England, by letter, and to ask withal, what security he would give for the performance of the articles. James made no scruple concerning the time of the education of the children, or about the nurses, because these things were now settled. As to the security, he replied, he could give no other than his own, and the Prince's royal words and oaths, confirmed by his council of state, and exemplified under the great seal of England. All this not satisfying the Pope's nuntio, who pretended to have particular orders upon that point, the King of Spain offered to become security himself; but it was first to be determined by a committee of Ecclesiastics, that Philip might lawfully swear for the King of England. This difficulty being removed, the Prince sent Cottington to England with the articles concerning religion, newly drawn according to the Pope's intentions, and with some other secret articles which were not to be published so soon.

The King did not long detain Cottington in England. As it was not now time to dispute, and he was required to sign the articles as brought by Cottington without any alterations, he chose to do it rather than hazard a breach of the marriage, when the Prince his son was in the hands of the Spaniard. He signed them, therefore, and solemnly swore to them.

The King's compliance in every thing he had signed and ratified was so great, that the Spaniards could hardly believe it sincere. Some who knew the English constitution, maintained, it was not in the King's power to perform his promises, or, in case he attempted

* The King conjured them with sighs and tears not to pursue their resolution. But Buckingham told his Majesty, "That nobody could believe any thing he said, when he retracted the promise he had so solemnly made; that he plainly discerned, it proceeded from another breach of his word (for he had promised to keep the thing secret) in communicating with some rascal, who had furnished him with those pityful reasons he had alledged, and he doubted not, but he should hereafter know who his counsellor had been."—The King, with great earnestness, fortified by many oaths, made his apology, by denying that he had imparted the matter to any one.

† Cottington having been called in, James told him, that he had always been an honest man, and therefore he was now to trust him in an affair of the highest importance, which he was not, upon his life, to disclose to any man whatever. "Cottington," added he, "here is baby Charles and Stenny" (these ridiculous appellations he usually gave to the Prince and Buckingham) "who have a great mind to go post into Spain, and fetch home the Infanta: they will have but two more in their company, and they have chosen you for one. What think you of the journey?" Sir Francis, who was a prudent man, and had resided some years in Spain as the King's agent, was struck with all the obvious objections to such an enterprise, and scrupled not to declare them. The King threw himself upon his bed, and cried, "I told you this before;" and fell into a new passion and new lamentations, complaining that he was undone, and should lose baby Charles.

‡ The motives of this journey are variously related. Some say, the court of England, still doubting the Spanish court's sincerity, thought proper, the Prince and Buckingham should be satisfied with their own eyes, in order to know what could be depended upon. Lord Clarendon says, Buckingham, out of envy that the Earl of Bristol should have the sole management of so great an affair, had a mind to have the glory of ending it. Others pretend, Buckingham's aim was insensibly to induce the Prince to change his religion, by exposing him to all the temptations which of course he would meet at the court of Madrid. Of this he was afterwards accused before the Parliament, by the Earl of Bristol, who said, the project was formed several months before the Prince's departure, between Buckingham and Gondemar, by means of Endymion Porter, who had been sent to Spain for that purpose. But, whatever were the favourite's real motives with respect to this journey, it can hardly be denied, that it was a sign of great levity in the Prince, and of no less weakness and imprudence in the King. The affair of the marriage was in such a situation, that it was entirely needless to solicit afresh the court of Spain with whom every thing was agreed. Two months' patience would have shown the King, whether he could rely on them, without exposing his only son and heir apparent to such imminent danger, by suffering him to execute a romantic project, which could procure no advantage. But the King's condescension for the Prince and Buckingham prevailed above all these considerations.

§ The Prince and Marquis of Buckingham put on false beards, to cover their smooth faces, and travelled under the borrowed names of Jack and Tom Smith. The Mayor of Dover stopped them, thinking they were going to France to fight, so that Buckingham was forced to discover himself; pretending he was going to visit the fleet, as Admiral. The same day they embarked, they landed at Boulogne, and from thence rode post to Paris. At Paris, they both wore large bushy perriwigs that shadowed their faces. Here the Prince saw, at a masking dance, the Princess Henrietta Maria, whom he afterwards married.

it, a rebellion would infallibly follow. Wherefore the King of Spain appointed a committee to take this matter into consideration. The result of the debate was, that it was not proper to send the Infanta to England before the next spring, that in this interval the performance of the articles granted to the Catholics, and their effects, might be assured. Upon this the Spanish ambassadors in England had orders to desire the King to begin to execute his engagements in favour of the Catholics. This demand embarrassed him. What he had promised was secret, and not to be performed till after the marriage, and he was pressed to make it public by the execution, whilst the Prince was still in Spain. This was a sort of menace that the marriage should not be solemnized, before he had given public marks of his sincerity. He knew, a proclamation for granting the Papists a toleration might be attended with ill consequences; that these consequences might break off the marriage, and the Prince his son would be in danger of being detained in Spain. To free himself from this perplexity, he gave the ambassadors some satisfaction, by putting into their hands a declaration of his council, containing his intention concerning this affair. In all appearance, the ambassadors were prevailed with to consent, that the performance of it should be deferred, by reason of the accidents that might follow. The declaration, signed by Secretary Conway and some privy-counsellors, who were most trusted by the King, was probably sent to Spain as a pledge of the King's intention to perform his engagements. There it was that the Earl of Bristol found means to have either the original itself, or a copy, which he produced before the Parliament in 1626, to show what the Duke of Buckingham had negotiated in Spain without his privity.*

Whilst these things passed in England, news came to Madrid of Pope Gregory XV.'s death, which was a fresh obstacle to the conclusion of the marriage. When Cottington arrived from England with the ratification of the articles, the nuntio refused to deliver the dispensation, affirming, as the marriage was not yet celebrated, the dead Pope's dispensation was of no force, and therefore it was necessary to stay till there was a new Pope, who might grant a valid dispensation. By this accident, the Prince of Wales saw himself detained in Spain till the election of a new Pope. The 29th of August, however, was appointed for the celebration of the marriage, in a supposition, that before that time there would be a Pope and a new dispensation.

Meanwhile, the restitution of the Palatinate was not talked of, or, if mentioned, it was only by way of conversation, without any positive demand on the King of Spain, or his ministers.

But the court of Spain was intent upon a project of greater consequence; namely, to endeavour to persuade the Prince of Wales to turn Catholic. To this is to be ascribed the delay of the dispensation. Urban VIII. who was chosen the 6th of August, would not have failed to send it, had he not waited for this happy event, which he strove to advance by his letters to the Prince and Duke of Buckingham. The cause of the breach of the marriage, after having been so long deferred, is involved in obscurity.

All agree, it was the Duke of Buckingham that first inspired the Prince, and afterwards the King, with the thought; but it is difficult to guess his motive. Some say, the Duke rendered himself contemptible and odious to the court of Spain, by affecting to follow the French fashions in almost every thing opposite to the Spanish: that for this reason, foreseeing the Infanta and the Spaniards would have great power at the court of England, he thought they might in the end do him some ill turn, and therefore resolved to break off the match. Others say, Olivarez, favourite of Philip IV. reminding the Duke of his promise that the Prince should turn Catholic, the Duke gave him the lie to his face, and from that time sought means to retire from the Spanish court, for fear of the Condé's revenge. Some say, the Queen of Bohemia, perceiving there was no likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by his marriage, and having much more reason to expect great advantages from a rupture between England and Spain, sent a trusty messenger to the Duke, with certain offers, in case he would procure a breach. This is not improbable, and the Hollanders, to whom the union between Spain and England must have been prejudicial, might well be concerned in the project. In fine, the Duke of Buckingham's greatest favourers pretend, the Duke, having sounded the King of Spain's intentions concerning the restitution of the Palatinate, found there was nothing to be expected, and therefore resolved to break off a marriage, which was intended for no other purpose. It is certain at least, the King, Prince, and Duke made use of this pretence to justify the breach.

However this be, the Duke of Buckingham, having taken this resolution, soon prevailed with the Prince to agree to it, over whom he had now a very great ascendant. There were two difficulties to be surmounted in the execution of this design. The first was to obtain the King's consent. The second, to get the Prince out of Spain. The Duke must have been fully persuaded of his power over the King, to hope to incline him at once to desist from a design, he had so constantly pursued for seven years, at the very time all was concluded, and nothing wanting but the nuptial ceremonies. He despaired, not however, of succeeding, and therefore sent him word, he had at last discovered the King of Spain's insincerity: that not only, he had no inclination to cause the Palatinate to be restored, but also was far from having the least thought of accomplishing the marriage, and the Prince was in danger of being detained in Spain all his life. To support what the Duke said, the Prince himself wrote to the King his father, telling him, "He must now look upon his sister and her children, never thinking more of him, and forgetting he ever had such a son." The King fell, or rather threw himself into this snare, without the least reflection, and immediately wrote to Buckingham, to bring away the Prince by all means. At the same time, he sent some ships to St. Andero, in Biscay, to take them on board.

The first difficulty being overcome, means were to be devised to quit Spain, and not give the court any suspicion, which could not be done without wounding the Prince's honour and conscience. Happily for them, Urban VIII. had not yet sent the dispensation, nor even fixed any time for it. So Buckingham notified to his Catholic Majesty the order he had received to bring back the Prince to England, his return being absolutely necessary to remove the nation's jealousy of his long stay in Spain. Adding, his departure would cause no considerable alteration, since he would leave a proxy in the hands of any person, his Majesty should please to appoint, to espouse the Infanta in his name, as soon as the dispensation should come. The King of Spain was a little surprised at the Prince's design. However, as he did not desire the Infanta, his sister should go before spring, he imagined, that, after the espousals, it would be more easy to detain her, than if the Prince of Wales were actually in Spain; and therefore, he readily consented to the Prince's departure.†

The only point, therefore, was, to be assured of the celebration of the marriage, and the King himself desired to be the Prince's proxy, jointly with Prince Edward of Portugal. The proxy was drawn by the

* In pursuance of this declaration, there was a general pardon drawn in as full and ample a manner as the Papists themselves could desire: and two general commands were issued out, one to all judges, justices of peace, &c. and the other to all bishops, chancellors, and commissaries, not to execute any statute against recusants.

† There is a pleasant jest in Coke's reign of King James I. His Majesty, a little after the Prince's departure for Spain, being in one of his pensive moods, Archy, his buffoon, comes in, and tells him, he must change caps with him: why? says the King; why, who (replies Archy) sent the Prince into Spain? But what (answered the King) wilt thou say if the Prince comes back again? Why then (said Archy) I will take my cap from thy head, and send it to the King of Spain; which it is said troubled the King sorely.

King's

King's secretary; and the Prince of Wales, signing it in the presence of several witnesses, left it in the hands of the Earl of Bristol, with orders to deliver it to the King of Spain, ten days after the dispensation should be received. This done, the Duke of Buckingham departed first, under colour of preparing for the Prince's reception on board the English fleet at St. Andero. The court saw him depart without any concern, or rather with a satisfaction equal to his impatience to be in a place of security. After his departure, all imaginable honours were paid to the Prince. The King himself conducted him to the Escurial,* where he received and feasted him as a Prince that was to be very shortly his brother-in-law.

The Prince went away, loaded with honours, caresses, presents, and attended by several Lords of the court, who waited upon him to the fleet. He was no sooner come there, but he dispatched to the Earl of Bristol, Mr. Edward Clarke, one of Buckingham's creatures, with positive orders not to deliver the proxy till security was given him that the Infanta, after the espousals, would not betake herself to a cloister, and to send him word, before the delivery of the proxy, what security was offered, that he might be judge himself, whether it was proper to accept it. This was the first artifice used by the Prince to gain time, in the fear that the dispensation would come, and the marriage be solemnized before the King, his father, was determined to break it. The Earl of Bristol not yet perceiving the intent of the order he had received, was afraid if he should stay to the last, it might be an obstacle to the consummation of the marriage. He thought proper, therefore, to take care before the dispensation should arrive, to know what security the court of Spain would give concerning the Prince's scruple. He received as satisfactory an answer as he could wish, which he conveyed to the King and Prince by a letter.

The Prince and Duke arrived on the 5th of October at Portsmouth, and from thence posted to Royston, where the King was. It seems they durst not immediately discover their design to the King, about the breach of the marriage, but thought fit to take some precautions, to render it less strange to him. The Earl of Bristol's letter coming soon after, the King wrote to him, the 8th of October, that he was satisfied with the security offered by the court of Spain. The Prince, who probably had not yet prepared all his batteries, concealing his design, wrote likewise to the Earl of Bristol the following letter, which no doubt was to be seen by the King his father.

"Your letter to the King and me, concerning that doubt I made after I came from St. Laurence, hath so satisfied us both, that we think it fit no longer to stick upon it, but leave it to your discretion to take what security you shall think fitting."

At length, the dispensation arrived at Madrid the beginning of December. Philip immediately ordered all the necessary preparations for the espousals to be made. But when the marriage was expected to be solemnized, the Earl of Bristol notified to him the King his master's orders, not to deliver the proxy till after Christmas. He easily perceived the King of England's intention, since the proxy would then be invalid. That very day, he sent to the Earl of Bristol to demand no more audience, and gave command that the Infanta should be no longer called the Princess of Wales, as she had been ever since the arrival of the dispensation; and caused all preparations for the marriage to cease. Meanwhile, to cast all the blame on the King of England, he sent the Earl of Bristol, on the 8th of January 1624, a written promise, signed with his own hand, whereby he engaged to cause the Palatinate to be restored to the Elector Palatine. This the Earl of Bristol, in the following reign, affirmed before the Parliament in his defence.

Thus ended the affair of the Spanish marriage, which had wholly employed King James for seven years. During all that time, he most earnestly solicited the conclusion of it, and, to succeed, scrupled not to sacrifice the interests of his son-in-law, his own reputation, the religion he professed, the good of his people, and the laws of his realm. But when, at last, it was just going to be concluded, he suddenly broke it off, for reasons which were never yet clearly known. It can only be ascribed to his weakness for his favourite. The Earl of Clarendon says positively, the King was compelled to it by the Duke of Buckingham, "Who, in breaking the marriage, resumed the same impetuosity, he had indulged to himself in the debate of the journey into Spain." He adds, "The King plainly found the Prince and Duke were resolved upon a breach, with or without his approbation, and that he never forgave the Duke what he had done, but retained as sharp a memory of it as his nature could obtain."†

A. D. 1624.] Meantime, for fear the Earl of Bristol should by some means renew a treaty broken with so little reason, they caused him to be recalled. Since the return of the Prince and Duke, the King no longer ruled, all his affairs were managed by them, and he only executed their counsels. In this situation, the King saw no other remedy, than to surrender himself entirely to them, and do whatever they pleased. Not only the breach of the marriage had been resolved between them, but also a war with Spain; and the King durst not contradict them, notwithstanding his aversion to arms. Their first project, was, to demand for this war a benevolence of every subject: they even made the King sign an order to levy it. Baker says in his Chronicle, he himself paid fifty pounds on this occasion. But on a sudden, the King, by advice of the Prince and Buckingham, gave over this project, and resolved to call a Parliament. That was indeed the most proper way to justify the breach of the treaty with Spain, and to procure money, which he wanted extremely.

The Duke of Buckingham, not being ignorant of the people's aversion to the marriage, the breach whereof was not yet well known, doubted not to gain their affection, by causing a Parliament to be called, and declaring himself the author of this happy breach, so passionately desired by all true Englishmen. To compass his ends, he rendered himself popular, and affected to caress both the church and state puritans: he even consulted with Dr. John Preston, head of the Puritan party, how the King might seize the dean and chapter lands. Nothing could be more proper to procure him the love of the people, most of the clergy having rendered themselves odious, by their zeal in maintaining

*. The Escurial lies about eighteen miles from Madrid. It is reckoned one of the most magnificent structures in Europe. The Spaniards call it the eighth wonder of the world. This mighty fabric was built by Philip II. in the form of a Gridiron (the emblem and instrument of St. Laurence's martyrdom, to whom it is dedicated) the handle whereof, is the King's palace, and the square of the Gridiron is divided into twelve spacious quadrangles, in which are arched cloisters, one above, the other below, all dedicated to religious orders, who live like Princes rather than priests, with each his man and his mule. In the middle of the square stands a magnificent Cathedral, to which Philip IV. added a chapel for the sepulchre of such Kings and Queens as leave issue behind them, who lye in curious coffins of black marble, which are placed in arches round the marble wall. The chapel is built in form of the Pantheon.

† In February this year, a cruel scene was acted at Amboyna in the East Indies, of which this account is given: A treaty was concluded in 1619, between England and the United Provinces, whereby, among other things, it was agreed, that in regard of the great bloodshed and cost, pretended to be bestowed by the Hollanders, in winning the trade of the Isles of the Moluccas, Banda, and Amboyna, from the Spaniards and Portuguese, the Hollanders should enjoy two thirds of that trade, and the English the other third. In pursuance of this agreement, English factories were placed at the Moluccas, and at Banda, and Amboyna. This last isle is the principal place in the East Indies, where nutmegs, mace, cinnamon, cloves, and spice, grow. Here the English had been settled but about two years, when the Dutch, in order to deprive them of their share of the Spice-trade, pretended a plot was formed between the English and the natives, to get possession of the Dutch fort at Amboyna. Whereupon the English were tortured by the Dutch, both with fire and water, in a most cruel and barbarous manner; and, on February 27, Captain Gabriel Towerson, and nine other English, with nine Japanese, and one Portuguese, were ignominiously executed for this pretended conspiracy, though they protested their innocence to the last. For this insolent affront, no reparation was obtained, till the year 1654, when Cromwell made the Dutch pay 300,000*l.* upon that account.

the prerogative royal.* So, the juncture being very favourable, the Duke caused the King to call a Parliament, notwithstanding his resolution never to summon another: such even was his power over the King, that he made him speak to the Parliament in a manner the most repugnant to his opinions and principles.

Meanwhile, the Prince and Duke had contrived another project, namely, the Prince's marriage with Henrietta Maria, the King of France's sister, to which his Majesty readily consented. He was so proud of his grandeur, that he could not think of marrying his son to any but a Princess of royal extraction, and the third daughter of Henry IV. was the only Princess then in Europe of that character. Henry Rich, Baron of Kensington, was, on some pretence, sent to France, in order to sound the court concerning this marriage; and before his departure, he was created Earl of Holland. The Parliament met the 19th of February.† The King, in his speech to both Houses, dropped some hints of his cause of complaint against Spain; and he graciously condescended to ask the advice of Parliament, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of so important an affair as his son's marriage. Buckingham delivered, to a committee of Lords and Commons, a long narrative, which he pretended to be true and complete, of every step taken in the negotiations with Philip: but, partly by the suppression of some facts, partly by the false colouring laid on others, this narrative was calculated entirely to mislead the Parliament, and to throw on the court of Spain the reproach of artifice and insincerity. He said that, after many years' negotiation, the King found himself not any nearer his purpose; and that Bristol had never brought the treaty beyond general professions and declarations: that the Prince, doubting the good intention of Spain, resolved at last to take a journey to Madrid, and put the matter to the utmost trial: that he there found such artificial dealing as made him conclude all the steps taken towards the marriage to be false and deceitful: that the restitution of the Palatinate, which had ever been regarded by the King as an essential preliminary, was not seriously intended by Spain: and that, after enduring much bad usage, the Prince was obliged to return to England, without any hopes, either of obtaining the Infanta, or of restoring the Elector Palatine.

The Duke of Buckingham's speech was received with applause, for several reasons. First, he had made a party in the two Houses. Secondly, he had prevented the consummation of the marriage in Spain, which was very grateful to the nation and Parliament. In the third place, he had brought home the Prince, contrary to all expectation, and so removed the just fears of the English. Finally, the Duke of Buckingham's narrative being attested by the Prince himself, it could not be thought false. As the public was not informed of the secret circumstances of the negotiation, it is no wonder the Parliament should believe what they were told by the King, Prince, and Duke. But afterwards, when all was discovered, people were of another sentiment.

The Parliament was extremely pleased to see the King disposed to break the Spanish match, not knowing, or feigning not to know, it was really broken, by the affront put upon the King of Spain. So, forgetting all former occasions of discontent, and applying themselves wholly to the affair proposed by the King; they jointly presented an address to his Majesty, to advise him to discontinue the treaty, begun with Spain, as well for the restitution of the Palatinate as for the marriage.

His Majesty, in consequence, came to the Parliament, and made a speech to show he could not break off the treaties, without knowing how to maintain the war which would unavoidably follow, since the Palatinate was to be recovered by arms. He told them of his intolerable debts, chiefly contracted by the sums remitted to the Palatinate; but he added, that he did not insist on any supply for his own relief, and that it was sufficient for him, if the honour and security of the people were provided for. He declared therefore, if they thought proper to engage in a war with Spain, he would readily consent that the supply to be granted should be managed by commissioners appointed by the Parliament. Moreover, he promised the two Houses, he would not make a peace without their advice. He concluded with saying: "I am so desirous to forget all rents in former Parliaments, that it shall not be my default, if I am not in love with Parliaments, and call them often, and desire to end my life in that intercourse between me and my people, for the making of good laws, reforming of such abuses as I cannot be well informed of but in Parliament, and maintaining the good government of the common-wealth."

How different is this speech from those the King made to the former Parliaments! But the King's thoughts are not so visible in these expressions as the Duke of Buckingham's policy, who, after breaking the Prince's marriage, had a mind to push his point, and proclaim war with Spain.

Some days after, the Commons presented an address to the King, offering to grant him three entire subsidies, and three fifteenths, upon his public declaration for dissolving the treaties of the marriage and the Palatinate.‡ But they took him at his word, concerning his offer that the money should be disposed of by commissioners of their own chusing. The King thanked them for their affectionate expressions, and told them, he was resolved for the future solely to confide in his Parliament. After which, he dispatched a messenger to the court of Spain, with his last resolution to break off the treaty.

This session an address was made, very disagreeable to the King, craving the severe execution of the laws against Catholics. His answer was gracious and condescending; though he declared against persecution, as being an improper measure for the suppression of any religion, according to the received maxim, "That the blood of martyrs was the seed of the church." He also condemned an entire indulgence of the Catholics; and seemed to represent a middle course as the most humane, and most politic. He went so far as even to affirm, with an oath, that he never had entertained any thoughts of granting a toleration to these religionists. The liberty of exercising their worship in private houses, which he had secretly agreed to in the Spanish treaty, did not appear to him deserving that name; and it was probably by means of this explication, he thought that he had saved his honour. And as Buckingham, in his narrative, confessed that the King had agreed to a temporary suspension of the penal laws against the Catholics, which he distinguished from a toleration (a term at that time extremely odious) James naturally deemed his meaning to be sufficiently explained, and feared not any reproach of falsehood or duplicity, on account of this asseveration.

* The Duke of Buckingham proposed also the selling of the remainder of the crown-lands, but this project was strenuously opposed by the Lord Keeper Williams, and accordingly laid aside.

† The Parliament was to meet the 12th of February, but the King that morning missing Lodowick Stewart, Duke of Richmond, and sending in haste for him, his Duchess went to his bed-side to awake him, and, drawing the curtain, found him dead in his bed. Upon news whereof the King would not adorn himself that day, and put off the Parliament till the 16th, and afterwards till the 19th.

‡ Subsidies and fifteenths are frequently mentioned by historians; but neither the amount of these taxes nor the method of levying them has been well explained. It appears that the fifteenth formerly corresponded to the name, and was that proportionable part of the moveables. But a valuation having been made in the reign of Edward III. that valuation was always adhered to, and each town paid unalterably a particular sum, which the inhabitants themselves assessed upon their fellow-citizens. The same tax in corporate towns was called a tenth; because, there at first it was a tenth of the moveables. The whole amount of a tenth and fifteenth throughout the kingdom, or a fifteenth as it was often more concisely called, was about 29,000*l.* The amount of a subsidy was not invariable, like that of a fifteenth. In the 8th of Elizabeth, a subsidy amounted to 120,000*l.* in the 40th, it was not above 78,000*l.* It afterwards fell to 70,000*l.* and was continually decreasing. The reason is easily collected from the method of levying it. We may learn from the subsidy-bills, that one subsidy was given for four shillings in the pound on land, and two shillings and eight-pence on moveables throughout the counties; a considerable tax, had it been strictly levied. But this was only the ancient state of a subsidy. During the reign of James, there was not paid the twentieth part of that sum. The tax was so far personal that a man paid only in the county where he lived, though he should possess estates in other counties; and the assessor formed a loose estimation of his property, and rated him accordingly.

While the attachment of the Prince to Buckingham, while the timidity of James, or the shame of changing his favourite, kept the whole court in awe; the Spanish ambassador, Inoiosa, endeavoured to open the King's eyes, and to cure his fears by instilling greater fears into him. He privately slipped into his hand a paper, and gave him a signal to read it alone. He there told him, that he was as much a prisoner at London as ever Francis I. was at Madrid; that the Prince and Buckingham had conspired together, and had the whole court at their devotion; and that cabals among the popular leaders in Parliament were carrying on to the extreme prejudice of his authority; that the project was to confine him to some of his hunting seats, and to commit the whole administration to Charles; and that it was necessary for him, by one vigorous effort, to vindicate his authority, and to punish those who had so long and so much abused his friendship and beneficence. What credit James gave to this representation does not appear. He only discovered some faint symptoms, which he instantly retracted, of dissatisfaction with Buckingham. All his public measures, and all the alliances into which he entered, were founded on the system of enmity to the Austrian family, and of war to be carried on for the recovery of the Palatinate.

Before the Parliament broke up, the King received a fresh mortification from the Prince and Duke. Whilst they were in Spain, Lionel Cranfield, Lord Treasurer, lately created Earl of Middlesex, having the courage to refuse them sometimes the exorbitant sums they demanded, they resolved to ruin him at their return. They made use for that purpose of their credit with the Parliament, and caused him to be accused by their creatures, of mismanagement in the discharge of his office. The King, knowing this came from them, desired them for God's sake, to use their interest with the two Houses to drop the impeachment: but they remained inflexible and unmoved at all the King's entreaties. So the Lord Treasurer was condemned in a fine of fifty thousand pounds, and declared incapable of ever sitting in the House of Peers.

The King saw no remedy but in the Earl of Bristol's counsels, whose return he impatiently expected. And yet, no sooner was this Lord arrived in England, but the King was constrained to send him express orders at Dover, not to come to court, but remain at his own house till he had answered certain questions, which should be put to him by some of the council. The Parliament being prorogued shortly after, the Earl frequently wrote to the King, to desire he might be examined. The King wished it; but it was not the Prince's or Buckingham's interest, who still found fresh excuses to defer the examination. The Earl was however examined at last, after much solicitation, and returned such answers, that his examiners could not help declaring, his conduct was unblamable. But this could not procure him his liberty or admittance into the King's presence. Some time after, the Duke sent him word, he was much mistaken, if he imagined his answers were satisfactory to the King, the Prince, or to him, the Duke; but his only way to come into favour again, was to make the confession he had sent him. The Earl refused it, and the King told Buckingham, it was horrible tyranny to make an innocent person confess faults of which he was not guilty. Notwithstanding all this, it was not in his power to speak with the Earl, because the Prince and Duke did not think it proper.

After all these transactions, the Parliament was prorogued by the King,* who let fall some hints, though in gentle terms, of the sense which he entertained of their unkindness, in not supplying his necessities. The aid which had been granted, however, was very considerable. It was computed that with this money he might send twenty-five thousand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an English general. But the court had already taken other measures. Six thousand men only were therefore sent into Holland, to serve in the army of the States, under the command of the Prince of Orange, and other troops were levied for Count Mansfeldt, who was, during the winter, to open himself a passage into the Palatinate.

Meanwhile, the Earl of Holland, who had been dispatched into France, having sent word that Lewis XIII. was inclined to listen to the overture of a marriage between the Prince of Wales and his sister the Princess Henrietta Maria, the King appointed James Hay, Earl of Carlisle, to go and negotiate the affair jointly with him. The two ambassadors repairing to Compeigne, where the court of France was, commissioners were nominated to treat with them, of whom the Marquis de la Vieuville, superintendant of the finances, was the first. The conferences began a few days after the prorogation of the Parliament, when the King, according to his promise, was putting the laws in execution against Popish recusants, particularly against friars and priests, some of whom were thrown into prison.

This severity caused the Catholics to complain, who expected a very different treatment a few months before. They could not forbear complaining, that, whereas the negotiation of the Spanish match had procured them great ease, this with France seemed on the contrary to serve only to increase their miseries. Several wrote to France in that strain, intimating they had nothing to trust to but the piety, zeal, and protection of Lewis. Among others, a Scotch Franciscan wrote upon this subject to Hugo, Archbishop of Ambrun, who had been general of the order, and to whom he was known. The Archbishop showed the letter to the King, and aggravated the sufferings of the English Catholics, who expected relief only from his intercession. The King of France had already done his utmost to pacify the English Catholics, assuring them by Tilliers, his ambassador at London, that he would not forget them. But their repeated complaints obliged him at length to take some step in their favour, and the rather, as he was afraid they would obstruct the Pope's dispensation, which would soon be wanted. He resolved therefore, to send to James a secret agent to intercede for the Catholics, and chose for that purpose the Archbishop of Ambrun, who came to London in disguise, and passed for a counsellor of the Parliament of Grenoble. At his arrival, he waited upon Buckingham, who seemed much inclined to countenance his negotiation. The Countess of Buckingham, the Duke's mother, the Earl of Rutland, and some other Catholics, did the Archbishop great services, and acquainted him with many things, necessary to be known, in order to succeed in his designs. The King, being informed that the Archbishop desired to speak with him, sent for him to Royston, where he then was, confined to his bed with the gout. The Archbishop's first conference with the King, was followed by the release of several Popish recusants, imprisoned since the Parliament's petition. Moreover, the King gave the Archbishop leave to administer confirmation in the French ambassador's house, to all that should apply for it. This was done in so public a manner, that not only the house, but the street itself, was crowded with people. If the Archbishop's own narrative may be credited, he confirmed above ten thousand persons. However this be, the number must have been great, since the magistrates of London complained of it to the King, who owned it was done with his leave.

From that time, the King had several conferences with this prelate, and, one day, as he was expressing his earnest desire to live in strict union with the King of France, the Archbishop took occasion to tell him, that one of the best means to that end, was to grant a full toleration to the Catholics. Whereupon, the King, squeezing him by the hand, said these words to him: "I perceive you are the man sent me from God, to whom I may freely open my mind." Adding, "He had always a good opinion of the Catholic religion, and he had often been in danger of assassination during his minority: he intended to grant a full toleration to the Catholics; and in order to succeed, meant to cause an assembly of divines, as well foreign as English, to be held, and therein to be decided, that it was necessary to grant an universal liberty of conscience: and he had already cast his eyes on the English divines to be sent thither: if the assembly could not be held at Dover, he would agree it should be at Boulogne, as soon as his son's marriage secured him the assistance of France: he thought proper that the Archbishop should return to France, under colour of waiting on the Princess, and he would send him two letters under his own hand, one for the Pope, the other for the King of France, wherein his project should be more fully explained: he would also give him a memorial on the same subject, that, being armed with these two papers, he might go and negotiate at Rome with the Pope, for whom he had a very great respect, being obliged to him for a copy of verses he had formerly, when Cardinal, made upon the Queen his mother and the house of Stuart." At the same time, he showed the verses to the Archbishop, and then said, "If he returned from Rome, with the Pope's approbation concerning the assembly, it should be immediately held, and he did not question, it would be very advantageous to the Catholic religion. In the mean time, he intended to negotiate with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and endeavour to gain some of the chief Puritan Lords in England and Scotland."

* On May 29, to November 2.

On supposition of the truth of this extract from the Archbishop of Ambrun's narrative, at the end of Deageant's Memoirs, all that can be inferred from it, is, that James had formed a chimerical project of a mutual toleration throughout Christendom, and thought himself qualified to effect it, with the assistance of France.

Whilst the Archbishop of Ambrun was in England, the negotiation of the marriage was continued in France, between the English ambassadors and the French commissioners. The English proposed at first the continuation of the treaty, formerly begun for Prince Henry's marriage with the Princess Christina, who espoused the Duke of Savoy. But this motion was rejected by the French commissioners; first, because that negotiation was properly but just set on foot: secondly, because France would not be contented with less than was offered by the King of England, for the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta of Spain. So, the French commissioners demanded in their turn that the articles concerning religion, granted to Spain, should serve for foundation to the present treaty. The ambassadors expected this demand, and by their private instructions knew how to proceed; but pretended, they could not grant what was demanded, without fresh orders. At last, after some solicitation, they offered the articles agreed upon with Spain, except four, namely: Liberty of Conscience to the Catholics: a Church in London: the Education of the Children by the Queen till ten years old: a Bishop with ecclesiastical authority over the Princess's family. These four articles were much debated, and at length, the ambassadors yielded the two last. But for the two first, they said, they could not absolutely grant them, because of the King's solemn promise to the Parliament. This reason appeared so strong to the French commissioners, that they thought it fruitless to insist any more upon these two articles. The portion was settled without much trouble. The King of France offered eight hundred thousand crowns, on condition the Prince assigned a jointure of sixty thousand crowns a year; which offer, with the condition, was accepted. In all appearance, this affair was to be ended in a very short time. Some objections of the Pope, however, and the Marquis de la Vieuville's disgrace, which happened at this time, occasioned considerable delay; but, at length, the treaty was signed at Paris the 10th of November.*

When the Earl of Carlisle was sent to France to hasten the treaty of marriage, he had orders to propose to that court a league against the house of Austria. This was the Prince's and Buckingham's grand aim. There was then a dispute about the Valteline, between the Kings of France and Spain, which made the court of England imagine Lewis would readily listen to such a proposal. And indeed he did so: but it was only to frighten the Pope and the Spaniard, and not with design to conclude the league. The Duke of Bavaria had friends in the French court, who caused him to be much more regarded than the Elector Palatine, expelled his dominions, and sheltered in Holland. So, Lewis's ministers told the English ambassadors, that the league and marriage were two distinct affairs, which could not be negotiated together: but after the conclusion of the marriage, the league should be treated of. By this answer, they kept the English in hope, and the Spaniards in fear. On the other hand, the Count of Mansfeldt stayed at or near Paris, and the Spaniards knew he had frequent conferences with the ministers.

Some time after, Mansfeldt came to England, where he was received with extraordinary caresses, and lodged by the Prince in his palace at St. James's. Here, after some conferences, he agreed with the King, the Prince, and the Duke, that he should have twelve thousand men, to carry the war into the Lower Palatinate. This project being formed, the King pressed the court of France with respect to the league: but his proposal was artfully evaded on divers pretences, though without an absolute denial. He was forced therefore to be contented, till the league was concluded, with demanding of the French King, a passage through his dominions for Mansfeldt's army. Lewis, in general or ambiguous terms, made him hope, not only that he would grant a passage, but also strengthen this army with a body of his own troops. The event showed, he meant after the conclusion of the league, whereas the English took it for a positive promise, whether the league should be concluded or not. Pursuant to this project, the forces to be commanded by Mansfeldt were levied in England.

Whilst this army was preparing to march, James caused a memorial to be presented to the Infanta Isabella, demanding the city of Frankendal, which she held in sequestration, and, by the treaty of London, was to keep but till the end of the truce, which was to expire the 26th of October. Moreover, he demanded, in the same memorial, a free passage for the garrison he was to send to Frankendal, not only through the Infanta's, and his Catholic Majesty's dominions, but also through the territories of their friends and allies. The Infanta answered, she would order the governor of Frankendal to surrender the place on the day appointed, to such as should produce a power from the King of England: that she would grant a passage through her own, and the King of Spain's dominions, to the fifteen hundred foot, and two hundred horse, which, according to the treaty of London, were to take possession of Frankendal; and, in general, would punctually execute the treaty. But as to the King's further demand, to procure him a passage for his troops through the empire, she declared,

* As Prince Charles, during his abode in Spain, had given a verbal promise to allow the Infanta the education of her children till the age of thirteen, this article was here inserted in the treaty; and to that imprudence is generally imputed the subsequent distressed condition of his posterity. The court of England, however, it must be confessed, always pretended, even in their memorials to the French court, that all the favourable conditions granted to the Catholics, were inserted in the marriage treaty merely to please the Pope, and that their strict execution was, by an agreement with France, secretly, dispensed with. It is certain that the young Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. had Protestant governors from his early infancy; first the Earl of Newcastle, then the Marquis of Hertford. The King, in his memorial to foreign churches, after the commencement of the civil wars, insists on his care in educating his children in the Protestant religion, as a proof that he was no-wise inclined to the Catholic. It can scarcely, therefore, be questioned, but this article, which had so odd an appearance, was inserted only to amuse the Pope, and was never intended by either party to be executed.

clared, it was not in her power, neither was she obliged to it. Thus, the court of England found by experience their error, in not inserting in the treaty of London, what they were afterwards forced to demand, and what the Infanta might justly deny. It is very true, in withdrawing the English garrison from Frankendal, James met with no obstacle; but he could not expect the same thing when he should come to send them back. Some say, that on the 25th of October, the governor of Frankendal marched out of the city with his garrison but, finding none of the King of England's forces ready to take possession, instantly re-entered.

This was not the only error of the court of England. The twelve thousand men to be conducted by Mansfeldt to the Palatinate, were embarked in December, in extremely cold weather, without the least doubt of their passage through France. Nevertheless, when the army came before Calais, the French would not suffer them to land. The King of France constantly asserted, he had never positively promised to grant these troops a passage. However this be, the army suffering greatly on board the ships, where the soldiers were closely pent up, Mansfeldt was forced to sail for Zealand, where he met with the same difficulties. The Zealanders said, they had not provisions for such a number of troops, having had no notice of their coming. Much time was employed in negotiating. Messengers were sent to the Hague, and afterwards to London. In the meanwhile, the pestilence raging among the soldiers, above two thirds perished before they were suffered to land. Most of those that escaped, either deserted, or enlisted among the six thousand English which were in the service of the States. Thus, by the court's wrong measures, this army became useless, and the money spent in raising it was lost.

It was February 1625, before Pope Urban's dispensation arrived. When it came to Paris, two new conditions, not mentioned in the treaty, were seen in it with surprise, namely,

I. That the domestics of the children, born of this marriage, should be Catholics.

II. That the Princess should appoint them.

The Pope absolutely required the King of England, and the Prince to swear to these two articles, otherwise the dispensation was invalid. The court of France, therefore, was under a fresh concern, fearing King James would reject these by new conditions. But he was far from breaking for such a trifle. He accepted them without being much importuned, and only refused to swear again, saying, his word was sufficient. Notwithstanding this, a new dispensation was to be solicited, which was some months in coming, and in this interval, died King James, without having the pleasure of seeing the marriage consummated.

About the middle of March he was seized with a tertian ague, of which he had some fits. But though commonly such agues are not dangerous in the spring, this brought him to his grave. He died at Theobalds, the 27th of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of two-and-twenty years in England.

His death, happening suddenly, and unexpectedly, caused many suspicions, which fell on the Duke of Buckingham. When one of the King's fits was going off, the Duke caused certain plaisters to be applied to his side and wrists, and gave him twice with his own hands a medicine to drink, in the absence of the physicians. He would even have given it a third time, but could not persuade him to take it. The King, finding himself much worse, sent for the physicians, who said positively, they would not prescribe, if the plaisters were not immediately removed. However, the King died within a few days. The Duke was afterwards impeached by the Commons, not directly for poisoning the King, but for daring to apply remedies without the advice of his physicians.*

James left only a son and a daughter. His daughter was married to a Prince who had now lost his dominions, and was fled for refuge to Reenen, in the province of Utrecht, where he kept his little court very poorly. King James, who was so liberal, is accused of having but moderately contributed to the maintenance of this disconsolate family.

James I. had for historians, men much prepossessed in his favour, or extremely prejudiced against him. This naturally followed from the divisions to which he himself had given birth. Some represent him as a perfect pattern of a good King: others blacken his reputation as much as possible, by aggravating his failings. The reason of this diversity proceeds from the history of his reign, being penned at a time when the animosity of the two parties was at the height, whence both have happened to leave in their writings evident marks of their passion. Therefore the character of this Prince must not be formed, either upon the praises of the one, or the invectives of the other, but upon his manner of governing, upon his speeches and actions. This might be done by recollecting the principal circumstances of his reign.

The principal ingredient in King James's panegyric is the constant peace he caused his subjects to enjoy. This cannot be said to be the effect of chance, since it clearly appears to have been his sole, or, at least, chief aim in his administration. Nothing, say his friends, is more noble, or more worthy a great King, than such a design. But this design loses all its merit, if the Prince is discovered, by his conduct, to preserve peace only out of fear, supineness, excessive love of ease and repose; and King James's whole behaviour shows he acted by these motives, though he coloured it with the pretence of affection for his people.

If some take care to extol his knowledge in philosophy, divinity, history, polite learning, others affirm, it was but real pedantry, and that from all his acquired knowledge he learnt only to talk very impertinently on every subject, instead of framing solid and sure rules for the government of his dominions.

His liberality, which some praise, is exclaimed against by others as prodigality. These pretend, he gave without measure and discretion, without any regard to his own wants, or the merits of those on whom he heaped his favours.

The same contrariety occurs between King James's historians with respect to his capacity. Some call him, for his wisdom, the Solomon of the age. Others endeavour to display all his errors, particularly in the two sole important affairs of his reign, wherein he came off very ill, namely, the Prince his son's marriage, and his son-in-law's election to the kingdom of Bohemia.

Some extol him for maintaining the prerogative royal in its full lustre, in spite of the efforts of those who were continually attacking it. Others pretend he had conceived very wrong ideas of the English constitution, and by aiming to carry the regal authority too high, and instilling the same principles into his successor, he was the first cause of his family's ruin.

As to his manners, writers are no less divided. Some describe him as a very wise and virtuous Prince, whilst others speak of him as a Prince of a dissolute life, given to drinking, and swearing in common conversation, especially when he was in a passion. He is likewise reproached for dissolving the Earl of Essex's marriage, pardoning the Earl and Countess of Somerset, for the death of Sir Walter Raleigh, and for confidently calling God to witness, in full Parliament, that he never had any thoughts of granting the Papists a toleration,

* Wilson says, one of Buckingham's chief motives was thought to be his fear the King would set up Bristol, his deadly enemy, against him, to pull him down. And if what Burnet says be true, he had reason likewise to fear the King's old favourite Somerset. He says, the King, being resolved to bring the Earl of Somerset into favour again, met him in the night in the gardens at Theobalds: two bed chamber men were only in the secret: the King embraced him tenderly, and with many tears: the Earl of Somerset believed the secret was not well kept, for, soon after, the King was taken ill with an ague, and died at Theobalds. Burnet says, he had this from some who were told it by the Earl himself. Dr. Craig, the King's physician, was disgraced, for saying, he believed the King was poisoned.

which he could not affirm but by means of some mental reservation.

In fine, whilst some praise his moderation and equity to the Catholics, others pretend to demonstrate he was a Papist in his heart, and only professed the Protestant religion out of fear of what might follow, in case he openly declared for the Catholic. If some say, in proof of his being a good Protestant, that he made constant profession of the established religion, persevered in it to his death, and, when dying, charged the Prince his son to protect the church and clergy; others answer, this is far from a demonstration. They pretend, the point is not to know what he would appear to be, but what he was in reality, and that his actions belied his outward profession: that the same thing had happened to him in Scotland, where, till the age of thirty-six years, he had professed a religion which he mortally hated, as plainly appeared afterwards.* That when he came to England, he declared himself openly the protector of the Papists: took their part on all occasions: promoted them to honours, dignities, and public offices: that in his reign the laws against them were never duly executed, of which he boasted to the Catholic Princes in his apology concerning the oath of allegiance: that in all his speeches, whether in the Parliament or the star-chamber, his constant aim was to move his subjects to consent to a full toleration for the Catholics; but not finding the Parliament inclined as he wished, he granted, by his sole authority, a toleration in effect, by hindering the execution of the laws, and discharging the condemned recusants from fines, and other penalties: that in his conventions with Spain and France, he positively promised to cause no more laws to be enacted against the Papists, and those already in force not to be executed: that on all occasions, he affected to show he found nothing amiss in the Romish religion, but the Pope's exorbitant power over Princes: that by giving the Pope the titles of Holy Father, his Holiness, and by consenting that his son's children should be educated in the Romish religion till the age of thirteen years, he plainly discovered he should not be sorry for their continuance in that religion: lastly, his engagement with the Archbishop of Ambrun is a fresh and manifest proof of his being a true Papist. To this the others reply, it is not possible to conceive, that if King James had been a Papist in his heart, he would have spent a considerable part of his time in writing books against the Popish religion, and combating the arguments of Bellarmine and Du Perron.†

Probably King James was truly neither a sound Protestant, nor a good Catholic. He seems never to have had much at heart the interest of the Protestant religion; and on the other hand, it cannot be denied, he made public and constant profession of the same to his dying day. Perhaps he had formed a scheme of religion different from that of others, according to which he counted of no moment, what the Protestants and Catholics looked upon as essential. He believed, probably, that every religion was good, provided it taught obedience to sovereigns, and preserved the hierarchy, which he considered as a fundamental article. It is therefore no wonder, that, agreeably to this scheme, he should refuse to enter into the measures of the English Protestants, to hinder the growth of the Romish religion in England, or not scruple to continue in the religion he professed, since, according to his notions, the two religions were equally good, provided the Pope's despotic power was abolished.

But, whatever may be said for and against King James's person, it is certain, England never flourished less than in his reign, and the English saw themselves exposed to the insults and railleries of other nations, whilst the blame was generally cast on the King. The following epigram, made in France in his time, is a clear evidence in what esteem he was with his neighbours:

Tandis qu' Elizabeth fut Roy,
L'Anglois fut d' Espagne l' effroy.
Maintenant, devise et caquette,
Régi par la Reine Jaquette.

That is literally in English.

Whilst Elizabeth was King,
The English were of Spain the terror.
But now, governed by Queen Jaquet,
They only talk and prattle.‡

By

* Of King James's dissimulation in point of religion, there is a clear evidence in a speech of his to the kirk of Scotland, which he is said to speak standing, with his bonnet off, and his hands lifted up to heaven, wherein, among other things, "He blessed God that had honoured him to be King over such a Kirk, the sincerest Kirk in the world. The church of Geneva, what are they? They keep Pasche and Yule, (i. e. Easter and Christmas.) What authority have they in God's word, and where is their institution? As for our neighbour church in England, their service is an evil mass, said in English; they want nothing of the mass but the liftings, &c."

† As to this King's person, though his father and mother were esteemed the handsomest couple of the age they lived in, he was himself but homely, nor in any of his features was to be found the least resemblance of the beautiful Mary Stuart, or Lord Darnley.

‡ Some miscellaneous remarks will here, no doubt, be acceptable. The amount of the King's revenue, as it stood in 1617, is thus stated: of crown lands, 80,000*l.* a year; by customs and new impositions, nearly 190,000*l*; by wards, and other various branches of revenue, besides purveyance, 180,000*l.* The whole amounting to 450,000*l.* The King's ordinary disbursements, by the same account, are said to exceed this sum by 36,000*l.* All extraordinary sums which James had raised by subsidies, loans, sale of lands, sale of the title of baronet, money paid by the States and by the King of France, benevolences, &c. were in the whole about 2,200,000*l.* of which the sale of land afforded 775,000*l.* The extraordinary disbursements of the King amounted to 2,000,000*l.* besides above 400,000*l.* given in presents. Upon the whole, a sufficient reason appears, partly from necessary expences, partly for want of a rigid œconomy, why the King, even early in his reign, was deeply involved in debt, and found great difficulty to support the government.

The extraordinary supplies granted by Parliament during this whole reign amounted not to more than 630,000*l.* which, divided among 21 years, makes 30,000*l.* a year. This does not include those supplies, amounting to 300,000*l.* which were given to the King by his last Parliament.

The customs were supposed to amount to 5 per cent ad valorem, and were levied upon exports as well as imports. On the former in some instances, they were as high as 25 per cent. The customs in 1604 yielded 127,000*l.* a year: they arose to 190,000*l.* towards the end of the reign.

Interest, during this reign, was at 10 per cent. till 1624, when it was reduced to 8. This high interest is an indication of the great profits and small progress of commerce.

The price of corn during this reign was very high. Whenever wheat fell below 32s. a quarter, rye below 18s. barley below 16s. commissioners were empowered to purchase corn for the magazines. The usual bread of the poor was made of barley. Prince Henry, by contract with his butcher, paid nearly four-pence a pound, throughout the year, for all the beef and mutton used in his family.—The best wool, during the greater part of King James's reign, was at 33s. a tod.—At the commencement of the succeeding reign, a turkey-cock cost 4s. 6d. a turkey-hen 3s. a pheasant-cock 6s. a pheasant-hen 5s. a partridge 1s. a goose 2s. a capon 2s. 6d. a pullet 1s. 6d. a rabbit 8d. a dozen of pidgeons 6s. The contractors for victualling the navy were allowed 8d. a day for the diet of each man when in harbour, and 7½d. when at sea.

James was not negligent of the navy. In five years preceding 1623, he built ten new ships, and expended 50,000*l.* a year on the fleet, besides the value of 36,000*l.* in timber, which he annually gave from the royal forests. The largest ship that had ever come from the English docks was built during this reign. She was only 1,400 tons, and carried 64 guns. The merchant ships, in cases of necessity, were instantly converted into ships of war. The King affirmed to the Parliament, that the navy had never before been in so good a condition.

Nothing renders the reign of James more memorable than the commencement of the English colonies in America. The reasoners of that age raised many objections to the planting of those remote colonies; and foretold that after draining the mother-country of inhabitants, they would soon shake off the yoke, and erect an independent government in America. This prediction has, in part, been fulfilled.—Greenland was also discovered about this period; and the whale fishery was carried on with success.

London at this time was built almost entirely of wood, and was, in every respect, a very ugly city. The Earl of Arundel introduced the general practice of brick building.—For some time, from the year 1600, the population of the city doubled itself every 40 years.

Lotteries were first introduced in this reign. The first sedan-chair was used by the Duke of Buckingham.

The English writers of this age have been justly considered as possessing more genius than taste. Their distorted conceptions and expressions are accompanied with such vigour of mind, that we admire the imagination which produced them, as much as we blame the want of judgment which gave them admittance. Generally speaking, the poetry of the English was rude and imperfect; yet Fairfax translated Tasso with ease, elegance, and correctness. Harrington's transla-

By an indenture of the 2d of James I. a pound weight of gold, of twenty-two carats fine, and two carats allay, was coined into 37*l.* 4*s.* by tale; namely, into unites going for 20*s.* double crowns at 10*s.* British crowns at 5*s.* thistle crowns at 4*s.* and half-crowns at 2*s.* 6*d.* a-piece: and a pound weight of silver, of the said old standard, into 62*s.* by tale; namely, into shillings, six-pences, two-pences, pence, half-pence, crowns, and half-crowns.——In the 3d year of this reign, a pound weight of gold of the old standard, of twenty-three carats, three grains and a half fine, was coined into 40*l.* 10*s.* by tale; namely, into rose-rials at 30*s.* a-piece, spur-rials at 15*s.* and angels at 10*s.* a-piece. ——In the 9th, there was a proclamation for raising gold 2*s.* in every 20*s.*——In the 10th, a pound weight of the old standard gold was coined into 44*l.* by tale; namely, rose-rials, spur-rials, and angels; and a pound weight of gold of twenty-two carats fine, was coined into 40*l.* 18*s.* and 4*d.* namely, into unites at 22*s.* double crowns at 11*s.* British crowns at 5*s.* 6*d.* thistle crowns at 4*s.* 4*d.* three farthings, and half British crowns at 2*s.* 9*d.* a-piece.

The gold coins of this King (as appears from the indentures below) are rose-rials, and spur-rials, angels, unites, crowns, and half-crowns, of several denominations. The rose-rial has, on one side, the King upon his throne, in his robes, with crown, sceptre, and ball, at his feet a portcullis, IACOBVS. D. G. MAG. BRIT. FRAN. ET. HIBER. REX. Reverse, the rose and arms, which are quarterly, France and England in the first and fourth quarters; second, the lion within the double tressure fleury, for Scotland; third, the harp for Ireland, A. DNO. FACTVM. EST. ISTUD. ET. EST. MIRAB. IN. OCV. NRIS. The unite has on one side the King's figure, IACOBVS. DEI. GRA. MAG. BRIT. FRAN. ET. HIBER. REX. Reverse, FACIAM. EOS. IN. GENTEM VNAM. Of these unites there are several sorts, as may be seen in Nummi Britannorum. One in particular has the King's busto laureaton one side, and XX. behind the head, ascarf across the shoulder, inscriptions and arms, as in the former unites, HENRIC. ROSAS. REGNA. IACOBVS. There is a half, with X. behind the head, and a quarter with V. The crowns have on the reverse the arms; and HENRICI. ROSAS. REGNA. IACOBVS. The thistle crown has, on one side, a rose crowned, and IA. D. GRA. MAG. BR. FR. ET. HIBER. REX. On the other side a thistle flower crowned, TVEATVR. VNITA. DEVS. (fig. 1.) The half-crowns have, on one side, the King's figure, and IA. D. G. ROSA. SINE. SPINA. Reverse the arms, and TVEATVR. &c.——The silver coins of this King are crowns, half-crowns, shillings, six-pences, two-pences, pence, and half-pence. The crown represents the King on horse-back, in armour, and crowned, holding a sword in his hand; the rose and crown upon the trappings of the horse. IACOBVS. D. G. ANG. SCO. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. Reverse, the arms, EXVRGAT. DEVS. DISSIPENTVR. INIMICI. Another crown is inscribed, IACOBVS. D. G. ANG. SCO. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. Reverse, the arms, QVÆ. DEVS. CONIVNXIT. NEMO. SEPARET. The shillings have XII. (fig. 2.) and the six-pences VI. behind the King's head crowned. (fig. 4.) Reverse, the arms fill up the whole area. The Irish moneys, are in all respects like the English, only they have a harp crowned on the reverse. (fig. 3.) The copper money of Ireland has two sceptres through the crown.

tion of Ariosto, also possesses great merit. Jonson, the great contemporary of the greater Shakespeare, had a pension of 100 marks from James, which Charles afterwards augmented to 100*l.*—In prose, Bacon must be regarded as the great luminary of the age; yet his style is cold and stiff; his wit, though frequently brilliant, is often unnatural and far-fetched; and he seems to have been the original parent of those pointed similes and long-spun allegories which so much distinguish English writers prior to the times of Addison and Johnson. Raleigh's writings form a respectable model of ancient style; and Camden's history of Elizabeth may be esteemed good composition, both for manner and matter. The King himself is yet to be noticed. That James was but a middling writer must be allowed: that he was a contemptible one, can by no means be admitted. Whoever will read his Basilicon Doron, particularly the two last books, the true law of free monarchies, his answer to Cardinal Perron, and almost all his speeches and messages to Parliament, will confess him to have possessed no small share of learning. He wrote concerning witches and apparitions; but many people in that age did admit the reality of these fictitious beings: he composed a commentary on the Revelation, and thought he had proved the Pope to be antichrist: but may not a similar reproach be extended to the famous Napier; and even to Newton, at a time when learning was much more advanced than during the reign of James I.? From the grossness of its superstitions we may infer the ignorance of an age; but never should pronounce decidedly on the folly of an individual from his following popular errors, consecrated by the appearance of religion.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

CHARLES THE FIRST.

BORN 1600.—DIED 1648.

BOOK XIX.

COMPRISING THE FIRST FIFTEEN YEARS OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES I.

25. CHARLES I.

A. D. 1625.] CHARLES I. son and successor of James I. was tinctured from his infancy with the principles concerning the regal authority, and prerogative royal, which had been so much insisted on by the deceased King. He had the same favourite, the same council, the same ministers; and all the places at court, and in the kingdom, continued in the hands of the Duke of Buckingham's creatures. Charles's journey to Spain had so endeared the Duke of Buckingham to him, that King James's affection for that favourite was nothing, in comparison of the new King's.

Charles I. on his accession, formed two projects equally difficult to be executed. The first was, to wrest from the Emperor, and the Duke of Bavaria, both the Palatinates which had been taken from his brother-in-law, the Elector Palatine. The second, to carry the regal authority much higher than the King his father, or any of his predecessors, had done. These two projects, which separately would, in all appearance, have met with great obstacles, became almost impracticable when joined. Nevertheless, Charles believed they mutually supported each other: that under colour of the Palatinate war, he should put the Parliament upon a footing not to refuse him any thing: that in time, he should have both Houses at command, and after rendering himself independent, dispose as he pleased of the riches of the kingdom, in executing his designs in favour of the King of Bohemia.

As soon as the deceased King's funeral was solemnised,* Charles speedily sent eight thousand men to Plymouth, to be embarked for an expedition to Spain. As he had but little money in his coffers, the charge of coat and conduct was ordered to be disbursed by the country, and the country to be repaid out of the Exchequer at a more convenient season. The troops having committed great disorders in their march, the King granted a commission for martial law, to punish the offenders. This was looked upon as an innovation, which took from the usual judges the cognizance of crimes committed by the soldiery.

The King's marriage having been concluded in his father's life-time, was solemnised at Paris with great magnificence, on a theatre erected before the church of Notre-Dame, the Duke of Chevreuse performing the office of proxy for the King of England. Presently after, the Duke of Buckingham was sent into France to conduct the Queen to the King her spouse. She arrived June 12, at Dover, where the King met her, and the marriage was consummated at Canterbury. The 16th of the same month the King and Queen made their entry into London, and, two days after, the Parliament met. The King affirmed in his speech, that no Prince was ever more desirous to maintain the religion he professed.† The Parliament, however, does not seem to have fully believed this, since, at the very first, both Houses joined in presenting to him a petition against recusants. The King returned a very gracious answer, saying, he was glad to see their zeal for religion, and was ready to concur with them in whatever they should propose on that head. He deferred, however, answering each particular article of the petition, till he had examined it.

Mr. Richard Montague, a clergyman, had lately printed a book, intituled, "An Appeal to Cæsar," wherein were several propositions tending to the disturbance of church and state. It was complained of to the Commons, who, bringing the author to the bar of their House, and examining him, thought proper to refer him to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Archbishop, who was looked upon with no good eye at court, because he was suspected of being a friend to the Puritans, contented himself with exhorting him to write no more upon such subjects. The proceedings of the Commons displeased the King, for, Montague being one of his chaplains, he pretended the bringing of him to their bar was an encroachment upon his prerogative. He expressed his displeasure with the Commons, and took occasion to bring the cause before the council.‡ Every one suspected, that as Montague's book contained an Arminian doctrine, Laud, Bishop of St. David's, the King's most intimate counsellor for religious affairs, had done this, to stop the prosecution. Laud was considered by many as the head and protector of the Arminians, who were now very numerous in the kingdom. He had insinuated himself into Buckingham's favour, and by that means into the King's, who readily followed his counsels in the affairs of religion.

The displeasure expressed by the King against the Commons, hindered not the House from granting him two subsidies; equal to 112,000*l.* The King accepted them graciously, but withal intimated, this supply was far short of what was necessary for the war § to which

* He was removed, on April 23, from Theobalds to London, and buried May 7, in Henry VII.'s chapel.

† Charles's opening speech was full of simplicity and cordiality. He lightly mentioned the occasion which he had for supply. He employed no intrigue to influence the suffrages of the members. He would not even allow the officers of the crown who had seats in the House, to mention any particular sum which might be expected by him. Secure of the affections of the Commons, he was resolved that their bounty should be entirely their own deed; unasked, unsolicited; the genuine fruit of sincere confidence and regard.

‡ Our author seems here to confound two distinct things. Montague (in 21 Jac.) published a book, which he called, "A New Gag for an Old Goose," being an answer to a Popish book, intituled, "A Gag for the New Gospel;" and for this book it was that he was questioned by the Parliament, and committed to the Archbishop, who dismissed him, with an admonition. Afterwards the Bishops of the Arminian party, consulting the propagation of the five articles condemned at the synod of Dort, concluded, that Montague should publish his "Appeal to Cæsar," at first attested by their joint authorities, which they afterwards withdrew by subtilty. However, the book was printed and dedicated to King Charles. The House appointed a committee to examine the errors therein, and thanked the Archbishop for his admonition formerly to the author, and voted his books to be contrary to the articles established by the Parliament, and took bond for his appearance.

§ The charge of which, by computation, amounted to 700,000*l.* a year.

his father had been advised by the Parliament. The act for the two subsidies was no sooner passed, than the King adjourned the Parliament to Oxford, to meet again the first of August following, by reason of the plague which raged in London.

King James, a little before his death, promised to lend the King of France five or six ships to be employed against the Genoese. At least they were borrowed on that pretence. But afterwards, Lewis XIII. wanting these ships for the siege of Rochelle, prevailed with Charles I. by Buckingham's means, that he might employ them where he pleased, and accordingly they were sent to Dieppe, under the command of Vice-Admiral Pennington. The masters or commanders of these ships, discovering they were to go against Rochelle, weighed anchor and sailed back to England. Pennington informing the Duke of Buckingham of it, received an express order, confirmed by another from the King himself, to return to Dieppe with the ships, and put them into the hands of the French, which was done accordingly. But the mariners all deserted, utterly refusing to serve against Rochelle.

This affair made great noise at Oxford, where the Parliament was re-assembled. Buckingham's ill conduct, in this and other respects, was loudly complained of in the House of Commons. It was said, the money granted by the Parliament to the late King had been misapplied, and put to uses very different from those it was intended for. That the seas were so neglected, that the corsairs had done great damage to the English merchants. That Popery and Arminianism were countenanced by a strong party in the kingdom. Neile, Bishop of Winchester; and Laud, Bishop of St. David's, were chiefly looked upon as the heads and protectors of the Arminians,* and as favourers of Popery, by reason of their rigid and passionate zeal for all the ceremonies of the church of England, even for such as seemed the least necessary. This zeal appeared to many as mysterious as uncommon, and caused them to suspect, that the two prelates, under colour of maintaining religion, had formed a project to restore Popery. They could not imagine, that men should have so strong an attachment to things in themselves of so little moment, without some hidden design. Wherefore Mr. Montague was summoned a second time before the House of Commons, and severely reprimanded.

The King, seeing the Parliament had spent the three or four first days of their session in talking of grievances, without any mention of the money he expected for supporting the war, found himself obliged to depart from that delicacy which he had formerly maintained. He accordingly sent for both Houses, and in Christ-Church-Hall, by himself and his ministers, he entered into a particular detail both of the alliances which he had formed, and of the military operations which he had projected. He told the Parliament, that, by a promise of subsidies, he had engaged the King of Denmark to take part in the war; that this monarch intended to enter Germany by the north, and to rouse to arms those Princes who had impatiently longed for an opportunity of asserting the liberty of the empire; that Mansfeldt had undertaken to penetrate with the English army into the Palatinate, and by that quarter to excite the members of the evangelical union; that the States must be supported in the unequal warfare which they maintained with Spain; that no less a sum than 70,000l. a year had been found, by computation, requisite for all these purposes; that the maintenance of the fleet, and the defence of Ireland, demanded an expense of 400,000l.; that he himself had already exhausted and anticipated in the public service his whole revenue, and had scarcely left sufficient for the daily subsistence of himself and his family; that, on his accession to the crown, he found a debt of above 300,000l. contracted by his father in support of the Palatine; and that, while Prince of Wales, he had himself contracted debts, notwithstanding his great frugality, to the amount of 70,000l. which he had expended entirely on naval and military ornaments. After mentioning all these facts, the King even condescended to use entreaties. He said that his request was the first that he had ever made them; that he was young and in the commencement of his reign; and if he now met with kind and dutiful usage, it would endear to him the use of Parliaments, and would for ever preserve an entire harmony between him and his people.

To these reasons the Commons remained inexorable. They returned to their House, proceeded to examine grievances, and, in this examination, divers complaints were made against the Duke of Buckingham. It was also complained, that Popery was not only tolerated, but even countenanced, contrary to the King's express promise: that pardons were granted to recusants, signed by the Lord Conway, Secretary of State, who pretended to be authorized by the King; and that these pardons stopped the course of justice, and the execution of the laws. Whereupon the King thought himself obliged to return positive answers to the petition presented to him at London, by the two Houses, to which he had hitherto only answered in general. He accordingly gave them a gracious and compliant answer to all their remonstrances; though, in his heart, he was extremely averse to the furious measures which the remonstrants proposed. But, if it may be judged by the continual complaints of the Parliament throughout this reign, concerning these articles, it will appear that Charles's promises were no better performed than his father's. The King expected, that his answers to the petition would gain him the affection of the Commons. But these answers, though so gracious and positive, could not engage them to do what he desired, that is, to lay aside all their business, and think only of granting him money. Instead of the money-bill, they began with examining and even inquiring after the grievances of the nation, and the state of religion. In this examination, the Duke of Buckingham, and the rest of the ministers, were not spared.

The King, seeing what course the Commons were taking, was extremely offended. First, hath by their slowness, they broke all his measures for the present campaign. Secondly, he deemed it a manifest affront and contempt of his person, to presume openly to attack his favourite and ministers, or rather himself under their name. So, perceiving no likelihood of a speedy supply, which was the sole end of calling the Parliament, he was determined to dissolve it.† The Commons, having some notice of it, hastily drew up a declaration, in order to throw the blame of this dissolution

* Rapin, as well as most of our writers, especially those of the Puritan party, seem to confound two things, which have no manner of relation to each other, viz. Arminianism and High-Church-Principles. The Arminian doctrine, condemned by the Synod of Dort, held in 1618, was in substance reduced to these five articles:—

I. God does not in an arbitrary manner predestinate any person to be saved or damned.

II. Christ died for all men, that is, all are partakers of the benefits of Christ's passion, who sincerely perform the Gospel-terms of faith and repentance.

III. How necessary soever grace may be towards our doing good actions, yet,

IV. It is not irresistable, that is, we are still free agents; consequently,

V. The faithful may finally fall away, or depart from a state of grace.

Now nothing can be more evident, than that a man may embrace all these opinions, without being one jot the more a friend to Popery or arbitrary power. Wherefore, though the first assertors of Arminianism happened likewise to be zealous sticklers for something like a despotic power in the King, yet is the one no consequence at all of the other, as abundance of our historians would insinuate. Doubtless, Laud, Neile, Montague, and the rest, who were for setting the King above the laws, would have been of that mind, whether they had been Arminians or not. Even at this time, the five articles above, which are now generally received in the church of England, are believed by thousands, who are not for carrying the authority of the King or church beyond its due bounds. The reason why Arminianism was condemned in the reign of James I. and Charles I. was, because our articles and homilies (in the points above mentioned) were generally understood in a Calvinistical sense.

† The few acts made in this short Parliament, were these:

I. An act forbidding sports and pastimes, such as bear or bull-bating, plays, or other unlawful exercises, on Sundays.

II. An act for the further restraint of tippling in inns, ale-houses, and victualling houses.——The clergy granted the King three entire subsidies, and the laity two.

on the King, for fear he should himself lay it on them, under colour that they were not very ready to perform their promise.* The Commons' aim was to intimate to the people, that they intended not to deny the King money for his just occasions: but believed to have a right to demand first the redress of grievances, as a condition, though they avoided using that term.

The dissolution of the Parliament hindered not the King from pursuing his design of continuing, or rather of beginning, the war with Spain. For though the late King had taken some measures tending to a war, there had been no action since the breach of the treaty. The sending of Count Mansfeldt into the Low-Countries, in order to march into the Palatinate, was almost the only thing that could be considered as a declaration against Spain, though the project had miscarried. Charles, resolving therefore to undertake this war, of which he was the principal author and promoter, sent the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland to the Hague, to negotiate a league with the United Provinces. In the mean time, a fleet was equipping in England to act against Spain. But as he wanted money, he found no speedier or better method to raise it, than by borrowing of persons able to lend, to whom he directed letters under his Privy-Seal, requiring by way of loan such sums as each was taxed at.†

The fleet designed against Spain was not ready to sail till the beginning of October, under the command of Edward Cecil, lately made Viscount Wimbleton, who had the Earl of Essex for Vice-Admiral. The fleet consisted of eighty sail, with ten regiments on board. The intent of this expedition was to wait in some convenient place for the Spanish Plate-fleet which was expected from the Indies in November. As the Admiral had sufficient time, he might have attacked a great number of ships in the Bay of Cadiz, but the difficulty of the enterprize, or some other reason, caused him to neglect this advantage. He was contented with landing Sir John Burroughs with some troops, who meeting no opposition, only plundered some villages, and abused themselves with wine, to their own, more than their enemies', prejudice. Whereupon they were forced to be re-imbarked with all speed. After that, the contagion spreading among the troops, the fleet returned to England in November, without the King's reaping any benefit from this armament, which had been very chargeable to him. This ill success did great injury to the King, as well as to Buckingham, who was looked upon as the contriver and director of the court-projects.

The King, finding himself without money, and consequently unable to continue the war, resolved at length to call a new Parliament. But to avoid the inconvenience of seeing, in the Lower-House, such members as had most opposed him, and exclaimed against the Duke in the late Parliament, the court invented this stratagem. All these persons were made sheriffs, and so could not be chosen members of Parliament. Sir Edward Coke was of this number: however, he and some others were chosen, preferring the service they owed their country in Parliament to that which they could render it as sheriffs.‡ The Parliament was therefore summoned to meet on the 6th of February 1625-6, and on the 2d, being Candlemas-day, the King was crowned by Archbishop Abbot; William Laud, Bishop of Bath and Wells, the King's favourite Bishop, officiated as Dean of Westminster, in the room of Bishop Williams, who, through the King's disfavour, was sequestered from this service. Before the coronation, the King ordered, by proclamation, all such as had forty pounds a year or more, and were not yet Knights, to come and receive the order of knighthood. This was considered as a new grievance.§

The Parliament being assembled on the 6th of February, the Lord Keeper Williams opened the session in the King's name. Though it did not appear in his speech, that the King intended to ask a supply of the Commons, that was the real motive of calling the Parliament. But the Commons did not think themselves obliged to guess the King's intention, or prevent his demand. So, after chusing their speaker, the first care was to thank the King for his gracious answer to the petition against recusants, presented to him at Oxford. Then they spent some days in examining the public grievances, amongst which were reckoned, the miscarriage of the fleet to Cadiz, evil counsellors about the King, and the misemployment of the three subsidies, and three fifteenths, granted to the late King, for the recovery of the Palatinate. To examine these grievances with more order and clearness, committees were appointed, one for secret affairs, another for grievances, and another for religion. This last, whereof Mr. Pym was chairman, called in question again, Montague's books, intituled, An Answer to the late Gagg of Protestants, An Appeal to Cæsar, and A Treatise of the Invocation of Saints, and reported to the House, the false, erroneous, Papistical, Arminian opinions found therein, repugnant to the articles of the church of England. For instance, "That the church of Rome hath ever remained firm upon the same foundation of Sacraments and doctrines instituted by God. That the controverted points between the church of England, and the church of Rome, are of a less and inferior nature, of which a man may be ignorant without any danger of his soul at all. That images may be used for the instruction of the ignorant, and excitation of devotion. That there are tutelar Saints as well as Angels. That men justified may fall away and depart from the state of grace," and some other Arminian tenets.

The King, seeing the Commons bent upon the examination of religious matters, ordered his Attorney-General to acquaint the Judges of the circuits that it was his pleasure they should proceed with rigour against recusants.

The King had demanded a supply of money to carry on the war; but the Commons were in no haste to grant it. On the contrary, they still proceeded in the exami-

* The declaration of the Commons was as follows: "We the knights, citizens and burgesses of the Commons House of Parliament, being the representative body of the whole Commons of this realm, abundantly comforted in his Majesty's late gracious answer touching religion, and his message for the care of our health, do solemnly protest and vow before God and the world, with one heart and voice, that we are all resolved, and do hereby declare, that we will ever continue most loyal and obedient subjects to our most gracious Sovereign Lord King Charles; and that we will be ready in convenient time, and in a Parliamentary way, freely and dutifully to do our utmost endeavours, to discover and reform the abuses and grievances of the realm and state, and in like sort to afford all necessary supply to his most excellent Majesty, upon his present, and all other his just occasions and designs; most humbly beseeching our said dear and dread Sovereign, in his princely wisdom and goodness, to rest assured of the true and hearty affections of his poor Commons, and to esteem the same to be (as we conceive it is indeed) the greatest worldly reputation and security that a just King can have; and to account all such as slanderers of the people's affections, and enemies to the commonwealth, that shall dare to say the contrary."

† These forced loans, practised by some Kings of England, have ever been considered as great grievances, and tending to render Parliaments useless. It will hereafter appear, that the next Parliament did not suffer these to pass uncomplained of. However, to soften people's minds, and induce them to lend their money more freely, a proclamation was published, to call home all such children as were now educating in foreign countries, as well as all the English, Scots, and Irish, in the service of the House of Austria. On the other hand, the Privy-Council issued out warrants to disarm recusants.

‡ The three persons chiefly aimed at, were, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Robert Philips, and Sir Thomas Wentworth, made Sheriffs of Bucks, Somerset, and Yorkshire. Sir Edward Coke taking exceptions against the sheriff's oath, these words were ever after left out: "You shall do all your pain and diligence to destroy and make to cease all manner of heresies and errors, commonly called Lollardies, within your bayliwick from time to time, and assist all ordinaries and commissioners of the holy church, and favour and maintain them as often as you shall be required."

§ The coronation was performed with the usual ceremonies. But when all was over, the King being seated on his throne ready to receive the homages of the Lords, Laud approached him, and read an extraordinary passage, of which there appeared no instance in former coronations. It contained the following words:

"Stand and hold fast, from henceforth, the place to which you have been heir by the succession of your forefathers, being now delivered to you by the authority of Almighty God, and by the hands of us, and all the Bishops and Servants of God: and as you see the clergy to come nearer to the altar than others, so remember that (in all places convenient) you give them greater honour, that the mediator of God and man may establish you in the kingly throne to be mediator betwixt the clergy and the laity; and that you may reign for ever with Jesus Christ, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords."

nation of the grievances, and, among others, of certain reprisals made upon France, with too much precipitation, to the great damage of the English merchants. The Council of War, appointed by the Parliament to manage the three subsidies granted to King James, were also obliged to give an account of their conduct.

The King, bearing this delay very impatiently, pressed the Commons to consider of the supply. The Lords also endeavoured to persuade them to it, in a conference which they desired on this occasion; but it was to no purpose. On the contrary, they heard the report of the committee concerning the nation's grievances, wherein they had always the Duke of Buckingham in view, and even caused him to be informed of the articles on which the complaints against him were grounded. Whereupon the King sent a remonstrating letter to the Speaker, with a message to the House by Sir Richard Weston. The message contained five articles of expence to be provided for, namely,

"I. That his Majesty's fleet being returned, and the victuals spent, the men must of necessity be discharged, and their wages paid, or else an assured mutiny will follow, which may be many ways dangerous at this time.

"II. That his Majesty hath made ready about forty ships, to be set forth on a second voyage, to hinder the enemy, which want only victuals and some men, which, without present supply of money, cannot be set forth and kept together.

"III. That the army which is appointed on every coast, must presently be disbanded, if they be not presently supplied with victuals and clothes.

"IV. That if the companies of Ireland, lately sent thither, be not provided for, instead of defending that country, they will prove the authors of rebellion.

"V. That the season of providing healthful victuals will be past, if this month be neglected.

"And therefore his Majesty commandeth me to tell you, that he desired to know, without further delaying of time, what supply you will give him for these his present occasions, that he may accordingly frame his course and council."

The Commons were not very well pleased with the letter or message, wherein were several things they could not approve. As they perceived, that the desired supply would not be the last, they could not be sure, but in the next session of Parliament the King would again expect the money-bill to pass before the grievances, and so there would be no end. The Commons therefore resolved to send an answer to the King's message, full of respect, submission, expressions of their zeal for his service, and even promises of aiding him in his wants, though in a general manner. But withal, they artfully intimated to him, that redress of grievances ought to precede the supply they intended to grant him.

The King fully perceived the intention of the House in sending him this answer. But he had not the same reasons as the Commons to be reserved in his expressions. It was rather his interest to speak freely, for fear, by dissembling his principles and pretensions, he should encourage the Commons to attack the Duke of Buckingham, who was counted the prime author of the grievances. His Majesty therefore made this reply to the Commons' answer:

Mr. Speaker,

"THE answer of the Commons delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and satisfactory answer, and I thank them for it, and I hope you will with all expedition take a course for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good as well as mine; but for your clause therein, of presenting of greivances, I take that but for a parenthesis in your speech, and not a condition; and yet for answer to that part, I will tell you, I will be as willing to hear your grievances, as my predecessors have been, so that you will apply yourselves to redress grievances, and not to inquire after grievances. I must let you know, that I will not allow any of my servants to be questioned amongst you, much less such as are of eminent place, and near unto me. The old question was, 'What shall be done to the man whom the King will honour?' But now it hath been the labour of some, to seek what may be done against him whom the King thinks fit to honour. I see you specially aim at the Duke of Buckingham; I wonder what hath so altered your affections towards him. I do well remember, that in the last Parliament in my father's time, when he was the instrument to break the treaties, all of you (and yet I cannot say all, for I know some of you are changed, but yet the House of Commons is always the same) did so much honour and respect him, that all the honour conferred on him was too little; and what he hath done since to alter and change your minds, I wot not; but can assure you, he hath not meddled, or done any thing concerning the public or commonwealth, but by special directions and appointment, and as my servant; and is so far from gaining, or improving his estate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the same. I would you would hasten for my supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves; for if any ill happen, I think I shall be the last that shall feel it."

This letter hindered not the Commons from proceeding in the examination of the Duke of Buckingham's conduct, it being resolved to impeach him in form. The question was moved by Dr. Turner, a physician, "Whether common fame be a good ground of proceeding for the House?" This question was decided in the affirmative, after consulting some lawyers; at which the King was extremely offended, and showed his displeasure to the Commons, demanding withal, that Turner might be punished for moving such a question. But this message signified but little, and the House still continuing to proceed against the Duke, it was the general opinion of the members, that, in granting the King money, the redress of the grievances was not to be neglected.

Meanwhile, to take from the King the pretence, which all these delays might furnish him with, the Commons unanimously voted him three subsidies and three fifteenths, to which, a month after, was added a fourth subsidy. By this expedient they showed the public, how ready they were to assist the King in his necessities; but withal reserved to themselves the liberty of passing this vote into an act (without which it was of no use to the King) when they should think fit. According to their intention, this act was not to pass till grievances were presented to, and answered by the King. Thus he was deprived of the pretence to complain of their delays, though indeed what they did for him could be advantageous to him, only on supposition he would regard their desires. This greatly embarrassed the King. He plainly saw the Commons' design, and was the more offended, as all their proceedings were levelled at the Duke of Buckingham, or rather at the King himself, who had publicly declared, the Duke had only followed his orders, without being able to prevail for his being left unmolested. As he found they acted with too little respect, he resolved to let them know how much he was displeased with their proceeding, doubtless, to frighten them into another course. He sent therefore for both Houses to Whitehall, where the Lord Keeper, in the King's name, expressly commanded the House not to meddle with his minister and servant, Buckingham; and ordered them to finish, in a few days, the bill which they had begun for the subsidies, and to make some addition to them; otherwise they must not expect to sit any longer. And though these harsh demands were endeavoured to be explained and mollified, a few days after, by a speech of Buckingham's, they failed not to leave a disagreeable impression behind them.

The King was extremely embarrassed. He wanted money, and the Commons had voted him three subsidies and three fifteenths, to which they lately added a fourth subsidy. But it evidently appeared they meant not to pass the bill, till the Duke of Buckingham's affair was finished. So, the King not being able to divert the charge against the Duke, without hindering at the same time the subsidy bill, consented at length, that the House should proceed in the examination of his favourite's conduct, but it was with intention to put a stop to it, if the affair was carried too far.*

A few days after, the Commons sent word to the Duke of Buckingham, that they were passing articles of accusation against him, of which he might be informed by the clerk's book, and take a copy thereof; and that they expected his answer, if he pleased to send any.† Whereupon, the Duke applied to the Lords for leave to answer. But the Lords did not think it convenient to permit him; under colour, that he would thereby give the Commons occasion to defer the subsidy bill, which they were presently to take into consideration. But the Commons, without regarding the reason alledged by the Lords, which was signified to them by the Duke, continued their proceedings. They even resolved to annex to the charge, an article concerning the plaister and potion applied and given by the Duke to King James, in his last sickness, without the advice of the physicians. The King, hearing of this, sent a message to the Commons, "That he, having consented to their proceedings against the Duke of Buckingham, hearing there is new matter intended to be brought against him, nevertheless leaves the House to their own way to present the business to him, or to the Lords, withal advising them to consider of the season of the year, and to avoid all loss of time."

Some interruption was given to the Duke of Buckingham's accusation, and consequently to the subsidy bill, by a new affair which unexpectedly arose, and which it will be necessary briefly to mention. The Earl of Bristol, who had been Ambassador in Spain for the affair of the marriage, which he had at length almost brought to a conclusion, according to King James's desire, had however the misfortune to displease the Prince and Duke. As their aim was to hinder the Earl from giving the Parliament an exact account of what passed in Spain, they so managed, that at his return he was confined to his house, and afterwards sent to the Tower. King James was fully satisfied of the Earl's innocence, but was so little master of his actions the two last years of his life, that he dared not openly protect him. So, the Prince and the Duke constrained him, on divers pretences, to keep him in prison, that he might not speak with him. After King James's death, the Earl's case became so much the worse, as the new King and favourite, his professed enemies, were no longer obliged to use any ceremony. He remained therefore in prison till this second Parliament, that is, about two years, without being brought to a trial, or even any charge entered against him. At last, knowing how the Commons stood affected to the Duke, he resolved to embrace this opportunity, and try to recover his liberty. He wished also to be in a condition to justify his conduct, which the Duke had aspersed, in order to cast on him the whole blame of what had passed in the negotiation of the Prince's marriage with the Infanta of Spain. He presented therefore a petition to the House of Lords, showing, that being Peer of the realm, he had received no summons to the Parliament, desiring them to intercede for him, that he might enjoy his privilege. Whereupon the Lords prayed his Majesty, to send a writ of summons as well to the Earl of Bristol as to some other Peers, whose writs were also stopped, which the King granted. A summons was therefore sent to the Earl, but withal, he received a letter from the Lord Keeper, acquainting him, that his Majesty would have him forbear his personal attendance. Upon this, the Earl sent a second petition to the Lords with the Keeper's letter, telling them, it was done by the Duke of Buckingham's credit, whose aim was to prevent him from discovering his crimes. Moreover, he besought the Lords to permit him to bring an accusation against the Duke, wherein he would demonstrate how much the Duke had abused the late King, his present Majesty, the State, and the Parliament. The King was so offended with the Earl of Bristol's boldness, that he sent a message to the Lords, declaring, he was determined to exhibit before them a charge of High-Treason against the Earl of Bristol. After this declaration, the Lords could not avoid putting the Earl into the custody of the Black-Rod. Some days after, the Earl being brought to the bar of the House, the Attorney-General read the charge against him in the King's name, who had corrected it in several places with his own hand. Nevertheless, the Lords received also the accusation entered by the Earl of Bristol, against the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Conway Secretary of State. The King's charge against the Earl was divided into three heads; namely, his offences, before the Prince's going to Spain: during the Prince's being in Spain: and after the Prince's return. But the Earl made such a defence, as covered his accusers with confusion. He plainly showed how much the Duke of Buckingham had deceived the Parliament in his narrative of what passed in Spain. This reflected on the King himself, who had not only attested the relation, but persisted still to attest it as true. Wherefore he did not think fit to prosecute a sentence against the Earl.

Some days after the Earl of Bristol had given his answer, and presented his charge against the Duke and the Lord Conway, the Commons brought up to the Lords their declaration and impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham. It contained thirteen articles, which were explained and aggravated by the managers appointed by the Commons. It is customary on such occasions, to divide the task among several of their members, each of whom prepares to speak to the article assigned him.‡ Sir Dudley Diggs was appointed to explain and support the beginning of the charge. The preamble having been read, Sir Dudley gave a general exposition of the impeachment, without insisting upon any particular article. He reduced the charge to four principal heads. In the first, he showed the grievances which sprang from so many offices conferred on a single person, and pretended it was one of the chief causes of the evils which afflicted England; as decay of trade, losses at sea, and the contempt the nation was fallen into. In the second, he spoke in general of honours being sold or procured by the Duke for undeserving persons. In the third, he said, as the Duke had raised all his poor kindred to honours, so he had exhausted and mis-employed his Majesty's lands and revenues. In the fourth, he spoke of the remedies applied and given to the late King in his last sickness, but he only just mentioned them, because that article was to be enlarged upon by another manager.

These articles were enlarged upon by the several managers; and Sir John Elliot was appointed to make the epilogue to the impeachment, wherein he summed up what had been said against the Duke, and spoke of him in very offensive terms, but however mentioned not the plaister or potion.

The same, or the next day, Diggs and Elliot were by the King's command sent to the Tower.

The Commons immediately declared, that they would proceed no further upon business, till they had satisfaction in their privileges. Charles alledged, as the reason of this measure, certain seditious expressions, which, he said, had, in their accusation of the Duke, dropped from these members. Upon inquiry it appeared that no such expressions had been used. The members were released, and the King reaped no other benefit from this attempt than to exasperate the House still further, and to shew some degree of precipitancy and indiscretion. Moved by this example, the House of Peers were roused from their inactivity, and claimed liberty for the Earl of Arundel, who had been lately

* At this time the King sent for the Bishops; and fourteen of them repairing to him, he charged them, that in the cause of Bristol and Buckingham, their consciences being their guides, they should follow only proofs, and not rumours.

† He was proxy for no less than fourteen Lords, which being found of ill consequence, it was ordered, that for the future no Lord should be capable of receiving above two proxies.

‡ It was managed by eight members, and sixteen more as assistants. The eight chief managers were, Sir Dudley Diggs, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Pym, Mr. Sherland, Mr. Wandesford, and Sir John Elliot.

confined in the Tower. After many fruitless evasions, the King, though somewhat ungracefully, was at last obliged to comply. And in this incident it sufficiently appeared, that the Lords, how litttle soever inclined to popular courses, were not wanting in a just sense of their own dignity.

Before the Duke of Buckingham had given in his answer to the Commons' impeachment, the Chancellorship of the University of Cambridge becoming void by the Earl of Suffolk's death, the King caused the Duke, his favourite, to be elected in the room of the late Chancellor. The House of Commons were extremely offended at this election, considering it as a manifest contempt, that the Duke should be chosen whilst under an impeachment, and when one of the articles against him was plurality of offices. Besides, they maintained, there was a sort of contradiction in this choice, since the University themselves, by their representatives in Parliament, had given their consent to the Duke's impeachment. But the King openly supported the election in spite of the Commons.

At length, on the 6th of June, the Duke gave in his answer to the impeachment of the House of Commons.*

The Commons, finding no gratification in the legal impeachment of Buckingham, again claimed the execution of the penal laws against Catholics; and they presented to the King a list of persons entrusted with offices, most of them insignificant, who were either convicted or suspected recusants.

It was not for the King's honour to be pressed so often to perform what he had so positively promised. But it must be considered, it was not easy for him to withstand the solicitations and intrigues of the Queen, of the Duke of Buckingham, whose mother was a professed papist; of Sir Richard Weston his chief Counsellor; and of the Lord Conway, Secretary of State, both likewise Papists, since these were the men that were nearest his person, and by whom he was in a manner beset.

The next attack made by the Commons, had it prevailed, would have proved decisive. They were preparing a remonstrance against the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of Parliament. This article, together with the new impositions laid on merchandise by James, constituted nearly half of the crown-revenues; and by depriving the King of these resources, they would have reduced him to total subjection and dependence. While they retained such a pledge, besides the supply already promised, they were sure that nothing could be refused them. Though after canvassing the matter nearly three months, they found themselves utterly incapable of fixing any legal crime upon the Duke, they regarded him as an unable, and perhaps a dangerous minister; and they intended to present a petition, for removing him from his Majesty's person and councils, which would then have been equivalent to a command.

These preparations alarmed the King; and he now conceived that Buckingham's sole guilt was the being his friend and favourite: all the other complaints against him were mere pretences. A little before, he was the idol of the people. No new crime had since been discovered. After the most diligent inquiry, prompted by the greatest malice, the smallest appearance of guilt could not be fixed upon him. What idea, he asked, must all men entertain of his honour, should he now sacrifice his friend to pecuniary considerations? What further authority should he retain in the nation, were he capable in the beginning of his reign, to give, in so signal an instance, such matter of triumph to his enemies, and discouragement to his adherents? To day the Commons pretend to wrest his minister from him: to-morrow they will attack some branch of his prerogative. By their remonstrances, and promises, and protestations, they had engaged the crown in a war. As soon as they saw a retreat impossible—without waiting for new incidents—without covering themselves with new pretences—they immediately deserted him, and refused him all reasonable supply. It was evident, that they desired nothing so much as to see him plunged in inextricable difficulties, of which they intended to take advantage. To such deep perfidy, to such unbounded usurpations, it was necessary to oppose a proper firmness and resolution. All encroachments on supreme power could only be resisted successfully on the first attempt. The Sovereign authority was, with some difficulty, reduced from its ancient and legal height; but when once pushed downwards, it soon became contemptible; and would easily be carried to the lowest extremity, by the continuance of the same effort, now encouraged by success.

Urged by these motives, Charles was determined immediately to dissolve the Parliament. When this resolution was known, the House of Lords, whose compliant behaviour entitled them to some authority with him, endeavoured to interpose; and they petitioned him, that he would allow the Parliament to sit some time longer. Not a moment longer, cried the King, hastily; and he soon after ended the session by dissolving them.

The Commons, who had foreseen this, now took care to finish and disperse their remonstrance, which they intended as a justification of their conduct to the people. The King, likewise, on his part, published a declaration, in which he gave the reasons of his disagreement with the Parliament, and of their sudden dissolution, before they had time to conclude any one act. These papers furnished the partisans on both sides with ample matter of apology and of recrimination. But all impartial men judged that the Commons, though they had not violated any law, yet, by their unpliableness and independence, were insensibly changing, perhaps improving, the spirit and genius, while they preserved the form of the constitution: and that the King was acting altogether without any plan; running on in a road surrounded on all sides by the most dangerous precipices, and concerting no proper measures, either for submitting to the obstinacy of the Commons, or for subduing it.

A few days after the King's declaration was published, two proclamations appeared, which afforded ample matter of discourse to such as were not of the court-party. By the first, the King commanded all persons who had any copies of the Commons' remonstrance to burn the same, on pain of his highest displeasure.

The second proclamation contained express commands, not to preach or dispute upon the controverted points of Arminianism, either for or against them, under colour that such sort of disputes served only to breed contention. But many were of opinion, that Laud, Bishop of London; and Nevil, Bishop of Winchester; had procured this injunction, to oppress the orthodox ministers, who should take the liberty to break it, whilst the disobedience of the contrary party should be connived at. It is certain, the next Parliament complained to the King, that the Orthodox ministers were silenced for disobeying the proclamation, and the Arminians tolerated and countenanced.

Meanwhile, an information was preferred by the King's special command in the Star-Chamber against the Duke of Buckingham, for applying the plaister to the late King. But withal, it was so ordered, that the cause came not to a hearing.

The King receiving no aid from the Parliament, because he was unwilling to purchase it at the rate set by the Commons, was in great straits.† He was to maintain a war against the House of Austria, to supply his

* On comparing the articles with the accusation and reply, they appear to be either frivolous or false, or both. The only charges which could be regarded as important was, that he had extorted a sum of 10,000*l.* from the East-India Company, and that he had confiscated some goods belonging to French merchants, on pretence of their being the property of Spanish. The impeachment never came to a full determination; so that it is difficult for us to give a decisive opinion with regard to these articles. But it must be confessed, that the Duke's answer in these particulars, as in all the rest, is so clear and satisfactory, that it is impossible to refuse our assent to it. His faults and blemishes were in many respects very great; but rapacity and avarice were vices with which he was entirely unacquainted.

† By his hasty dissolution of the Parliament, he lost four subsidies, and three-fifteenths, which had been voted him by the Commons.

allies with the promised succours, and to put his kingdom in a posture of defence. As all this could not be done by his ordinary revenues, recourse was to be had to expedients to raise money.

The first was a proclamation forbidding all persons, for two years, to present or solicit any suit for any thing, tending to the diminution of the King's revenues.

The second was a commission directed to the Archbishop of York and others, to compound with Popish recusants, not only for all forfeitures, due since the tenth year of King James, but also for such as should become due hereafter. This commission was directly contrary to his promise to the Parliament at Oxford.

The third was a proclamation, declaring the King's resolution to make his revenue certain, by granting his lands, as well holden in copy as otherwise, to be holden in fee-farm.

The fourth was a loan from every Peer of a certain sum for the defence of the kingdom. But his attempt to borrow a hundred thousand pounds of the city of London did not succeed, the city desiring to be excused.

The fifth was an imposition upon the several ports and maritime counties, to furnish and set out a certain number of ships to protect the trade. The city of London, having refused to lend the King money, was appointed to equip twenty ships, or, at least, to find a sum sufficient for that purpose. As this tax was peculiar to the maritime towns, many of the inhabitants of such places retired elsewhere: but they were commanded by proclamation to return to their respective towns.

Lastly, the council ordered very strictly that the payment of tonnage and poundage should be continued, though the King had yet no grant from the Parliament, though he had never demanded any such thing, and though the Commons had complained of the levying of these imposts, as a grievance, in the remonstrance they had prepared.

But to let the people see, it was purely out of necessity that the King made use of these extraordinary methods to raise money, his Majesty ordered a general fast to be held on the 5th of July, to divert the judgments of God ready to fall on the kingdom, by the pretended invasion it was threatened with. This afforded him also a pretence to require the Lords-Lieutenants of the several counties to muster and arm the militia, and put them in condition to withstand the invasions of enemies from abroad, and quell the rebellions of subjects at home, if any should happen.*

The means hitherto used by the King, to raise money, were not sufficient to free him from a fresh incumbrance caused by an unexpected event. The King of Denmark, his uncle, whom he had engaged in a war with the Emperor, was defeated the 27th of August by Count Tilly, with the loss of all his baggage and train of artillery. This accident obliged Charles to find money to support his uncle, who was in a very ill situation, and could not avoid making a peace with the Emperor, unless speedily relieved. The way which was thought most proper to raise money on this urgent occasion, was by a general loan from the subjects, according as every man was assessed in the rolls of the last subsidy. It is true, the King gave his royal word, that all the money should be repaid without fee or charge: but the performance of his promise, as afterwards appeared, was not relied on. The King himself, as well as his council, expected to meet with many obstacles in executing this project, such forced loans not being agreeable to the nation. It was feared besides, that this way of raising money upon the subjects, would in the end render Parliaments useless. For this reason, the council judged it proper to make use of three methods to succeed in their design:

I. Of some artifice to oblige the people, as much as possible, to lend freely:

II. Of fear, to terrify the irresolute:

III. Of rigour, to compel the most obstinate.

These were the grounds of the instructions the council gave the Commissioners, who were appointed in the several counties to levy the loan.†

For the advancement of the loan, care was taken to publish a list of such as had freely subscribed, for a good example to others; and all the Peers and Gentlemen were ordered to repair to their country-seats, that their absence might cause no delay or obstacle to the subscriptions. Sir Randolph Crew, Lord Chief Justice, showing no zeal for advancing the loan, was removed from his place, which was given to Sir Nicholas Hide.

Besides this example, the court used, to promote the loan, some other ways, which, probably, would not be less effectual. The first was, the billeting of soldiers upon private houses, contrary to the constant custom of England, where all, but such as keep public-houses, have the privilege of not being obliged to lodge soldiers against their wills. It is easy to perceive, that those who showed any reluctance to lend the King money, were not spared on this occasion, and that the soldiers quartered upon them took care to let them see, what they exposed themselves to by disobeying the King. Moreover, such as were sufferers by these troublesome guests, could not summon them before the usual judges; but by the King's express orders, they were obliged to apply to a council of war, so that the officers were the sole judges of their soldiers. Notwithstanding all this, the people in general were so averse to the loan, that the money flowed but slowly into the King's exchequer.(a) The court, therefore, was obliged to use a more violent remedy to force the most obstinate. And that was, to order such of the common sort as refused to subscribe to the loan, to be enrolled as soldiers to serve in his Majesty's troops. As for persons of birth and rank, they were summoned to appear before the council, and upon a second refusal to lend money, were confined to places at a great distance from their habitations; and such as refused to be thus confined, were committed to the several prisons in London. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, and a zealous adherent of the King, was among the imprisoned.

Besides these means, the court practised another, from whence they expected great advantages, but which proved more detrimental than beneficial to the King. And that was, to cause ministers, gained for that purpose, to preach, as a Scripture-doctrine, that subjects were obliged to obey the King's commands, without examination.‡

Notwithstanding the King's hopes to succeed at length

(a) A. D. 1627.

* This year the King raised the sailors' wages, from fourteen to twenty shillings a month.

† The commissioners appointed to levy these loans, among other articles of secret instruction, were enjoined, "If any shall refuse to lend, and shall make delays or excuses, and persist in his obstinacy, that they examine him upon oath, whether he has been dealt with to deny or refuse to lend, or make an excuse for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and what speeches or persuasions were used for that purpose? And that they also shall charge every such person, in his Majesty's name, upon his allegiance, not to disclose to any one what his answer was. So violent an inquisitorial power, and so impracticable an attempt at secrecy, were the objects of indignation, and even, in some degree, of ridicule.

‡ Two of these ministers distinguished themselves by their sermons on this subject. Dr. Sibthorp, who was one, says, among other things, in a sermon, preached at Northampton, at Lent assizes: "That the Prince, who is the head, and makes his court and council, it is his duty to direct and make laws, Eccles. viii. 3, 4. He doth whatsoever pleases him. Where the word of a King is, there is power, and who may say unto him, What dost thou?———If Princes command any thing which subjects may not perform, because it is against the laws of God, or of nature, or impossible, yet subjects are bound to undergo the punishment, without either resisting, or railing, or reviling, and so to yield a passive obedience where they cannot exhibit an active one———I know no other case, but one of those three, wherein a subject may excuse himself with passive obedience; but in all other he is bound to active obedience."

But Dr. Manwaring spoke still more plainly in one of his sermons. He said, "That the King is not bound to observe the laws of the realm concerning the subjects' rights and liberties, but that his royal will length in his project, he was not easy: the war he had undertaken for the recovery of the Palatinate, was so slowly and unsuccessfully carried on, that it was evident he would never effect his ends by continuing it in such a manner. Hitherto, every thing had miscarried. The twelve thousand men intended for the Palatinate, under the command of Count Mansfeldt, were lost, for want of proper measures for their passage, as was shown in the reign of King James. The projected expedition against Cadiz and the Spanish West-India fleet, had met with no better success. The King of Denmark, beginning a war with the Emperor, at the instance of his nephew the King of England, was entirely defeated. The United Provinces of the Low-Countries in alliance with England, were rather in want of assistance, than able to give any. Lewis XIII. had flattered the King of England with hopes of a league against the House of Austria, only to obtain the better terms from the Spaniards in Italy, and since he had concluded a peace in that country, did not show the least inclination to join with England for the recovery of the Palatinate. Thus Charles saw himself farther than ever from the execution of his grand projects. To this may be added, that the dissolution of his two first Parliaments, without obtaining the expected supplies, rendered him contemptible to his neighbours. There was no state desirous to enter into a strict alliance with a Prince who had imprudently quarrelled with his subjects, when he most wanted their assistance. In short, though he had intended to free himself from the yoke of Parliaments, and put himself in a condition to raise what money he pleased upon his subjects, by the methods he had devised, he daily perceived he had taken wrong measures.

The King, in his present situation, seems to have had but one of these two courses to take, either to agree with his people, or make peace with Spain. By the first course, he would have been enabled to push the war he had undertaken more vigorously. By the second, he would have been freed from the trouble of demanding extraordinary supplies of his Parliament, or of raising money by unusual methods, which gained him the hatred of his people. But both these courses were contrary to his temper, his character, his projects, the interests of his favourite and ministers.

Instead of persuading the King to make a peace with Spain, they engaged him by degrees to proclaim war with France, at a time when he knew not how to continue the war he had begun with the House of Austria. To engage France to afford some pretence for the rupture which was meditating in England, the King, upon some disgust concerning the Queen's French Chaplains and domestics,* dismissed them all, having first paid what was due for wages or salaries. The King of France highly resented this breach of the marriage-treaty; but, however, did nothing that showed a design to be revenged by way of arms. So the disgust received from the Queen's domestics, who were sufficiently punished, could not serve for pretence of a rupture on the side of England, since, on the contrary, France had reason to complain of the breach of the treaty. Nevertheless, it was intended to make war upon France, under colour of supporting the Huguenots who were oppressed, and threatened with utter destruction. But when the character of the King, of the favourite, and of the ministry, is considered, it can hardly be thought, that the desire of maintaining the Protestant religion, such as it was in France, was the real motive of this war. The King and his whole court mortally hated the Presbyterians. The Duke of Buckingham had properly no religion at all. Weston and Conway were Catholics. Laud and Neile thought it impossible to be saved out of the church of England. How then can it be imagined that all these men, who were the King's most intimate counsellors, should combine to support in France a religion for which they had the utmost contempt? It is much more probable, that the King's ministers, seeing little likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by arms, and fearing the King would at length be tired of a fruitless war with Spain, induced him to carry his arms into France, in order still to keep him under a necessity of raising money by extraordinary methods, and thereby perpetuating his misunderstanding with his subjects, on which the continuance of their credit entirely depended. Another cause is alledged of this war with France, namely, the Duke of Buckingham's pride, who being sent to Paris to conduct the Queen into England, became enamoured of Ann of Austria, wife to Lewis the XIII.th, and had the confidence to disclose his passion. It is said, the court of France threatened him with a punishment suitable to his insolence, and refused to let him see the Queen any more, but that he swore, he would see her in spite of them all. To this oath is ascribed the resolution instilled into the King his, master, to make war upon France, in hopes it would give him an opportunity to perform his oath.

The war with France being resolved, the King declared the grounds of it to the council, namely,

I. "That the House of Austria had such an influence upon the council of France, as to prevail with them to obstruct the landing of Count Mansfeldt's army, contrary to promise, with whom the French should have joined forces, for the relief of the Palatinate, and the German Princes; which failure of performance in them, proved the ruin of that army.

II. "That having, by his mediation, prevailed for a peace between the French King and his Protestant subjects, and engaged his word, that the Protestants should observe the articles of agreement: nevertheless the King of France, contrary to the said articles, blocked up their towns, garrisons, and forts, and had committed many spoils upon them when they had done nothing in violation of the edict of peace.

III. "That the King of France had committed an example of great injustice in full peace, to seize upon one hundred and twenty English ships, with all their merchandize and artillery."

The King's design was to send a fleet to Rochelle, under colour of relieving that place, which was threatened with a siege. This affair had been managed at the court of England by the Duke of Soubize, and Monsieur St. Blancard, a gentleman of Languedoc, without the knowledge of the Rochellers. This gave occasion to suspect, that their intention was to deliver the town to the English, on pretence of relieving it. However this be, the affair was kept very private; and, ever since April, a fleet had been equipping with all expedition, without any possibility of guessing for what it was intended. When it was ready, the King gave the Duke of Buckingham a commission, which plainly showed, the affair was to be a secret. By this commission, the Duke was made Admiral of the fleet, and Commander-in-Chief of the land-forces, which should be embarked for the recovery of the Palatinate, according to such private instructions as he should receive from his Majesty.

This fleet, consisting of above a hundred ships, having on board seven thousand soldiers, sailed from Portsmouth the 7th of June, and on the 20th of July appeared before Rochelle. At the Duke's approach, the Rochel-will and command in imposing loans and taxes, without common consent in Parliament, doth oblige the subjects' conscience upon pain of eternal damnation. That those who refused to pay this loan, offended against the law of God, and the King's supreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, and rebellion. And that the authority of Parliament is not necessary for the raising of aids and subsidies; and that the slow proceedings of such great assemblies, were not fitted for the supply of the state's urgent necessities, but would rather produce sundry impediments to the just designs of Princes."

Archbishop Abbot was suspended from all his archiepiscopal functions, and confined to one of his country-houses, for refusing to license Sibthorp's sermon; and Manwaring, after having been sentenced by the Lords in the next Parliament, to pay a thousand pounds' fine, to make a public submission at the bars of the two Houses, and to be imprisoned during the pleasure of the Lords, after having been suspended for three years, and declared incapable of holding any ecclesiastical dignity, or secular office, obtained nevertheless the King's pardon, with a good benefice, and afterwards a bishopric.

* They maintained, that King Charles had no power to intermeddle with his Queen's family, because he was a heretic: and besides, they had made the Queen walk to Tyburn in devotion to pray there.

lers shut their gates for fear of a surprize, as having no notice that an English fleet was to come so near them. Presently after were seen to arrive the Duke of Soubize, with Sir William Beecher, who told them from the Duke of Buckingham, that the King of England, out of compassion to their sufferings, had sent a fleet and army to their assistance, and if they refused his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his engagement of honour and conscience for their relief. The Mayor replied in the name of the inhabitants, that they most humbly thanked his Majesty for the care he had of them; but that, being in strict union with all the rest of the Protestants in the kingdom, they could not receive into the city the offered succours, without consulting their friends, and without the previous consent of the whole body of the Huguenots. The Duke of Buckingham, finding by this answer, it would not be easy to get his troops into Rochelle, directed his course to the Isle of Rhé, where Toiras commanded. Toiras endeavoured at first to hinder the landing of the English; but as his forces were few, he was obliged to retreat to his citadel at St. Martin's, which was in a good state of defence. Had the Duke understood the art of war, he would, without losing a moment, have marched to the fort, and thereby hindered Toiras from getting in provisions. But he spent so much time in landing, and in preparing to march, that Toiras had leisure to store the place with ammunition. At last he marched to St. Martin's, and besieged it in form, but with little success. He had to deal with one more expert than himself, and who found means to keep him employed in the siege till November, though he had sent the King word he should be master of the place in eight days. Meanwhile, the King of France, who had not expected this invasion, ordered his troops to march with all speed towards the sea, and came in person to hasten the relief of the Isle of Rhé. When every thing was ready, Count Schomberg passed into the Isle with six or seven thousand men, without any opposition from the English fleet. Then he marched to St. Martin's, the siege whereof the Duke of Buckingham raised with precipitation, being vigorously pushed by the French to the very sea-side, so that it was with great difficulty that he re-embarked his remaining troops. It is said, of the seven thousand men he brought from England, nearly five thousand perished in this unfortunate expedition. It was rumoured however in England, that not above fifteen hundred were lost, and some even say, the King was made to believe it.

Whilst the Duke of Buckingham was employed in this expedition, Sir John Elliot, imprisoned for refusing to lend the King money, presented to his Majesty a petition for his liberty, which he did not ask as a favour, but as justice. He grounded his request upon several statutes which he cited, and by which he pretended to shew, that the King could not exact money from the subject by way of loan, nor were the subjects bound to submit to it. As the King then stood disposed, this petition could be of no service to the person that presented it. In November following, some other gentlemen,* committed for the same reason, brought their Habeas Corpus, that is, desired to be discharged upon bail, a privilege enjoyed by all Englishmen. This cause was pleaded very solemnly before all the judges of the realm. There were two points to be decided. The first, whether the prisoners were committed by the special command of the King, since the warden said only, "that the prisoners were detained by command of the King, signified to him by the warrant of several of the Privy-Council." Now the prisoners pleaded, that, according to law, the King's order should be produced, not barely for detaining them, but for committing them; and that besides, the signifying of the order by the Lords of the council, shewed, it was not by special command of his Majesty. The second point was, whether the King could imprison any subject without declaring the cause of the commitment, and whether in such case, the prisoners ought not to have the benefit of Habeas Corpus, that is, to be discharged upon bail. The counsel for the prisoners represented the terrible consequences of such a power in the King, since thereby the liberty of every subject would be at the King's mercy, who could detain them in prison as long as he pleased, and there would be no remedy by law. But the Judges unanimously decided against the prisoners, who were all remanded to their several prisons.

The ill success of the Isle of Rhé expedition, raised numberless complaints and murmurs against the Duke of Buckingham, who had many enemies. Multitudes were lost in that unfortunate undertaking, and, among the rest, Major-General Burroughs, one of the best officers in England; and these misfortunes were imputed to the Duke of Buckingham's incapacity, who had never been in the wars, and knew nothing of the sea-service, though the King had made him both Admiral and Captain-General. To these complaints were added others upon other accounts. The mariners complained they had received no wages for three years past, and deserted in great numbers, not to be forced to serve any longer without pay. The merchants made bitter complaints, that the seas were neglected, that within three years they had lost a great number of ships, and that the fishermen were taken almost in the very harbours. In a word, no one ventured to build any new ships, because, as soon as they were ready, the King seized them for his service, against the will of the owners.

The King did not much regard all these complaints, which perhaps reached him not; but he was very attentive to the petition which the Rochellers, upon the point of being besieged, sent him by their deputies, for relief. He had engaged in a war with France, upon his good opinion of his fleet, and of his favourite's ability; and though experience shewed him this opinion was ill-grounded, he would proceed, let what would be the consequence. Meanwhile, he saw himself without money, and the opposition he met with in the affair of the loan, made him sensible how difficult it would be to raise it by such methods. For this reason he consulted Sir Robert Cotton, upon the present situation of his affairs. Cotton advised him to call a Parliament, as the best means to free himself from all difficulties. But as Sir Robert foresaw the House of Commons would attack the Duke of Buckingham, he advised withal, that the Duke might be the first, who, in full council, should move the calling of the Parliament. This advice was followed, and, the Duke having acted his part, the Parliament was summoned by the unanimous resolution of the council, to meet the 17th of March 1628. Immediately after, warrants were sent to all parts to release the imprisoned and confined Gentlemen for the affair of the loan-money, and the King had the mortification to see almost all of them, to the number of twenty-seven, chosen to serve for representatives in the ensuing Parliament.† He sent writs of summons also to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was confined to one of his houses, to the Bishop of Lincoln prisoner in the Tower, and to the Earl of Bristol. At the same time, the council ordered the Lord Mayor of London to use moderation in demanding the loan-money.

The Parliament being assembled the 17th of March, 1628, the King made a speech to both houses; in which he told them, that "if they should not do their duties, in contributing to the necessities of the state, he must, in discharge of his conscience, use those other means which God had put in his hands, in order to save that which the follies of some particular men may otherwise put in danger. Take not this for a threatening," added the King, "for I scorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonition from him who by nature and duty, has most care of your preservation and prosperity." The Lord Keeper, by the King's direction, subjoined, "This way of Parliamentary supplies, as his Majesty told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition, and to the desire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, necessity and the sword of the enemy make way for the others. Remember his Majesty's admonition; I say, remember it."

The King does not seem to have made use of proper means to gain the good-will of the Commons. But it must be observed, that nothing was more opposite to his temper, than to stoop to court his Parliament.

After the two Houses had presented a petition to the King for a fast, the Commons began to examine the grievances of the nation, and seemed determined to grant no supply till these grievances were redressed. The first they took into consideration were, billeting of soldiers, loans by benevolence and Privy-Seals, imprisonment of gentlemen refusing to lend, denial of release upon Habeas Corpus; and several speeches were made upon these occasions. Sir Francis Seymour, among other things, said——"How can we think of giving subsidies, till we know whether we have any thing to give or no? For if his Majesty be persuaded by any to take from his subjects what he will, and where it pleaseth him; I would gladly know what we have to give?"——"Hath it not been preached in our pulpits, that all we have is the King's JURE DIVINO?"—— Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards so well known by the name of Earl of Strafford, distinguished himself by a speech against the government. He said truly, these things were not to be imputed to the King but to the Projectors, that is, to the ministers or others who had formed the design of stretching the prerogative beyond its due bounds, of whom he spoke in this manner: "They have brought the crown into greater want than ever, by anticipating the revenues: and can the shepherd be thus smitten, and the sheep not scattered? They have introduced a Privy-Council, and, ravishing at once the spheres of all ancient government, imprison us without either bail or bond; they have taken from us, what? What shall I say indeed, what have they left us? All means of supplying the King and ingratiating ourselves with him, taking up the root of all propriety."——Sir Edward Coke, a great lawyer, spoke chiefly to the grievance of the loans, and said, among other things: "Who will give subsidies, if the King may impose what he will? And if after Parliament, the King may enhance what he pleaseth?—— The King cannot tax any by way of loans"——Thereupon he quoted the statute of 25 Edward III. wherein it is said, that "loans against the will of the subject, are against reason, and the franchises of the land." Another, speaking of the imprisonment of those who had refused to lend the King money, said,——"O improvident ancestors! O unwise forefathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and liberties of Parliament, and to neglect our persons and bodies, and to let them die in prison, and that durante beneplacito, remediless: if this be law, what do we talk of our liberties? Why do we trouble ourselves with the dispute of law, franchises, propriety of good? What may a man call his, if not liberty?"

The court-party durst not oppose this general sentiment, but endeavoured by several arguments, to intimate, that to gain his Majesty's good will, supplies were in the first place to be granted. Then, they gave hopes, that the King, moved with such a mark of affection for his person, would not be against redressing the grievances. To make a diversion, Secretary Coke presented to the House certain propositions from the King, concerning supply; but it was resolved, that the reading thereof shall be deferred till the House had taken some resolution with respect to the grievances, especially the imprisonment of the subjects, and denial of bail. There were very great debates upon these points, and the Judges themselves were heard. At last, the House came to the following resolutions, directly contrary to the King's pretensions, and the Judges' determinations: that is, they established maxims opposite to those of the King; namely,

"I. That no freeman ought to be detained or kept in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint, be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained.

"II. That the writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, he praying the same.

"III. That if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint being expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same be returned upon a Habeas Corpus, granted for the said party, then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

"IV. That it is the ancient and indubitable right of every freeman, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded or levied by the King, or any of his ministers, without common consent by act of Parliament."

A. D. 1628.] The propositions tendered the day before, by Secretary Coke, from his Majesty, were now received and read, as follows:—

"To furnish with men and victuals thirty ships to guard the narrow seas, and along the coasts; to set out ten other ships for the relief of the town of Rochelle; to set out ten other ships for the preservation of the Elbe, the Sound, and the Baltic sea; to levy arms, clothe, victual, pay, and transport an army of ten thousand horse, and ten thousand foot, for foreign service; to pay and supply six thousand more for the service of Denmark; to supply the forts of the office of ordnance; to supply the stores of the navy; to build twenty ships yearly for the increase of the navy; to repair the forts within the land; to pay the arrears of the office of ordnance; to pay the arrears of the victuallers' office; to pay the arrears of the treasure of the navy; to pay the arrears due for the freight of divers merchant-ships employed in his Majesty's service; and to provide a magazine for victuals for land and sea-service."

The House easily perceived, by the reading of these articles, that it would be a work of infinite labour, to examine the necessity and justice of each; and as there were no estimates made, they plainly saw, if they should take the particulars into consideration, the court would mount the expence very high. Wherefore, without entering into any discussion, they resolved in general to grant the King a large supply.

After that, they returned to the examination of this particular grievance, that the King's council, by their bare authority, had confined to their houses, some that refused to lend money; had sent away others to distant places from their homes; and constrained some, on the same account, to go and serve the King in foreign countries. Upon this point, Sir Thomas Wentworth said, "If any man owe a man a displeasure, and shall procure him to be put into foreign employment, it will be a matter of high concernment to the subject: We know the honour and justice of the King, but we know not what his ministers, or the mediation of Ambassadors may do, to work their own wrath upon any man." These debates produced this resolution:

"That no freeman ought to be confined by any command from the King, or Privy-Council, or any other, unless it be by act of Parliament, or by other due course, or warrant of law."

All these determinations promised the King no good with respect to his prerogative; and as he feared the Commons would again attack the Duke of Buckingham, he tried to divert them from it by a message delivered to the House by Secretary Coke. It was upon a rumour, that the Duke had spoken ill of the Parliament at the council-board. The King assured, that it was not true, and the Secretary added, if the Duke had so spoken, he would have contradicted himself, for the whole council could bear him witness, he was the first mover of calling the Parliament.

The next day, the King sent another message to the Commons, desiring them to take the affair of supply into consideration. He told them likewise, that, as to the freedom of persons, and propriety of goods, he was willing to come into any expedients which should be judged convenient, by way of bill, or otherwise; and that the more confidence they should shew in his grace and goodness, the more they should prevail to obtain their desires.

Upon this message, the House unanimously voted five subsidies to the King,* but returned immediately to the examination of grievances, and held a conference with the Lords upon that subject.

Easter holidays approaching, the King sent and desired the Commons not to adjourn, that affairs might be the more speedily dispatched. This message occasioned a debate, some members fearing such a precedent might be a prejudice to the privileges of the House, and the King for the future think he had power to hinder an adjournment when he pleased. But at length it was resolved to do as the King desired.

The 11th of April, Secretary Coke moved the dispatch of the subsidies, saying, the votes to grant the King money were nothing till turned into a bill. But being opposed by several, it was resolved, that grievances and supply should go hand in hand.

The day following, Coke brought another message from the King to the House, to this effect: "That his Majesty had long since expected some fruit of that which was so happily begun; but finding a stop beyond all expectation, his command was, that without any further delay, they should proceed in the affair of supply. For, notwithstanding his consenting that supply and grievances should go together, his meaning was not, that the one should give interruption to the other, nor the time be spun out on any pretence. And therefore bade them take heed, that they did not force him to make an unpleasing end of what was so well begun."

This message did the King great injury.

I. Because of the threatening.

II. By reason of his instances, that the affair of supply should be dispatched before that of grievances: for it was not doubted, that if the first were finished, the Parliament would be immediately prorogued.

III. Lastly, the King's unwillingness to redress the grievances, was a clear evidence, he would never be brought to it of his own accord, and consequently it was necessary to constrain him thereto. This was the more probable, as Coke, when he delivered the message, added, "That the King would willingly hear any thing concerning the abuses of power, but not about power itself." These expressions were liable to many cavils, and plainly intimated, that the King reserved to himself, by this restriction, a means to evade the grievances. And indeed, Coke being moved to explain what he meant by the word power, refused it.

Two days after, the Secretary delivered another message from the King, to hasten the affair of supply. These messages, which came thus one upon another, gave frequent occasions to the court-party to press the House to content his Majesty. All their speeches upon this head met in one point; namely, to inspire the House with a dread, that a quarrel between them and the King, would be fatal to Parliaments, and give the King occasion to proceed without them for the future.†

The Commons, therefore, resolved to desire an audience, in order to answer all his Majesty's messages, and to present to him, withal, a petition concerning the billeting of soldiers upon the subject.

The manner in which the King and the Commons transacted their affairs together is very pleasant. There was nothing but evasion and artifice on both sides. They expressed not their real thoughts when they spoke to each other, and yet they understood each other perfectly. The King took advantage of the Commons' using obscure insinuations, instead of speaking plainly. On the other hand, though the King had no design to redress grievances, he would have it thought, he intended it as soon as the affair of supply was dispatched. He accordingly advised them to avoid disputations, and to proceed with the necessary business of supply, relying on him for the necessary preservation of their true liberties; lest both his prerogative and their freedom might be put to hazard in favour of the enemy.

The Commons had prepared a petition to be presented to the King in the name of both Houses, to which they desired the concurrence of the Lords. This petition was termed the Petition of Right, because it was pretended not to desire of the King any grace or favour, but only the maintenance of the liberties of the subject. For this reason, it was to be solemnly presented to the King on his throne, by way of bill, and the King was to reply to it in a parliamentary manner. A draught of it had been sent to the Lords for their concurrence.‡ The King was alarmed at it. He was desirous to avoid receiving such a petition, which too plainly established the rights of the people, because he saw, if he rejected it, he should lose the five subsidies, the bill not being yet passed. On the other hand, in granting the contents of the petition, he himself tied up his hands for the future, and confessed withal, that the acts of authority he had hitherto exercised, were contrary to law. Into this streight precisely it was that the Commons meant to draw him by the Petition of Right. Wherefore he omitted nothing in his power to divert this blow. As he had a great influence in the Upper House, he so managed, that the Lords, by pretending to agree with the Commons upon the substance of the petition, moved the praying his Majesty to make the following declarations:—

"I. That the good old law called Magna Charta, and the six statutes, conceived to be declarations and explanations of that law, do still stand in force to all intents and purposes.

"II. That his Majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, that according to Magna Charta, and the statutes afore-named, as also according to the most ancient customs and laws of this land, every free subject

* The King thankfully received them, and acknowledged it the greatest gift that ever was given in Parliament. He added, that he liked Parliaments at the first, though, since, he was grown to a distaste of them; but now he loves them, and shall rejoice to meet with his people often.

† As the King himself, and the Lord Keeper (by his order) had frequently made use of the same means to frighten the Commons, it could not be doubted, that these men spoke pursuant to the intentions, and perhaps by the order, of the court. A Privy-Counsellor's speech in the Lower House last Parliament was not yet forgotten, and of which the Commons had thought fit to take notice, in the remonstrance they would have presented to the King. The design of that speech was to intimate to the Commons, that if they did not content the King, they would run the risque of being the cause of no more Parliaments in England. This threat, so often insinuated by the King himself, by the Lord Keeper, by members of the House known to be devoted to the court, sometimes in dark, sometimes in plain terms, had a quite contrary effect to what the King expected. Instead of terrifying the Commons, it convinced them, how watchful they ought to be of the King's proceedings, lest their condescension, or even their silence, should authorise some things very prejudicial to the liberties of the nation, whom they represented. "What!" said most of the members among themselves, "we are threatened, that if we do not grant the King whatever he requires, and when he pleases; if we oppose his pleasure, even when contrary to the laws, he will govern without a Parliament, that is, with an unlimited power; he will imprison our persons, sieze our estates, and consider the whole kingdom as his property! But he does not only threaten us, he has put his threats in execution already. Which then is best, either for him to usurp an absolute power against our will, or for us to suffer it, nay, approve it by our silence, and servile fears? Of the two, certainly the first is least dangerous. A time may come, when the King shall have occasion for Parliaments, and then we shall be able to recover the ground we shall have lost. But if we betray the interest of our country, by tamely yielding to the King the power he would assume, our liberty will be irrecoverably lost. We shall lay upon ourselves and posterity, a yoke which our forefathers could never bear, and be held in abhorrence by the whole nation. And after all, what shall we gain by our condescension? Why, the King will continue the use of Parliaments, provided he shall be absolute master; order them to give him such a sum, and by such a time; forbid them to examine grievances; in a word, manage them entirely as he pleases. Thus we shall prevent the King's governing without a Parliament, but shall establish a precedent which will render Parliaments for ever slaves to the King and his ministers."

‡ The King's serjeant, Ashley, said in his discourse, that "the propositions made by the Commons tended rather to anarchy than monarchy, and that they must allow the King to govern by acts of State." For which the Lords committed him, and he recanted.

of this realm hath a fundamental property in his goods, and a fundamental liberty of his person.

"III. That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to declare, that it is his royal pleasure to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful subjects, all their ancient, several, just liberties, privileges, and rights, in as ample and beneficial a manner, to all intents and purposes, as their ancestors did enjoy the same under the best of his most noble progenitors.

"IV. That his Majesty would be further pleased graciously to declare, for the good content of his loyal subjects, and for the securing them from future fear, that in all cases within the cognizances of the common-law, concerning the liberties of the subject, his Majesty would proceed according to the common law of this land, and according to the laws established in the kingdom, and in no other manner or wise.

"V. As touching his Majesty's royal prerogative, intrinsical to his Sovereignty, and betrusted him withal from God, ad communem totius populi salutem, et non ad destructionem, that his Majesty would resolve, not to use or divert the same, to the prejudice of any of his loyal people in the property of their goods, or liberty of their persons: and in case, for the security of his Majesty's royal person, the common safety of his people, or the peaceable government of this kingdom, his Majesty shall find just cause, for reason of state, to imprison or restrain any man's person, his Majesty would graciously declare, that within a convenient time he shall, and will, express the cause of the commitment or restraint, either general or special; and upon a cause so expressed, will leave him immediately to be tried according to the common justice of the kingdom."

But the Commons avoided the snare, plainly perceiving it was only an artifice to evade the Petition of Right, which would become useless, after these declarations. Indeed, there was a great difference between these declarations, and what was required in the petition. The declarations were all expressed in general terms, which gave the King room to cavil upon the performance of each article, as he had done in the affair of the loans, and the imprisonment of those that refused to comply. In those cases, the King did not pretend to act contrary to the laws, but rather thought himself authorized by the law; and the Judges of the realm had countenanced his pretensions. But the Petition of Right was more full and express, and left but little room for cavils. On the other hand the difference was not less, between the direct and Parliamentary reply demanded by the Commons, and the bare and general declarations which were not capable of contenting the people. So, the Commons entirely rejected the proposition of the Lords.

The King, not succeeding in his design, by means of the Upper-House, tried to satisfy the Commons, by making them, of his own accord, the same offers the Lords had seemed only to desire of him. To that purpose, having sent for both Houses to Whitehall, the Lord-Keeper, in his presence, addressed them in a very artful speech on the subject. The Commons, however, avoided this snare, as the former, and firmly adhered to the Petition of Right. A few days after, Secretary Coke brought a fresh message from the King, to know whether the House would rest on his royal word, declared to them by the Lord Keeper; which if they would do, he assured them, it should be royally performed.

This message occasioned great debates, because Coke and the rest of the court-party used their utmost endeavours, to persuade the House to what the King proposed, that is, to lay aside the Petition of Right, and rest upon his Majesty's promise. Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the debate, saying, "That never House of Parliament trusted more in the goodness of their King, for their own private persons, than the present, but we are ambitious that his Majesty's goodness may remain to posterity, and we are accountable to a public trust: and therefore, seeing there hath been a public violation of the laws by his ministers, nothing will satisfy him but a public amends; and our desires to vindicate the subject's right by bill, are no more than are laid down in former laws, with some modest provision for instruction, performance, and execution." This so well agreed with the sense of the House, that they made it the subject of a message, to be delivered by the Speaker, to his Majesty.

Amidst those deliberations, another message was delivered from his Majesty, by Secretary Coke, to this effect: "That howsoever we proceed in this business we have in hand, which his Majesty will not doubt, but to be according to our constant profession, and so as he may have cause to give us thanks; yet his resolution is, that both his royal care, and hearty and tender affection towards all his loving subjects, shall appear to the whole kingdom, and all the world, that he will govern us according to the laws and customs of this realm; that he will maintain us in the liberties of our persons, and properties of our goods, so as we may enjoy as much happiness as our forefathers in their best times; and, that he will rectify what hath been, or may be, found amiss among us, so that hereafter there may be no just cause to complain. Wherein, as his Majesty will rank himself amongst the best of King's, and show he hath no intention to invade or impeach our lawful liberties, or right; so he will have us to match ourselves with the best subjects, not by incroaching upon that sovereignty or prerogative, which God hath put into his hands for our good, but by containing ourselves within the bounds and laws of our forefathers, without restraining them, or enlarging them by new explanations, interpretations, expositions, or additions in any sort, which he telleth us, he will not give way unto.

"That the weight of the affairs of the kingdom and Christendom do press him more and more, and that the time is now grown to that point of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; so as this session of Parliament must continue no longer than Tuesday come seven-night at the furthest: in which time his Majesty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promised; and if the House be not as ready to do what is fit for themselves, it shall be their own faults.

"And upon assurance of our good dispatch and correspondence, his Majesty declareth, that his royal intention is to have another session of Parliament at Michaelmas next, for the perfecting of such things as cannot now be done."

All this was not able to divert the Commons from their purpose of turning the Petition of Right into an act of Parliament. The threat of putting an end to the session frightened them not, the King having gone too far to recede. The only point was to know, whether he would grant by bill, what he was willing to grant any other way; and he could not break with the Parliament on that account, without forfeiting entirely the love of his people, and losing the five subsidies. So the Commons would not miss this opportunity of firmly establishing the rights of the subject; but, through the medium of their Speaker, they respectfully informed the King, that no less than a public remedy would raise the dejected hearts of his loving subjects, to a cheerful supply for his Majesty, or make them receive content in the proceedings of this House.

His Majesty, in his answer, delivered by the Lord Keeper, still endeavoured to evade the demand. Yet, said the Lord Keeper, to show clearly the sincerity of his Majesty's intentions, he is content that a bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta, and the other six statutes, insisted upon for the subjects' liberties, if he shall chuse that as the best way; but so as it may be without additions, paraphrases, or explanations.

Secretary Coke also pressed the House to rely on the King's word, notwithstanding the intimation of his good pleasure for a bill. "The matter fallen now into consideration," said he, "is what way to take, whether to rely on his Majesty's word, or on a bill: If we will consider the advantage we have in taking his Majesty's word, it will be of the largest extent, and we shall chuse that that hath most assurance; an act of Parliament is by the the consent of the King and Parliament; but this assurance by word, is, that he will govern us by the laws; the King promises that, and also, that they shall be so executed, that we shall enjoy as much freedom as ever: this contains many laws, and a grant of all good laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of those very laws; assurance, which binds the King further than the law can: first, it binds his affection, which is the greatest bond between King and subject, and that binds his judgment also, nay, his honour, and that not at home, but abroad; the royal word of a King is the ground of all treaty; nay, it binds his conscience: this confirmation between both Houses, is in nature of a vow; for my part, I think it is the greatest advantage to rely on his Majesty's word." He further added, "this debate was fitter to be done before the House, and not before the committee, and that it was a new course to go to a committee of the whole House."

The Commons, however, did not think proper to receive the secretary's instructions, or alter their usual method. The House therefore was turned into a committee, to take into consideration, all that could be said for or against what the King desired. The general sense of the House was expressed as follows, by one of the members, with whom the majority agreed:—

"Was it ever known," said he, "that general words were a sufficient satisfaction to particular grievances? Was ever a verbal declaration of the King, verbum regni? When grievances be, the Parliament is to redress them. Did ever Parliament rely on messages? They put up petitions of their grievances, and the King never answered them: the King's answer is very gracious; but what is the law of the realm? that is the question. I put no diffidence in his Majesty: the King must speak by a record, and in particulars, and not in general. Did you ever know the King's message come into a bill of subsidies? All succeeding Kings will say, ye must trust me as well as ye did my predecessors, and trust my messages; but messages of love never came into a Parliament. Let us put up a Petition of Right: not that I distrust the King, but that I cannot take his trust, but in a Parliamentary way."

As the Commons had resolved that supply and grievances should go hand in hand, the Petition of Right was no sooner ready, but they made a further progress in the affair of the subsidies, ordering that the two first should be paid the 10th of July, one more the 12th of October, another the 20th of December, and the last the 1st of March. This was done to take from the King all pretence of complaining, that the affair of supply was neglected; but this did not satisfy him. He wished the subsidy bill to be drawn and passed, before the Petition of Right was presented to him, which the Commons were fully resolved not to do, being persuaded, that as soon as the subsidy bill should be passed, the Parliament would be prorogued or dissolved. So, that same day, they sent the Petition of Right to the Lords for their concurrence.*

The Lords, being employed in examining the Petition of Right, desired a conference with the Commons, when the Lord Keeper said, he had proposed to the House, some alterations in the petition, to render it less harsh, and more agreeable to his Majesty, to the end, what was desired might be the more readily obtained. The Lords moved, the adding to the petition a clause which would have rendered it useless, at least, according to the court's intention, by whom the House of Lords was directed. The additional clause was as follows:

"We present this our humble petition to your Majesty, with the care not only of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that sovereign power wherewith your Majesty is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people."

This addition was examined and debated with great exactness in the House of Commons, and the general opinion was, that it ought to be rejected, chiefly for three reasons. The first, because of the ambiguity of the words Sovereign Power, which the Parliaments had never used in speaking of the King's prerogatives. The second, because this addition was in the nature of a saving of the King's sovereignty, which rendered the petition of no force. It was alledged, that, in the reign of Edward I. the Parliament having presented the like petition to the King, he would have added these words, "Saving the King's right and sovereignty;" but the Parliament would not consent to it, because such savings render useless whatever they are annexed to. It was said likewise, that, for the same reason, the Kings would never suffer the clergy to insert in any of their acts, "Saving the honour of God and the church." The third reason was, that if this addition was general, and had no reference to the petition, there was no need of admitting it. But if, on the contrary, it did refer to the petition, it evidently rendered the petition of no effect.

This clause being thus rejected by the Commons, the Lords durst not throw out the petition on account of this addition, which in truth, was not absolutely necessary. So, being satisfied with giving the King this testimony of their affection for his service, they insisted no longer upon the additional clause. Then the two Houses resolved to present the petition to the King, and to pray his Majesty to give his answer in full Parliament, that it might be enrolled and serve hereafter for rule to the courts of justice, as an act of Parliament.† The 2d of June, the King came to the Parliament to give the royal assent to the Petition of Right, and

* It was carried up by Sir Edward Coke, Sir Dudley Diggs, and Mr. Littleton. Six weeks were spent in hearing the King's council against the petition, and the Commons' defence of it.

† This important petition was as follows:—

"To the King's most excellent Majesty,

"Humbly shew unto our Sovereign Lord the King, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, that, whereas it is declared and enacted by a statute, made in the time of the reign of King Edward I. commonly called Statutum de Tallagio non Concedendo, that no tallage or aid should be laid or levied, by the King or his heirs, in this realm; without the good-will and assent of the Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons, Knights, Burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and by authority of Parliament holden in the five-and-twentieth year of the reign of King Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that from thenceforth no person should be compelled to make any loans to the King against his will, because such loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land; and by other laws of this realm it is provided, that none should be charged by any charge or imposition, called a benevolence nor by such like charge; by which the statutes before mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in Parliament.

"Yet nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have been issued, by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your Majesty, and many of them upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance, and give attendance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your Majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of the realm.

"And whereas also by the statute called, The Great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, that no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his Peers, or by the law of the land.

"And in the eight-and-twentieth year of the reign of King Edward III. it was declared and enacted by authority of Parliament, that no man of what estate or condition that he be, should be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

"Nevertheless against the tenor of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned, without any cause shewed; and when for their deliverance they were brought before your justices, by your Majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded and spoke thus to both Houses. However, instead of the usual concise and clear form, by which a bill is confirmed or rejected, Charles expressed himself as follows:—

"The King willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof, he holds himself in conscience as well obliged, as of his prerogative."

The Commons, surprised, and dissatisfied with the King's answer, made no haste to finish the affair of supply. On the contrary, they desired a conference with the Lords, where the point of commitments was thoroughly discussed. The thing in question was, the power assumed by the King to imprison the subjects, without declaring the cause, which the King had not lessened by his answer, though it was one of the chief motives of the Petition of Right. Wherefore the Commons, instead of proceeding with the subsidy bill, returned to the consideration of grievances. On this occasion, and at the instance of the Commons, the Lords passed upon Dr. Manwaring, the sentence already mentioned.

The King, seeing the Commons otherwise employed than in the business of subsidies, sent them a message, apprising them, that the session was drawing near to a conclusion, and desiring that they would not enter upon new business, or cast any aspersions on his government and ministry.

This message made the Commons believe, the Duke of Buckingham had done them ill offices with the King. This was mentioned in the House, and Sir John Elliot standing up, and beginning to speak in such manner that it was thought he was going to fall upon the favourite and ministry, the Speaker started from the chair, and said, "There is a command laid upon me, that I must command you not to proceed." Whereupon Elliot sat down. But others more bold proposed to go and show their dangers to the Lords, and then carry their complaints together to the King. Some of the court party saying, that the speech lately spoken by Sir John Elliot had given offence to his Majesty, the House declared: "That every member is free from any undutiful speech, from the beginning of the Parliament to that day;" and ordered, that the House be turned into a committee, to consider what is fit to be done for the safety of the kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of going to the Tower. But Sir John Finch, the Speaker, desiring leave to go out, obtained it, and immediately informed the King of what was passing in the House. In his absence it was debated, and was about to be voted by a majority, to make a remonstrance to the King, wherein it should be said that the Duke of Buckingham was the chief cause of all the miseries of the kingdom. But before the debate was ended, the Speaker returned with a message from the King, commanding the House to adjourn till next day, and all committees to cease in the meantime. The Lords received the same order. On the morrow the Speaker brought another message from the King; but, the Commons not being more satisfied with this message than the former, the House was again turned into a committee, and considered of some more heads to be inserted in the remonstrance, particularly the King's design to bring into the nation foreign forces.*

At the same time, the Commons sent a message to the Lords, to desire their concurrence in an humble petition to the King, that a clear and satisfactory answer be given by his Majesty in full Parliament to the Petition of Right; to which the Lords consented. The King knew then, it was not possible for him to avoid giving such an answer as the Parliament desired, and therefore at last to do it with a good grace, otherwise he saw plainly the affair of supply would be for ever delayed. So, coming to the Parliament the 7th of June, he pronounced the usual form of words: Soit droit fait comme il est desiré (Let it be law as is desired) C. R.

The Commons being satisfied upon this point, began seriously to proceed with the bill of subsidies, but in such a manner, that they made the consideration of grievances go hand in hand with it, knowing, as soon as the money bill was passed, the King would put an end to the session. They began, therefore, with examining a commission, whereby the King had authocommanded to certify the causes of their detainer; no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your Majesty's special command, signified by the Lords of your privy-council, and yet were returned back to several prisons without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to the law.

"And whereas of late great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants against their wills have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

"And whereas also by authority of Parliament in the 25th year of the reign of King Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that no man should be fore-judged of life or limb, against the form of the Great Charter, and the law of the land, and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be adjudged to death, but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of Parliament: and whereas no offender of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm; nevertheless, of late time, divers commissions under your Majesty's great seal have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever; and by summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death according to the law martial.

"By pretext whereof, some of your Majesty's subjects have been by some of the said commissioners put to death, when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

"And also sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof, claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishments due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused, or forborne to proceed against such offenders according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid; which commissions, and all others of like nature, are wholely and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm.

"They do therefore humbly pray your most excellent Majesty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of Parliament; and that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: and that your Majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be so burthened in the time to come: and that the aforesaid commissions for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled; and that hereafter, no commissions of like nature may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, least by colour of them, any of your Majesty's subjects be destroyed or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

"All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent Majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your Majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your Majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that, in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your Majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom."

* This complaint was grounded upon a discovery the House had made of a privy seal, expressed in these words:—

"Charles, by the grace of God, &c.

"To the treasurer, and under treasurer for our exchequer for the time being, greeting: we do hereby will and command you, out of our treasury, remaining in the receipt of our said exchequer, forthwith to pay, or cause to be paid unto Philip Burlemac of London, merchant, the sum of thirty thousand pounds, to be paid by him over by bill of exchange into the Low Countries, and Germany, unto our trusty and well beloved Sir William Balfour, Knight, and John Dolbier Esq. or either of them, for levying and providing certain numbers of horses, with arms for horse and foot, to be brought over into this kingdom for our service, viz. &c."

Burlemac was called into the House, where he confessed that he had received the money here mentioned.

rised and required a certain number of Lords and gentlemen to consider of the best and speediest means for raising money upon the people by way of imposition or otherwise. After a conference with the Lords, they voted that the commission should be inserted in the remonstrance they were to present to the King.

Then they entered upon the examination of Buckingham's conduct. He was charged with being the cause of all the evils to the kingdoms, of the losses at sea, of the decay of trade, of the disasters to the armies, and of countenancing Arminianism and Popery. In short, the House came to this resolution, "That the excessive power of the Duke of Buckingham is the cause of the evils and dangers to the King and kingdom, and that this be added to the remonstrance;" and a few days after voted, "that Dr. Neile, Bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Laud, Bishop of Bath and Wells, be named to be those about the King, who are suspected to be Arminians."*

The Commons, though they had already granted the King the supply of five subsidies, still retained a pledge in their hands, which they thought ensured them success in all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by Parliament; and the Commons had artfully, this session, concealed their intention of invading that branch of revenue, till the royal assent had been obtained to the Petition of Right, which they justly deemed of such importance. They then openly asserted, that the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of Parliament, was a palpable violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an open infringement of the Petition of Right, so lately granted. The King, in order to prevent the finishing and presenting of their intended remonstrance on the subject, came suddenly to the Parliament, and ended this session by a prorogation, on the 26th of June.

Presently after the prorogation of the Parliament, the King published several proclamations. The first was to suppress Dr. Manwaring's sermons, intituled, "Religion, and Allegiance." But this suppression consisted only in an order to such as had any copies of these sermons, to deliver them to the secretary of state, or some other magistrate.

By another proclamation, Richard Smith, titular Bishop of Chalcedon, was ordered to be apprehended, with all other priests and jesuits that had taken orders by authority from the see of Rome, and after conviction to be committed to the castle of Wisbech. Some Jesuits having been taken and sent to Newgate, the King ordered, that if they were found guilty, they should be carried to the same castle of Wisbech in the Isle of Ely. These were all the proceedings of the court against the Papists.

On the other hand, the King took a course which gave a much worse opinion of his own, or his ministers' zeal for religion. First, he appointed commissioners to compound with recusants. Secondly, Sir Richard Weston, a known Papist, was made Lord Treasurer, and afterwards Earl of Portland. Thirdly, Dr. Laud, who was considered as head of the Arminians, in the judgment of the House of Commons, was translated from Bath and Wells, to the Bishopric of London. Fourthly, Dr. Montague, who had given so great offence by his book, intituled, "An Appeal to Cæsar," was promoted to the see of Chichester.†

The town of Rochelle being at this time closely besieged by the King of France, the King had prepared a fleet to relieve it, and the Duke of Buckingham, who was to have the command, was now at Portsmouth. But when he was going to embark, he was stabbed to the heart with a knife, and immediately died. The assassin was one John Felton, a Lieutenant, who owned, that after the declaration of the Commons, against the Duke, he had looked upon him as an enemy to his country, and had been thereby induced to commit the deed. It appeared by his trial, that he had no accomplice, and was led to this wicked action by an excess of zeal.‡ The King, being then at Sir Daniel Norton's, near Portsmouth seemed extremely concerned for the Duke's death, and, to give him, even after his death, continual marks of his affection, his creatures remained in the same favour and posts they had enjoyed in the life-time of their protector.

Meanwhile, as the relief of Rochelle could not be delayed any longer, the King sent away the fleet designed for that purpose. But Cardinal Richelieu had used so great diligence, that the barricado he was making, to hinder the approach of the English ships, was finished, so that the fleet was forced to return without effecting any thing, after having seen Rochelle taken.§

* In this remonstrance, the Commons recapitulated all national grievances and misfortunes, and omitted no circumstance which could render the whole administration despicable and odious. The compositions with Catholics, they said, amounted to no less than a toleration, hateful to God, full of dishonour and disprofit to his Majesty, and of extreme scandal and grief to his good people: they took notice of the violations of the liberty of the subject, against which the Petition of Right seems to have provided a sufficient remedy; they mentioned the decay of trade, the unsuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the Isle of Rhé, the encouragement given to Arminians, the commission for transporting German horse, that for levying illegal impositions; and all these grievances they ascribed solely to the ill conduct of the Duke of Buckingham.

† Manwaring also (having with Montague procured a royal pardon of all errors) was, notwithstanding his being disabled by the House of Lords from all future preferments, immediately presented to the rectory of Stamford Rivers, with a dispensation to hold St. Giles's in the Fields.

‡ Felton was of a good family, but of an ardent melancholic temper. He had served under the Duke in the station of Lieutenant. His Captain being killed in the retreat at the Isle of Rhé, Felton had applied for the company; and when disappointed, he threw up his commission, and retired in discontent from the army. While private resentment was boiling in his sullen, unsociable mind, he heard the nation resound with complaints against the Duke; and he met with the remonstrance of the Commons, in which his enemy was represented as the cause of every national grievance, and as the great enemy of the public. Religious fanaticism further inflamed these vindicative reflections; and he fancied that he should do heaven acceptable service, if, at one blow, he dispatched this dangerous foe to religion and his country. Full of these dark views he secretly arrived at Portsmouth, at the same time with the Duke, and watched for an opportunity of effecting his bloody purpose.—Buckingham had been engaged in conversation with Soubize and other French gentlemen; and a difference of sentiment having arisen, the dispute, though conducted with temper and decency, had produced some of those vehement gesticulations and lively exertions of voice, in which that nation, more than the English, are apt to indulge themselves. The conversation being finished, the Duke drew towards the door; and in that passage, turning himself to speak to Sir Thomas Friar, a Colonel in the army, he was on a sudden, over Sir Thomas's shoulder, struck upon the breast with a knife. Without uttering other words than "The villain has killed me," in the same moment pulling out the knife, he breathed his last. No man had seen the blow, nor the person who gave it; but in the confusion, every one made his own conjecture; and all agreed that the murder had been committed by the French gentlemen, whose angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been understood by the by-standers. In the hurry of revenge, they had instantly been put to death, had they not been saved by some of more temper and judgment, who, though they had the same opinion of their guilt, thought proper to reserve them for a judicial trial and examination.—Near the door there was found a hat, in the inside of which was sewed a paper, containing four or five lines of that remonstrance of the Commons which declared Buckingham an enemy of the kingdom; and under these lines was a short ejaculation, or attempt towards a prayer. It was easily concluded that this hat belonged to the assassin: but the difficulty still remained, "Who that person should be?" For the writing discovered not the name, and, whoever he was, it was natural to believe that he had already fled far enough not to be found without a hat. In this hurry, a man without a hat was seen walking very composedly before the door. One crying out, "Here is the fellow who killed the Duke," every body ran to ask, "Which is he?" The man very sedately answered, "I am he." The more furious immediately rushed upon him with drawn swords: others, more deliberate, defended and protected him: he himself, with open arms, calmly and cheerfully exposed his breast to the swords of the most enraged; being willing to fall a sudden sacrifice to their anger, rather than be reserved for that public justice which, he knew, must be executed upon him. He was now known to be that Felton who had served in the army. Being carried into a private room, it was thought proper so far to dissemble as to tell him, that Buckingham was indeed grievously wounded, but not without hopes of recovery. Felton smiled, and told them, that the Duke, he knew, full well, had received a blow which had terminated all their hopes. When asked, at whose instigation he had performed that horrid deed? he replied, that they needed not to trouble themselves in that inquiry; hat no man living had credit enough with him to have disposed him to such an action; that he had not even entrusted his purpose to any one; that the resolution proceeded only from himself, and the impulse of his own conscience; and that his motives would appear, if his hat were found: for that, believing he should perish in the attempt, he had there taken care to explain them.

§ It had held out so long, that prodigious numbers had died of the famine, so that at the taking of it, there were not four thousand remaining alive, out of fifteen thousand.

The meeting of the Parliament, appointed to be the 20th of October, was by proclamation prorogued to the 10th of January. In this interval, certain cases happened which supplied the Parliament with a fresh occasion of complaint, and in the end caused their dissolution. Though the remonstrance concerning tonnage and poundage was not presented to the King, it was public, and sufficient to show the people what was the sense of the House of Commons. Upon this foundation three merchants among others, refused to pay this duty to the King. Rolls, one of the three, merchant of London, and member of the House of Commons, having refused it, as contrary to law, the officers of the customs seized his goods, and, upon his alledging the authority of Parliament, one of them insolently told him, "If all the Parliament were in you, we would take your goods." Chambers and Vassal, the other two merchants of London, the first of whom was alderman, were condemned to pay tonnage and poundage by the Barons of the Exchequer, who ordered their goods to be detained.

The Parliament meeting the 10th of January 1629, Rolls's affair was immediately laid before the House, and referred to a committee. Whilst the committee were in debate, the King sent a message to the House, willing them to desist till next day in the afternoon, at which time he would speak with them at Whitehall. The Lords having also received orders to be present, the King made a speech to both Houses; in which, amongst many mild and conciliatory expressions, he informed the Commons, that he had not taken the duties of tonnage and poundage as appertaining to his hereditary prerogative; but that it ever was, and still is, his meaning to enjoy them as a gift of his people; and that if he had hitherto levied tonnage and poundage, he pretended to justify himself only by the necessity of so doing, not by any right which he assumed.

Some days after, the King sent a message to the Commons, that the bill for tonnage and poundage might be speedily taken into consideration, and no time lost. But the Commons, not thinking the King had power to prescribe the time to them, fell upon matters of religion, particularly with regard to Arminianism: and finding that Laud, Montague, and Manwaring had been preferred since the last session, several members made great complaints. Though the King pressed them again by message, to proceed with the bill for tonnage and poundage, they pretended that religion ought to have the precedency of all other affairs. Wherefore, they began to inquire how the execution of the laws against Papists came to cease, and whence it was that Papists were employed and countenanced, and new ceremonies continually introduced, especially at Durham, by Dr. Cosins, as angels, saints, crucifixes, altars, candles on Candlemas day; and lastly, from whence proceeded the increase of Arminianism.

This inquiry was interrupted by a fresh message from the King, requiring them to give the preference to the bill for tonnage and poundage. Nevertheless he declared, that he meant not to interrupt their debates upon matters of religion, provided the House would not meddle with what did not belong to them. This message hindered them not from continuing their debates. The proclamation forbidding all disputes for and against Arminianism was complained of particularly, wherein it was said, "If there be any difference of opinion concerning the seasonable interpretation of the thirty-nine articles, the Bishops have power to order which they please." But, as some of the Bishops were suspected, it was concluded, that by the terms of the proclamation, the kingdom would be obliged to receive Popery or Arminianism, by following the determinations of the Bishops. These suspicions fell chiefly upon Laud and Neile, who, being the King's counsellors for matters of religion, governed almost all the other Bishops. Upon this account, the House, to prevent the dangers they feared, thought fit to enter into this vow:

"We the Commons in Parliament assembled, do claim, protest, and avow for truth, the sense of the articles of religion, which were established by Parliament in the thirteenth year of our late Queen Elizabeth, which by the public act of the church of England, and by the general and current expositions of the writers of our church, have been delivered unto us. And we reject the sense of the Jesuits and Arminians, and all others, wherein they differ from us."

As the intention of the Commons was to persuade the people that religion was in danger, they desired the concurrence of the Lords to petition the King for a fast, which they obtained with some difficulty. The King plainly perceived the design of this petition, and, though he did not think fit to reject it, answered, that the custom of fasting every session was but lately begun; that he granted it however for this time, though he did not see the necessity of it; but for the future would not grant a fast, except on extraordinary occasions. Adding, that as for the defence of the reformed churches abroad, fighting would do them more good than fasting.

As the King had frequently pressed the Commons to proceed with the bill for tonnage and poundage, and give it the precedency of matters of religion, they thought themselves obliged to present a declaration to the King to justify their conduct. They excused themselves two ways, for not giving precedency to the bill for tonnage and poundage. The first was, because matters of religion having been first proposed, the constant order of the House required, they should have the preference. The second was, the weight and importance of the concerns of religion. They concluded with thanking the King for his promises to maintain religion, thereby tacitly reproaching him for not performing them.

Whilst the Commons were in debate concerning religion, the warehouse of Mr. Rolls, merchant and member of Parliament, was locked up by a pursuivant, and himself called forth and served with a subpœna. This put the House in a flame, and occasioned the sending for the officers of the customs, to know upon what account they had seized the merchant's effects, and carried them to the King's store-house. They replied, it was for refusing to pay tonnage and poundage, and other duties. But because there was an information already preferred against the merchants in the Exchequer and star-chamber, the Commons resolved not to proceed with the bill of tonnage and poundage, till the goods were restored to the owners; and ordered that the Barons of the Exchequer should be told to make void their injunction concerning the detaining of the merchant's effects. The Barons returned for answer, that they did not, by their injunctions, determine, or any way touch upon, the right of tonnage and poundage, neither did they by their orders, bar the owners from suing for their goods in a lawful course; but whereas the merchants endeavoured to take their goods out of the King's possession by writs of replevin, which was no lawful course in the King's case, nor agreeable to his prerogative royal, therefore the court of Exchequer did stay those suits, and declare, that the owners, if they conceived themselves wronged, might take such remedy as the law allows. This answer, which signified nothing, not being satisfactory to the Commons, a motion was made to consider, whether ever the court of Exchequer held this course before, for the staying of replevins; and whether this had been done by prerogative of the King in his court of Exchequer.

This affair having been long debated in the House, the officers of the customs were sent for again, and answered, that they acted by virtue of a commission under the great seal. One of them said, "He had seized the goods for duties that were due in the time of King James, and that his Majesty had sent for him, and commanded him to make no other answer." Whereupon, the House being turned into a grand committee, a motion was made and seconded, whether the officers of the customs should be proceeded against, by separating their interest from that of the King. After several speeches pro and con, a report was made from the grand committee, that they had at last resolved, that Mr. Rolls ought to have privilege of person and goods; which which being voted, the Speaker was moved to put the question, but he refused to do it, saying the King had commanded the contrary. Such a command could not but surprise the House: they adjourned to the 25th of February, and then were further adjourned by his Majesty's order till the 2d of March. On that day the Commons being met, and requiring the Speaker to put the question, he said, "I have a command from the King to adjourn the House till the 10th of March." And endeavouring to go out of the chair, he was held down by force till Sir John Elliot had drawn a protestation, which was approved by the majority, though not without great tumult and confusion, and even some blows.* The doors being locked, the gentleman usher of the House of Lords, who was sent by the King, could not get admittance till the remonstrance was finished. By the King's order, he took the mace from the table, which ended their proceedings.

As the King expected no money from this second session, he was very glad to have, as he thought, a plausible pretence to dissolve the Parliament. So, that very day, a proclamation was drawn up, to give notice of his design to dissolve the Parliament on the 10th of March, and that the members might depart about their own affairs.

The next day, warrants were directed from the council to Denzil Hollis, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, and Benjamin Valentine, Esqs. commanding their personal appearance on the morrow. Four of them, Hollis, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine, appeared; and, refusing to answer out of Parliament, for what was said and done in the House, were committed close prisoners to the Tower. The council ordered at the same time, the studies of Hollis, Elliot, and Selden, to be sealed up; and a proclamation was published to apprehend them.†

The King's conduct, as well in dissolving the Parliament, as in what was done afterwards, could not but breed discontent among the people. Murmurs were every where heard: libels were dispersed about London against the King's counsellors, and particularly against Bishop Laud, and the Lord Treasurer Weston, who were accused of putting the King upon these violent proceedings. For this reason, the King, to prevent greater complaints, published a declaration to notify to the people the causes of the dissolution of the last Parliament. This declaration, however, or rather apology, produced not the effect, the King expected. It was very difficult for him to persuade the people, that a dozen members of Parliament had formed a project to subvert the government, to introduce anarchy, to usurp the royal authority, without any appearance of the least advantage to themselves or others. It would have been still more strange, that, supposing the King so just a Prince, and so tender of his people as he desired to be thought, these men should have had sufficient credit, to bring over the majority of the Commons to their sentiments. On the other hand, the King defended himself very weakly, in his declaration, on the articles concerning recusants, tonnage, and poundage, and in general, on the causes of the dissolution of the Parliament. For in aggravating the Commons' fault, in not instantly obeying the adjournment, he not only supposed his power incontestable, though it was not so, but also admitted the immediate cause of their non-compliance; namely, the Speaker's refusal, by his express command, to put the question, which was a manifest breach of the freedom of Parliament. Complaints, therefore, and murmurs continued more than ever. It was publicly said, the King intended utterly to destroy the Privileges of the Parliament, and the Liberties of the People; and what was done afterwards against the imprisoned members, helped not to undeceive the nation. It was added, that trade was ruined, and religion in danger, and that the kingdom was going to be enslaved, if these mischiefs were not redressed by a new Parliament. The King, being informed of these rumours, published a conciliatory proclamation; in which, amongst other things, he observed that it was not his intention to charge his subjects with any new burthens, but to satisfy himself with such duties as had been received by the King his father.

Rochelle being taken, the King did not think proper to continue a war with France, which could bring him no advantage, nor serve him for pretence to ask money of the Parliament, since he was determined not to call one. As France had no quarrel with him, but concerning the Queen's domestics, which was not a sufficient motive to continue the war, a peace was quickly concluded between the two crowns, by the mediation of the republic of Venice. It was signed the 14th of April, about a month after the dissolution of the Parliament. France so little cared for what had passed concerning the Queen's domestics, that she was satisfied with inserting this article in the treaty of peace: "The articles and contract of the marriage of the Queen of Great Britain are to be confirmed faithfully. And as for the said Queen's household, if there be any thing to be added or diminished, it shall be done by a mutual consent, freely and willingly, as it may be judged fit and convenient for the service of the said Queen." This peace was ratified in September following.

Charles I. like the King his father, was very fond of arbitrary power, and had no favourites or ministers, but what were of the same principles. His privy-council became by degrees an absolute court, which thought itself above the laws. The star chamber was another court, the most rigorous that ever was, the severity whereof fell chiefly upon those who pretended to dispute the prerogative royal. The high commission perfectly seconded the council and star chamber, and under colour of putting a stop to schism, oppressed, as Puritans, those that refused to submit to a despotic power. In short, the judges of the realm, being all chosen by the court, and devoted to the King, omitted no oppor-

* The Commons' Protestation:—

"I. Whosoever shall bring in innovation of religion, or by favour or countenance seem to extend or introduce Popery or Arminianism, or other opinion disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and common-wealth.

"II. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and common wealth.

"III. If any merchant or person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by Parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to the same."

† Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, Selden, Coriton, Long, and Stroud, were committed to prison, on account of the last tumult in the House, which was called sedition. With great difficulty, and after several delays, they were released; and the law was generally supposed to be wrested, in order to prolong their imprisonment. Sir John Elliot, Hollis, and Valentine, were summoned to their trial in the King's Bench, for seditious speeches and behaviour in Parliament; but, refusing to answer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of a superior, they were condemned to be imprisoned during the King's pleasure; to find sureties for their good behaviour; and to be fined, the two former a thousand pounds a-piece, the latter five hundred. This sentence, procured by the influence of the crown, served only to shew the King's disregard to the privileges of Parliament, and to acquire an immense stock of popularity to the sufferers, who had so bravely, in opposition to arbitrary power, defended the liberties of their native country. The Commons of England, though an immense body, and possessed of the greater part of national property, were naturally somewhat defenceless; because of their personal equality, and their want of leaders: but the King's severity, if these prosecutions deserve the name, here pointed out leaders to them whose resentment was inflamed, and whose courage was no-wise daunted by the hardships which they had undergone in so honourable a cause. So much did these prisoners glory in their sufferings, that though they were promised liberty on that condition, they would not condescend even to present a petition to the King, expressing their sorrow for having offended him. They unanimously refused to find sureties for their good behaviour; and disdained to accept of deliverance on such easy terms. Nay, Hollis was so industrious to continue his meritorious distress, that, when one offered to bail him, he would not yield to the rule of court, and be himself bound with his friend. Even Long, who had actually found sureties in the chief-justice's chamber, declared in court, that his sureties should no longer continue. Yet because Sir John Elliot happened to die while in custody, a great clamour was raised against the administration; and he was universally regarded as a martyr to the liberties of England.

tunity to support the prerogative royal, and raise it as high as the King desired. The Parliament alone could cure these disorders, but the King was determined to call no more, the maxims of the Parliament being diametrically opposite to his. He thought the Parliament had much encroached upon the prerogative royal, in the foregoing reigns, and the Parliament could not help dreading the consequences of the general maxims, which the King was endeavouring to introduce into the government; and the rather, as they saw plainly, these consequences were not bare speculation, but were put in practice. This dread induced them to deny the King some things readily granted by former Parliaments to his predecessors, because they were free from any such fears. But as the nation in general was more inclined to be ruled by the Parliament, than by the court, these contrasts bred in the minds of the people a distaste to the court, the fatal effects whereof the King afterwards experienced.

By the dissolution of the late Parliament, and by his resolution never to call another, which was universally known, the King had not only deprived himself of the extraordinary supplies he might have expected from the Commons, but had also done himself great prejudice with respect to his treasury. The five subsidies granted by the Parliament fell very short of what was expected. As every man's quota towards a subsidy is settled by commissioners in each county, and by assistants belonging to the towns and villages, in proportion to his possessions, either poverty, or decay of trade, or some such excuse was pleaded to lessen the tax. On the other hand, the commissioners and assistants not being inclined to the court, allowed very readily these excuses, and appeared much more apt to favour their countrymen than the King. This occasioned a great diminution of the usual value of the subsidies. Moreover tonnage and poundage were not paid without force. There was continual occasion to use violence, to seize the effects, and imprison the merchants, to oblige them to pay what the House of Commons had declared illegal. Besides, they practised a thousand artifices to defraud the King of a duty, which they thought was unjustly laid upon them. To cure these inconveniences, the council was forced to give very strict orders, even to the empowering of the officers of the customs to enter into any ship, vessel, or house; and to search in any trunk or chest, and break any bulk whatsoever, in default of the payment of customs. But, besides that this had never been practised before, another inconvenience arose. These officers, under colour of searching, used many oppressions and rogueries, which caused the people still the more to exclaim. In a word, the King had not half the profit from tonnage and poundage that he received before his quarrel with the Parliament; and the people were more dissatisfied than ever. But to hinder their discontent from turning into rebellion, the council gave strict orders to have the militia, both horse and foot, completed, armed, and instructed in the exercise of arms. It was thereby intended to intimidate the people, and keep them in awe, whilst, on the other hand, they were amused with orders for the rigorous execution of the laws against recusants. But these orders must have been neglected, since the people's complaints upon that subject never ceased during the whole course of this reign.

Meanwhile, as the King wanted money, and it was easy to foresee that his ordinary revenue would not be sufficient to supply his expences, the ministers found no better way to increase the King's revenue, than by granting monopolies. That is, the King, by his letters patent, formed companies, to whom alone he gave the privilege of selling certain goods or wares, and who were to pay him for it such a yearly revenue. This was directly contrary to the rights of the people, and very destructive to trade. This abuse went so far, that in a manner all sorts of commodities were monopolized, and the sale engrossed by some company, even to old rags.*

A. D. 1630.] Since the King had undertaken to make war upon France, the Spanish war was no more talked of than if there had been no such thing, though in all the speeches to the foregoing Parliaments, and in all the messages to the Commons, he had endeavoured to show how necessary this war was, for the welfare of all Europe, and especially of England. He had frequently insinuated, that England and Ireland were in so great danger of being invaded by the Spaniards, that it was not possible to be too speedy in applying a remedy to so urgent an evil. Yet, the Spaniards had never made any attempt which might confirm the fears, the King would have inspired the Parliament with. The King of Spain, contented with not being attacked, undertook nothing against England. However, after the conclusion of the peace between France and England, he thought proper to end the war with the English, to which he met with no obstacle, Charles not being in condition to continue it. So a peace between the two crowns, after some negotiation, was concluded in November.

Presbyterianism had lately gained ground in England, notwithstanding the strong opposition of the Bishops, and particularly of Laud, Bishop of London, sworn enemy to the Puritans. This prelate seldom missed any opportunity to show his hatred to them, and such opportunities very frequently offered. Besides that he was the King's most intimate counsellor, especially for ecclesiastical matters, he had almost the sole direction of the high commission. He so managed therefore, to prevent the growth of Presbyterianism, that the King sent certain instructions to the Archbishops, with a command to impart them to the Bishops of their provinces, in order to their being observed. The chief end of these instructions was to hinder any Presbyterian minister from creeping into the church of England, and to discover the careless observers of the rites prescribed by the canons. Laud himself was the author of these instructions, which were agreeable to some considerations for the better settling of the church government presented by him to the King some time before. As the Presbyterians were not ignorant whence the evil sprang, they entertained an implacable enmity to this prelate, the effects whereof they afterwards made him feel.

This year the King had the satisfaction of having a son, called Charles, of whom the Queen was delivered the 29th of May.

Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, had expressed a great desire to relieve Germany, oppressed by the Emperor, but his wars with Poland had prevented the execution of that design. Upon this account the Kings of France and England joined together to procure a peace between these two crowns, in which they ultimately succeeded. The French King's aim was to humble the house of Austria by this diversion; and Charles hoped, that, by the King of Sweden's means, he should recover the Palatinate for his brother-in-law. The peace, just mentioned, was no sooner concluded, than the King of Sweden prepared to enter Germany at the head of a powerful army. At the same time, he made a private agreement with the King of England, whereby Charles engaged to furnish him with six thousand men, in the Marquis of Hamilton's name, as though that Lord had raised these troops at his own charge. That we may not return to this affair, we shall just observe that Charles was the dupe of Gustavus. When the Swede, after several victories over the Imperialists, was able in his turn to assist the King of Bohemia, he would have laid such hard terms upon him, that he could not think of accepting them. So Charles withdrew his troops, which had done good service in the war, and recalled Sir Henry Vane, who was with the King of Sweden, in quality of ambassa-

* Thus, as the Lord Clarendon observes, "Unjust projects of all kinds, many ridiculous, many scandalous, all very grievous, were set on foot; the envy and reproach of which came to the King, the profit to other men; insomuch that of 200,000*l.* drawn by these ways in one year, scarce 1500*l.* came to the King."

dor. Thus ended this sort of league, the particulars whereof it is needless to relate.

The King's ordinary revenues not sufficing for his expences, it was necessary to find means to raise a further supply. One of these means was, to attack such as had neglected to receive the order of knighthood, at the King's coronation, though they had been summoned.*

Multitudes being summoned upon this occasion, the compositions brought the King above a hundred thousand pounds. This was looked upon afterwards as a grievous oppression, and the Parliament repealed the statute on which it was grounded.

The church of England, at the reformation, had thought fit to retain some ceremonies, not as absolutely necessary, but rather as indifferent, and which consequently she believed it not proper to remove from the divine service. Bishop Laud was not only scrupulously attached to the ceremonies, but also to every thing that served to adorn the externals of religion, and seemed more inclined to increase the number than to suppress any of those that most offended the Puritans. He gave a proof of this inclination, when he consecrated St. Catherine Creed church, which had been lately repaired. On this occasion he used some formalities which he might have forborne, as being too like what are practised in the church of Rome on such solemnities.†

A. D. 1631.] If Laud had taken the ceremonies from a ritual of the church of England, made since the reformation, there would have been nothing to object. But, some years after, the House of Commons accused him in form, of having exactly copied the Roman Pontifical, which was found in his study. He denied it, alledging two seemingly very frivolous reasons. First, that the pontifical prescribes ashes to be thrown up by the Bishop who consecrates the church, whereas he threw up dust in the air, which he found on the ground.‡ Secondly, that he observed a form communicated to him by Bishop Andrews. But as there is so little difference between dust and ashes, and as Bishop Andrews' form agreed with that in the pontifical, this answer was not much approved. His enemies took occasion from it, to charge him with an intention to introduce Popery. But he little regarded what could be said against him: the King's favour had raised him so high, that it was not in the power of his enemies to hurt him, but on the contrary, he had frequent opportunities to be revenged on them. Whilst he was most exclaimed against, three doctors in divinity, of the university of Oxford, having preached against Arminianism, were expelled the university; and some others, who had undertaken their defence, were turned out of their offices. This was under colour of observing the King's proclamation, and it was not doubted but Laud was the author of these violent proceedings.§

In the mean time, the King's ministers were diligently seeking means to raise money, and new projects were every day offered, of which they chose such as they thought proper. Among these means, monopolies, as before observed, were at first most in vogue. At the beginning of the year 1632, the King, by his patent under the great seal, incorporated the soap makers. It is said, this patent alone was worth to him ten thousand pounds.‖ There was another company settled, for the making of cards, of whom the King bought them, at eighteen shillings a gross, and, sealing them, sold them again.¶

A. D. 1632.] Monopolies were not however the only way practised to raise money. Shortly after, the King by proclamation commanded all Lords, gentlemen, clergymen, and others whose stay in London was not absolutely necessary, to depart within forty days, and reside in their respective counties, and at their mansion houses. This injunction seemed to be grounded upon the King's desire, to hinder the nobility and gentry from wasting their estates by a needless residence in London, where they were obliged to be at a great expence. But it was perceived afterwards, that the King had another end in it, when such were summoned before the Star Chamber, as had neglected to obey the proclamation, and were condemned in grievous fines to the King's use. At the same time, the King appointed commissioners to punish those that, contrary to

* It was an ancient custom from the Conquest, that such as had fifteen pounds a year in land, were obliged to serve the King in his wars, and those who were not capable of serving, compounded with the King, and for a certain sum were released from this service. To this end, those who were worth fifteen pounds a year, were to be made Knights, that is, fit to serve the King. In process of time, the number of those who were to take the order of knighthood was limited to such as had twenty pounds a year. What was at first but a bare custom, was turned into a law in the reign of Edward II. and, after that, some of the following Kings took advantage of it. But in general, though this statute was not abolished, it had been long disused. Charles I. going upon the statute's being still in force, put it in practice at his coronation, and pretended to use great condescension, in summoning to take knighthood such only as had forty pounds a year, though at that time forty pounds were much less than twenty pounds in the days of Edward II. He found but very few willing to obey these summons, the use whereof was entirely forgotten. The King himself then overlooked this non-compliance; but after the dissolution of the third Parliament, he appointed commissioners to compound with those who had neglected to appear, as well for their contempt, as for being excused from receiving the order of knighthood. The commissioners had this instruction, "To take no less than after the rate of thrice and half as much, as the persons compounding were found rated in the subsidy."

† The manner of consecration was thus:

"At the Bishop's approach to the west door of the church, some that were prepared for it, cried with a loud voice, 'Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may enter in!' And presently the doors were opened: and the Bishop, with some doctors, and many other principal men, went in, and immediately falling down upon his knees, with his eyes lifted up, and his arms spread abroad, uttered these words: 'This place is holy, the ground is holy, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I pronounce it holy.'

"Then he took up some of the dust, and threw it up into the air several times, in his going up towards the chancel. When they approached near to the rail and communion table, the Bishop bowed towards it several times, and, returning, they went round the church in procession, saying the 100th Psalm; after that the 19th Psalm, and then said a form of prayer, Lord Jesus Christ, &c. and concluding, we consecrate this church, and separate it unto thee, as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common use.

"After this the Bishop, being near the communion table, and taking a written book in his hand, pronounced curses upon those that should afterwards prophane that holy place, by musters of soldiers, or keeping prophane law-courts, or carrying burdens through it; and at the end of every curse, he bowed towards the east, and said, 'Let all the people say, Amen.'

"When the curses were ended, he pronounced a number of blessings upon all those that had any hand in framing and building that sacred and beautiful church, and those that had given, and should hereafter give any chalices, plate, ornaments, or utensils; and at the end of every blessing, he bowed towards the east, saying, 'Let all the people say, Amen.'

"After this followed the sermon; which being ended, the Bishop consecrated and administered the sacrament in the manner following:

"As he approached the communion table, he made many several lowly bowings, and coming up to the side of the table where the bread and wine were covered, he bowed seven times, and then, after the reading of many prayers, he came near the bread, and gently lifted up the corner of the napkin wherein the bread was laid, and when he beheld the bread, he laid it down again, flew back a step or two, bowed three several times towards it, then he drew near again, and opened the napkin, and bowed as before.

"Then he laid his hand on the cup, which was full of wine, with a cover upon it, which he let go again, went back, and bowed thrice towards it; then he came near again, and lifting up the cover of the cup, looked into it, and seeing the wine, he let fall the cover again, retired back, and bowed as before; then he received the sacrament, and gave it to some principal men; after which, many prayers being said, the solemnity of the consecration ended."

‡ Laud's words in Rushworth are: "Whereas it was said, I threw up dust in the air, this I deny; and where it was alledged that this was in imitation of the Roman pontifical, that (said he) is a mistake, for the pontifical prescribes Ashes or Dust to be cast abroad." However it was expressly deposed by two witnesses that he threw up dust.

§ Laud was chosen chancellor of Oxford, April 12, in the room of William, Earl of Pembroke, who died of an apoplexy, April 10.

former prohibitions, had enlarged the city of London by new buildings. From all this the King drew very considerable sums, the fines in which the offenders were condemned being all to his use. The Star Chamber exercised great rigour on these occasions.

About the same time, the city of London was fined fifteen hundred marks, because the Mayor and Aldermen had neglected to take inquisition of the death of one Doctor Lamb, who passed for a conjurer, and of whom the Duke of Buckingham had made use. This man, being eighty years of age, was pursued by the mob from street to street, and died within a few days, either of the fatigue he had endured, or of the bruises he had received.

Presbyterianism, or, as it was then called, Puritanism, daily gained ground, notwithstanding the endeavours used by the King, Bishops, High Commission, Star-Chamber, and courts of justice, to stop its progress. As these endeavours consisted not in better informing the Presbyterians, but only in the excessive severity exercised upon them, when their zeal caused them to offend; they were the more exasperated against the church of England, as they saw at the same time, that the Arminians and Papists were left unmolested, or if orders were sometimes given against them, such orders were never executed. This made them exclaim against the Bishops, and charge them with designs to introduce Popery and Arminianism into the church. Unhappily, they imputed to the whole church of England, the violences which ought to have been ascribed to the circumstance of the times, and the particular character of some Bishops, who, having credit at court, intimated to the King, that nothing was more opposite to regal authority, than Presbyterian church government. All who were not very submissive to the King, were considered as Puritans, and, as such, frequently oppressed. So, by a fatal policy, men well affected to the church of England, but enemies to arbitrary power, were forced, against their wills, to join with the Puritans, in order to strengthen their party, and enable them to oppose the designs of the court.

The design of ruining Presbyterianism destroyed all regard to the scruples of tender consciences, even in things of little moment, left by the reformers in the public worship, rather as indifferent, than as absolutely necessary. On the contrary, every thing that gave most offence to the Presbyterians, was not only industriously practised, but represented as necessary, and several novelties added which were apt to widen the breach, and make an union impracticable.*

In the account of the third Parliament held in this reign, we had sometimes occasion to speak of Sir Thomas Wentworth, Knight of the Shire for the county of York. This gentleman, several times, in the House of Commons, gave proofs of his zeal for the maintenance of the liberties of the people, and the privileges of the Parliament. By that he became formidable to the court, though he took care not to run into any excess with regard to the King and his minister. On the contrary, he always softened his opinions with some honourable and respectful expressions, but, however, seldom failed to oppose the pretensions of the court. As he was one of the greatest geniuses then in England, the King soon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very serviceable to him, if he could gain him to his interest. He endeavoured it therefore, after, or perhaps before, the dissolution of the Parliament, and succeeded so well, that Wentworth became one of the most zealous promoters of the royal authority, or rather of the despotic power the King had a mind to establish.† Upon this account, the King thought him the fittest person to be entrusted with the presidentship of the council in the north.‡

The King, having governed three or four years without

* There was in the city of Salisbury a collegiate church, called St. Edmund's, which with its revenues, like the rest of that kind, came by act of Parliament into the hands of Henry VIII. and remained in the crown till the reign of James I. who sold it to a private person, and he to another, so that it passed successively through several hands, till at length the last proprietor sold the church to the parishioners of St. Edmund's, who repaired and made it the parish church. The windows, which had till then been preserved, were painted after the old fashion, and contained among other things the history of the creation, where the painter had represented God the Father in the form of an old man, creating the world during the first six days, but on the seventh had painted him sitting, to denote the day of rest. The ignorant painter had committed several blunders, having given to one day the work performed on another, and, in expressing the creation of the sun and moon, had put in God's hand a pair of compasses, as if he was going to measure them. Henry Sherfield, recorder of Sarum, and parishioner of St. Edmund's, having called a vestry, represented to the parishioners, that these pictures gave offence, and were apt to lead the people to superstition. That the painter had committed several errors, and, besides, the representation of God the Father in the form of an old man, offended the eyes of good Christians. Whereupon the vestry thought it proper to take down the windows, and put up others, not painted, in their room. Armed with this order, the recorder sent for a glazier, and, shewing him with his stick the glass which was to be changed, broke some of the panes, as little caring to preserve them.

Upon this outrage, an information was exhibited against Sherfield in the Star Chamber by the attorney general, showing, that contrary to the canons, which forbade any private person to alter or innovate any thing in the fabric or ornament of a church, without special license from his Majesty or the Bishop of the diocese, Sherfield, being ill affected to the discipline of the church of England, and the government thereof by Bishops, did combine with some others of the same opinion, and undertake by a bare order of the vestry, and in contempt of the King and the diocesan, to break down the windows of St. Edmund's church, which contained excellent pictures of the creation, made hundreds of years since, and were a great ornament to the church. That he committed this prophane act contrary to the order of the Bishop, who, by letter, had enjoined him to desist from this design. That by this ill example, other wicked and schismatical persons, ill-affected to the government of the church of England under his Majesty, might be encouraged to use the like violent courses.

Sherfield answered, that the church of St. Edmund's was a lay-fee, and had so continued ever since it fell to the crown, and therefore it was legally exempted from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of the diocese. That, consequently, those who had purchased the church, had lawful power to alter the windows, as they had before made other alterations, in the steeple, walls, pulpit, and other parts, without any complaints from the Bishop. That, after all, he had only taken down some small quarries of glass to show the glazier what was to be altered, and that the history of the creation might still be plainly discovered. That the painting was so far from being fine, that when it was done, it did not cost above forty shillings. Then he set forth the gross blunders of the painter, and proved by acts of Parliament made in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, that all pictures should be removed out of the churches. Finally, he denied that he was ill-affected to the government of the church under Bishops, or had acted in contempt of the King, or ever received a letter from the Bishop of Salisbury upon this subject. Whereupon the Bishop of London said, that he did not pretend to justify the errors of the painter, but only to observe to the court, that God being called in scripture, the Ancient of Days, might be the occasion of the painter's representing God the Father like an old man. But that Sherfield was much more to blame than the painter, for daring to make alterations without license. In short, Sherfield was fined five hundred pounds, contrary to the opinion of some of his judges, who would have mounted his fine to a thousand, and condemned to make a public acknowledgment of his fault, before such persons as the Bishop should please to name. He was likewise committed to the Fleet, removed from his recordership, and bound to his good behaviour.

† About the same time were gained also, Sir John Saville, who was made a Lord, and controller of the household; Sir Dudley Diggs, who was promoted to the mastership of the Rolls; Noy, who was made attorney-general; and Sir Edward Littleton, who was made solicitor. Sir John Elliot was, some time before his death, tampered with; but he was proof against all temptation.

‡ As this is one of the greatest grievances complained of by the English against Charles I. and one of the most noted occasions wherein that Prince discovered his design to set up an unlimited power, it will be necessary briefly to show what this council in the north was.

Upon the suppression of the lesser monasteries in the 27th year of the reign of Henry VIII. there were, for two or three years together, several insurrections in the north. Meanwhile, as Henry VIII. did not intend to stop there, but meant also to suppress all the rest of the monasteries, he thought proper to take some care to prevent the like insurrections in those parts. To that end, he established at York a court of justice, under the specious pretence of easing his poor subjects, who had not wherewithal to prosecute their suits in the courts of Westminster. But his real intent was, that this court should have an eye upon the proceedings of the northern Lords and gentlemen, who were suspected, in order to punish them immediately, in case it was perceived they were endeavouring to raise any fresh insurrections. A commission therefore was granted to the Bishop of Landaff, the first president, and others, by virtue whereof was established this new council in the north, otherwise called the court of York. The jurisdiction of this court extended over Yorkshire, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, the Bishopric of Durham, the county of the cities of York, Kingston upon Hull, and Newcastle upon Tyne. The King's commission was no other than a commission of Oyer and Terminer, with an additional clause, whereby the council was impowered to hear all causes, real and personal, when one or both of the parties, by reason of their poverty, could not prosecute their out a Parliament, was much at ease. His will, by degrees, began to pass for law; there was no House of Commons to complain publicly, and he saw none about him but such as were always ready to flatter him, and cherish his principles concerning government. On the other hand, he was freed from the incumbrance and expence of war, which had created him great trouble, and rendered him too dependent on the Parliament. In short, though he was not ignorant that, in general, the people were discontented, he did not see any appearance of a rebellion, the great men of the kingdom and the neighbouring Princes being so disposed, as to give no encouragement to those who should attempt to disturb the state. His affairs being in this situation, he believed he could not take a more proper time to go into Scotland, where three important affairs required his presence:

I. He had a mind to be crowned.

II. He intended to hold a Parliament for the procuring of money.

III. He designed to take some measures there for the execution of a project long since formed, to reduce the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England, and entirely ruin Presbyterianism.

To this end it was, that he took with him Laud, Bishop of London, and at his arrival in Scotland, made him privy-counsellor of that kingdom. He departed therefore from London the 13th of May 1633, and, being come to Edinburgh, was crowned with the usual solemnities. After that, he held a Parliament, which gave him the largest subsidy that had ever been granted to any King of Scotland before him.*

The reformation was established in Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary, mother of James I. upon the plan of the churches of Geneva and Switzerland. The hierarchy was entirely suppressed, and the government of the church committed to Presbyters, and national synods, called in Scotland, General Assemblies. But however, the Bishops were still continued, though divested of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction. They retained only their revenues, lands, houses, seat in Parliament, and all the temporal advantages in general, that were annexed to the episcopal dignity. From the beginning of the Reformation, that is, from the year 1561, to the end of the sixteenth century, the state of the Bishops underwent several revolutions. James I. becoming King of England, found means to cause the Parliament of Scotland to restore episcopacy to its former lustre, and give the Bishops their ancient jurisdiction over the church. This was the first step to lead the kirk of Scotland to the desired point, that is, to a perfect conformity with the church of England. But the tedious treaty of the Prince, his son's, marriage with the Spanish Infanta, and the affairs of Bohemia and the Palatinate, hindered him from fully executing his project. Charles I. had this work no less at heart than the King his father. But as in the beginning of his reign he was engaged in a war with Spain, and afterwards with France, and moreover his disputes with his Parliaments affording him little leisure to think of other matters, he could not seriously set about this affair, till after the others were ended. In the Parliament at Edinburgh in the year 1633, among other acts that were presented to be passed, there were two, namely, the third and fourth, the one intituled, "An act anent or concerning his Majesty's royal prerogative and apparel of kirkmen:" the other, "An act of ratification of the acts touching religion." These were the only acts that met with any opposition, on account of the consequences which some feared the King would hereafter draw from them. The first of these acts was properly but a confirmation of a like act, passed in the reign of King James VI. impowering his Majesty to order the vestments of the clergy as he pleased. Now as from that time, the design of altering the discipline of the kirk of Scotland, had showed itself more and more, some of the members of this Parliament suspected the King would make use of this act to introduce the surplice. And indeed, being asked whether he intended it, he made no answer; but, taking a list of the whole members out of his pocket, said, "Gentlemen, I have all your names here, and I'll know who will do me service, and who will not, this day." However, about thirteen noblemen, and as many barons and burgesses, declared, that they agreed to the act for his Majesty's prerogative, but dissented from that part of it, as to the apparel of kirkmen.

The other act was expressed in the following manner: "Our sovereign Lord, with the advice and consent of the estates, ratifies and approves all and whatsoever acts and statutes made before, anent the liberty and freedom of the true kirk of God, and religion presently professed within this realm, and ordains the same to stand in their full force and effect, as if they were specially mentioned and set down herein."

It has been already observed, that in the reign of James VI. and especially after his accession to England, he made several innovations in the kirk of Scotland, particularly with respect to the episcopal jurisdiction which had been restored. The whole artifice of this act consisted therefore in these words, "The religion at present professed:" for thereby were confirmed all the innovations in the discipline of the kirk of Scotland, to which the opposers of the act would not agree. They were very willing to ratify the acts made in favour of religion, as established by an act passed in the 6th year of James VI. when the Bishops had no power or jurisdiction; but would not admit these words, "At present professed." During these contests, the King said with some emotion, "I will have no distinction, but command you to say, aye, or no." Whereupon the dissenting Lords and gentlemen said, "No." However, the two acts passed by a majority of votes. Some affirmed afterwards that fraud was used in gathering the votes. However that be, the King's eagerness to have these two acts passed, convinced the people of Scotland that the project of making greater innovations in the kirk still subsisted, and that the two acts were a sort of preparative to accomplish it. On the other hand, the opposition the King met with, showed him, it was not yet time to act openly, and that it was their rights, according to the laws of the land. This clause, though illegal, produced no ill effect, nor any complaint, whether the new court exercised that part of the commission at all, or only so sparingly that the poor found ease and benefit by it.

In the first year of the reign of King James I. a commission was granted to the Lord Sheffield, president of the court of York, which varied not from the former, only as it had reference to instructions which the King was to send him. It is not known whether these instructions were sent; but it is evident, that in making the power of the court to depend on the King's instructions, the intent was, that its decisions should not be made so much according to the laws, as according to his Majesty's private orders. And indeed, King James, in the seventh year of his reign, granted a new commission to the same Lord Sheffield, omitting these two clauses, which were in the first, that they should inquire per sacramentum honorum et legalium hominum, and hear and determine, secundum leges Angliæ. Thus the power of the court was limited only by the particular instructions, which were the first that appear to have been sent thither.

From that time, whenever the commission was renewed, which was upon every change of president or counsellor, the King sent new instructions, tending to render the court of York independent, not only of the courts of Westminster, which are the courts of the whole kingdom, but even of all sorts of laws. Charles I. renewed this commission in favour of the Lord Wentworth, with a more ample power than any of his predecessors had been invested with. In 1632, a clause was added, whereby among other things, authority was committed to him to hear and determine all offences and misdemeanors, suits, debates, controversies, and demands, causes, things and matters whatsoever contained in the instructions annexed to the commission. But what were these instructions? In the Parliament of 1640, Mr. Edward Hyde, then member of the House of Commons, and afterwards Earl of Clarendon, being sent by the House to the Lords, concerning the court of York, said in his speech to them, that in the instructions of 1632, and 1637, containing fifty-eight articles, "There was scarcely one that was not against or beside the law." Whence he took occasion to ask, "What have the good northern people done, that they alone must be disfranchised of all their privileges, and be governed according to the discretion of the court of York?" Nay, though this court might proceed according to its discretion, special provision was made in the King's instructions, that no fine, no punishment should be less than by law appointed. This court was abolished afterwards by the same Parliament of 1640.

* This subsidy was 30s. of every pound's worth of land, for six years; and also the sixteenth penny of all annual rents, or interest of money, and for six years as the former.

necessary to take other measures to facilitate the success of his designs.

If it were endeavoured in Scotland to ruin Presbyterianism by indirect ways, it was thought proper to proceed in England with less caution. Accordingly, all possible efforts were used to destroy it utterly, by persecuting the Puritans. The court and the Bishops laid it down for a rule, not to depart, on their account, from one tittle of what was practised in the church of England, for fear they should grow too powerful, and the indulgence shown them prove detrimental to the church. But there was a stronger reason, namely, the implacable hatred conceived of them by the King, his ministers, and above all, by the Bishops of London and Winchester, which made them earnestly seek all occasions to oppress them. And these occasions were easy to be found. They had only to press the observation of the canons without dispensing with one article, in order to cause the Presbyterians to commit offences, which exposed them to the rigour of the ecclesiastical and civil laws. But as the Bishops could not be every where, and wanted people to inform them of what passed, Walter Curle, Bishop of Winchester, bethought himself, in his primary visitation, to oblige by oath the church-wardens, and sworn men, to turn informers, that none might escape their inquiry. The oath was as follows:

"You shall swear, that you and every of you, without all affection, favour, hatred, hope of reward, and gain, or fear of displeasure or malice of any person, shall present all and every such person and persons, of or within your parish, who hath committed any offence, fault or crime, or omitted any part of duty, which he was enjoined to perform: wherein you shall deal uprightly; and according to truth; neither of malice, presenting any contrary to truth, nor of corrupt affection, sparing to present any, and to conceal the truth; having in this action God before your eyes, with an earnest zeal to maintain truth, and suppress vice. So help you God, and the contents of this book."

With this oath were delivered certain instructions, according to which they were to proceed.*

George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, dying this year, 1633, William Laud, Bishop of London, succeeded him in that dignity.

This same year, the Queen was delivered of a second son, in October; who was called James, and created Duke of York.

The Presbyterians were persuaded, that a project was formed to re-establish the Romish religion in England. They imagined that the King's ministers, the council, bishops, and particularly the new archbishop of Canterbury, were the authors of this project. If they did not directly charge the King with it, at least they were persuaded, either that he encouraged it, or suffered himself to be carried farther than he intended, by persons who concealed their design from him. The Catholics themselves gave occasion for these suspicions, in showing openly their hopes of quickly seeing a change in favour of their religion. We find in a diary kept by Laud, of what happened to him every day, that this very year, 1633, he had the offer of a Cardinal's cap, if he would help to restore the Romish religion. It is not probable, however, that either the King, the Archbishop, or the ministers, ever formed such a design.

The King, as before observed, intended to introduce the rites of the church of England, into the kirk of Scotland. This project was formed by the King his father, who had even ordered that divine service should be celebrated in his royal chapel at Edinburgh, in the same manner as in his chapel at Whitehall. But whether this order was neglected, or the Scots would not frequent the chapel, Charles thought proper not only to renew it, but to add several things to hinder the chapel from being deserted for the future. On the 8th of October, he sent a list of articles to the Bishop of Dunblane, Dean of his chapel at Edinburgh;† besides which, he wrote a letter to the Dean, ordering him to certify to the Lords of the privy-council, if any of those appointed to communicate in his chapel royal, did not perform these articles, to the end, such order might be taken, as his Majesty had appointed by his former letters.

Hence it is visible, that not only the whole council of Scotland, but also those who were in public employments, and court places, were prepared to conform to the church of England, otherwise they would not have been employed, or continued in their posts. It was with them, the King intended to begin, that, as he said himself, they might serve for example to the rest.

Whilst the King was seeking means to engage the Scots to conform to the church of England, pains were taking on the contrary to alienate from her, the Presbyterians in England, by affecting such usages and customs as were most apt to offend them. At that time the heads of the church of England, instead of unde-

"II. That the book of the form of our coronation lately used, be put in a little box, and laid into a standard, and committed to the care of the dean of the chapel successively."

The coronation of King Charles I. it must be observed, had been performed according to the rites of the church of England.

"V. That the Dean of our chapel, that now is, and so successively, come duly thither to prayers upon Sundays, and such holy-days as that church observes, in his whites, and preach so, whenever he preacheth there. And that he be not absent from thence, but upon necessary occasion of his diocese, or otherwise, according to the course of his preferment.

"VI. That these orders shall be our warrant to the Dean of our chapel. That the Lords of our privy council, the Lords of the sessions, the advocate, clerks, writers to the signet, and members of our college of justice, be commanded to receive the holy communion once every year at least, in that our chapel royal, and kneeling for example sake to the kingdom. And we likewise command the Dean aforesaid, to make report yearly to us, how we are obeyed therein, and by whom; as also if any man shall refuse, in what manner he doth so, and why.

"VII. That the copies which are consecrated to our use, be delivered to the Dean, to be kept upon inventory by him, and in a standard provided for that purpose; and to be used at the celebration of the sacrament in our chapel royal."

ceiving those who preposterously imagined she was leaning to Popery, seem to have taken all possible care to confirm their suspicions, by industriously conforming to the church of Rome, in matters of little moment, and without any necessity, as if it was done on purpose to brave them. In October 1633, the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, as ordinaries of St. Gregory's church, which stood near the cathedral, removed the communion table from the middle of the chancel, to the upper end, placing it there altar-wise. For which they alledged two reasons. The first, that in the King's chapel, and all cathedrals, the communion tables were placed in that manner, and therefore it was fit other churches should conform to the same custom. The second, that when the tables stood in the middle of the chancel, several scandalous indecencies were committed, people leaning thereon in sermon time, or putting their hats on it. This last reason, added to the great care that was taken about kneeling at the sacrament, caused many to believe, that the endeavouring to inspire such an extraordinary respect for the communion table, and the giving it always the name of altar, was not without design. And therefore some of the parishioners of St. Gregory's complained of this removal, by appeal to the Court of the Arches. But the council having notice of it, prevented the sentence, by ordering the dean of the Arches, to confirm by his authority, what had been done in St. Gregory's church. A few days after, the King being present in council, caused this affair to be debated, and approving the act of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, gave commandment, that if those parishioners did proceed in their appeal, the dean of the Arches, who was then attending at the hearing of the cause should cast them, and confirm the removal. This sentence, given by the King's sovereign authority, without staying for the judgment of the court, to whose cognizance this matter properly belonged, was a fountain of oppressions to many ministers and congregations, who were not willing to comply with it. There was scarcely a church in England, except the cathedrals and the King's chapel, where the communion table was placed altar-wise, at the upper end of the chancel. But after the King had confirmed the removal in St. Gregory's church, the like disputes arose in numberless places, and the high commission had frequent occasions to punish the ministers, who were suspected of too little zeal for the church of England. As since the Reformation, the altars were changed into communion tables, and placed in the middle of the chancel, to avoid superstition, many imagined, the tables were again turned into altars, with intent to revive a superstitious worship.

In February 1634, came to a solemn hearing in the Star Chamber, a cause which made a great noise, and which showed the extreme severity of that court against such as were suspected not to be submissive enough to the government. The case was this. Mr. William Prynn, barrister, of Lincoln's Inn, had compiled and printed, a large volume in quarto, of above a thousand pages, intituled, Histrio-Mastix. The author's main design was to show, that stage plays, balls, masques, were unlawful and antichristian.* But in treating his subject, he had interspersed sundry reflections, applicable to the King, the Queen, and the church, who approved or tolerated these abuses. It was pretended, his aim in general was to show, there was a design to reduce religion to a kind of paganism, in order to make way for Popery. This outrage was represented by the King's council in the blackest colours they could possibly give it. At last, after a solemn hearing of three days, the book was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman, a thing till then unusual in England. As for the author, sentence was passed upon him; that he should be expelled Lincoln's Inn, be disabled to practise, degraded of his degree in the university of Oxford, set on the pillory, have his ears cut off, imprisoned during life, and fined five thousand pounds. The publisher, Michael Sparkes, who was also the printer of the book, was fined five hundred pounds; and Mr. Buckner, the chaplain who licensed it, fifty pounds.

This sentence seemed too severe, to disinterested persons. It mortified the Presbyterians especially, most of whom were of the same principles with Prynn. They could not help perceiving, in the severity exercised upon this author, a malicious design to disgrace their sect, and oppress them on all occasions. The truth is, the Presbyterian party, though very numerous, as plainly appeared afterwards, laboured then under oppression.

The death of the attorney-general hindered not the King from putting his advice in practice. To that purpose, under the pretence of protecting the seas against piracy, &c. he directed to the mayors and head officers of the maritime towns, writs, commanding them to provide a certain number of ships, and to defray all the expenses thereof for a given time. The port of London was commanded to provide seven ships of war, furnished with men, victuals, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth by the 1st of March following, and to continue from thence the space of twenty-six weeks in his Majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas and other causes. The city pleaded an exemption, but was not capable of causing the King to desist from his resolution. On the contrary, in time, this tax, which was at first peculiar to the maritime towns, was imposed upon the whole kingdom.

A. D. 1634-5.] After Laud's promotion to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, his zeal for the church of England and against the Presbyterians, seemed to be much increased. He kept by the King's order a private correspondence with the Bishops of Scotland, concerning the liturgy and canons designed to be introduced into the kirk. But he did not confine his labours to the conversion of the Scots, nor even of the English Presbyterians. The Dutch, the Walloons, the French, who had taken refuge in England, since the reign of Edward VI. had obtained sundry privileges from the former Kings, and particularly the liberty of celebrating divine service after their manner, that is, the Presbyterian, and formed several congregations, both in London and other parts of the kingdom. But Laud could not bear they should enjoy this privilege any longer. And therefore sent them these two injunctions, having first secured the King's approbation:

"I. That all the natives of the Dutch and Walloon congregations, in his grace's diocese, should repair to the several parish churches of those several parishes where they inhabited, to hear divine service and sermons, and perform all duties and payments required in that behalf.

"II. That the ministers, and all other of the Dutch and Walloon congregations, which were not natives and born subjects to the King's Majesty, or any other strangers that should come over to them, while they remained strangers, might have and use their own discipline, as formerly they have done; yet it was thought fit, that the English liturgy should be translated into French and Dutch, for the better settling of their children to the English government."

Besides that, by these injunctions, he imposed upon these foreign churches a liturgy which they did not approve, he reduced these congregations almost to nothing since he excluded all that were born in the kingdom,

* His zeal against all these levities, he says, was first moved by observing, that plays sold better than the choicest sermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than the Bible itself. Besides, that the players were often Papists, and desperately wicked, the play-houses, he affirms, are Satan's chapels, the play-haunters little better than incarnate Devils; and so many steps in a dance, so many paces to Hell. The chief crime of Nero he represents to have been, his frequenting and acting of plays; and those, who nobly conspired his death, were principally moved to it, as he affirms, by their indignation at that enormity. The music in the churches, he affirmed not to be the noise of men, but a bleating of brute beasts: choristers bellow the tenor, as it were oxen; bark a counter part, as it were a kennel of dogs; roar out a treble, as it were a sort of bulls; and grunt out a bass, as it were a number of hogs: Christmas, as it is kept, is the Devil's Christmas. And Prynn employed a great number of pages to persuade men to affect the name of Puritan, as if Christ had been a Puritan; and so he saith in his index.

that is, all the descendants of such as had fled hither in the reign of Edward VI. and consequently there could be but very few left of those born out of the kingdom.

Upon this, the Dutch and Walloon churches at Norwich presented a petition to the Bishop of that diocese, remonstrating, that the Archbishop's injunctions were contrary, not only to several orders of the council heretofore given in favour of their congregations, but also to the privileges granted them when they first settled in England, and continued to them during the reigns of Edward VI. Queen Elizabeth, and James I. and confirmed also by his present Majesty's royal word. The Bishop of Norwich not returning a favourable answer to their petition, they applied to the Archbishop himself, who answered them by letter, that his Majesty was resolved, his instructions should hold, and that obedience should be yielded to them by all the natives, after the first descent; concluding his letter with these words: "And thus I have given you answer fairly in all your particulars, and do expect all obedience and conformity to my instructions, which if you shall perform, the state will have occasion to see how ready you are to practise the obedience which you teach: And for my part, I doubt not but yourselves, or your posterity at least, shall have cause to thank both the state and the church for this care taken of you; but if you refuse (as you have no cause to do, and I hope you will not) I shall then proceed against the natives, according to the laws and canons ecclesiastical."*

The Presbyterians having no other way to be revenged of the Archbishop, published several libels against him, taking notice of all the innovations he had brought into the church, pretending they were so many steps towards popery. They forgot not to upbraid him with the pictures he had placed in the windows of his chapel at Lambeth, particularly that of God the Father in the form of a little old man, They observed several other things, of which the Archbishop was afterwards accused by the House of Commons.

The King being always in want, his ministers were continually employed in devising means to raise money. In the beginning of the year 1635, the Attorney-General presented an information of the Star-Chamber against several hundreds of persons, Lords, Knights, Gentlemen, Ladies, and others, for disobeying his Majesty's proclamation, by which they were commanded not to reside in London. Probably, considering the Star-Chamber's zeal to support the King's authority, the parties accused were punished by fine.

The tax to provide and maintain a certain number of ships to guard the seas, was imposed in 1634, for the year 1635, only upon the maritime towns. But in 1635, the King sent his writs for ship-money all over the kingdom for the year 1636. The reason or rather pretence of this general tax was, that the kingdom was in great danger, on account of the league lately concluded between France and the Low-Countries. Though it did not appear how this league, which was not against England, could put the kingdom in danger, the King however inferred, that the two most powerful States in naval forces being united, it was absolutely necessary that England should have a strong fleet to preserve the dominion of the sea, otherwise she might be insulted, and her trade disturbed. This tax being imposed by virtue of the prerogative royal, several private persons refused to pay the sums they were rated at. Nay some there were who sued the Magistrates and other officers appointed to levy the money, asserting, that the subject could be taxed only by act of Parliament. This opposition was the reason, that in the year 1636 ship-money amounted to not above two hundred thousand pounds, though the King had expected a much larger sum. Meanwhile, the King considering, that by means of this tax he should have a settled revenue, besides that it would be a precedent to make use of his prerogative on other occasions, resolved to support his project at any rate. But to guard it against all objections of being illegal, and contrary to his answer to the Petition of Right, he had a mind to show he was authorized on this occasion to exert his prerogative. To that end he sent to the Judges of the realm, and required their opinion concerning his right to levy this tax. As the Judges wholly depended upon the court, they very readily decided in favour of the King, and gave him their opinion in writing. But the King thought not proper to publish their determination, being satisfied with keeping it in private till their should be occasion to use it.

This year, 1635, the King renewed a former commission to confirm their defective titles, to such as held lands of the crown. He pretended it was an act of grace, and that his only aim was to secure the possession of lands to those who held them by disputable titles. But notwithstanding this, the commission was looked upon as a manifest oppression. For, under colour of examining defective titles, all the proprietors were obliged to produce their titles, to which, how valid soever they might be, the commissioners made objections. So, to avoid a law-suit with the King, wherein they were sure to be cast, considering the disposition of the Judges, the proprietors were forced to compound, and give money to secure their lands, which were otherwise in danger of being re-united to the crown.

Shortly after, the King published a proclamation, commanding all persons, except soldiers, mariners, merchants, and their factors, not to depart the kingdom without his licence.

The abuses of the informers, that is, persons, who watched people's actions, in order to accuse them, in case they infringed the laws, were grown so excessive, that the King was forced, if not to abolish them entirely, at least, to qualify them by certain directions which he ordered to be observed.

The office of Lord Treasurer, which had been executed by commissioners, since the death of the Earl of Portland, was conferred on Dr. William Juxton, Bishop of London. who discharged it worthily. No churchman had enjoyed this post since Henry VIIth's time.

This year was presented to the King, by the Earl of Arundel, an old man called Parr, who was a hundred and fifty-two years of age, and in perfect health. He was born the last year of the reign of Edward IV.†

The Elector Palatine, and Prince Rupert, or Robert, his brother arrived in England about this time, and were lodged in the King their uncle's palace.

A. D. 1636.] The Presbyterians were still molested upon every occasion, or whenever they gave their enemies an advantage, through an excess of zeal which was not always well regulated. Samuel Ward, a minister in Ipswich, boldly preached against the King's Book of Sports, and also said, "That the church of England was ready to ring changes in religion." For which he was suspended by the high-commission, and afterwards committed to prison for refusing to make a public recantation. The church-wardens of Beckington in Somersetshire refusing to place the communion-table otherwise than it had been for sixty years, were excommunicated by the Bishop of Bath and Wells. They appealed to the Arches, but their appeal was rejected. Then they petitioned the King, but with no better success. So the church-wardens stood excommunicated a whole year, and were afterwards thrown into the common-goal, whence at length they were released by the Bishop, upon their public submission and penance.

On the other hand, the Archbishop of Canterbury,

* About one hundred and forty families of these people went into Holland, where they were kindly received, and exempted from excise, and paying of house-rent for seven years: they taught the Dutch the way of managing the woollen manufacture. Thousands of families also retired into New England.

† He died the same year, aged 152 years and 9 months: the change of air, and mode of living, particularly the drinking of wine, are supposed to have accelerated his death.—Old Thomas Parr, the subject of this note, was a husbandman, of Shropshire. At the age of one hundred he did penance for a bastard child; and at one hundred and twenty he married a second wife, by whom he had a child.

ever

ever zealous for the church of England, considered as puritans all who neglected the least rite or ceremony of that church. This prelate being informed of some remissness in that respect in the two Universities, could not suffer such an abuse. There were at Cambridge three chapels where Divine Service was daily celebrated, though they had never been consecrated. This neglect, which to him seemed so blameable, exciting his zeal, he resolved to visit the Universities as metropolitan. He met with some opposition, the Universities maintaining that he had not the right of visiting as Archbishop, though they did not deny he might visit by the King's commission, if his Majesty was pleased to appoint him. But not being satisfied with a borrowed power, he brought the case before the King, who decided it in his favour, after having himself supported the Archbishop's reasons with arguments, and answered the objections of the Universities.

The King being determined to continue the tax for the maintenance of the ships designed to guard the seas, and having the last year given orders for levying it this year, 1636, was obliged to seek a pretence for a fleet. This tax, called ship-money, was grounded upon the necessity of guarding the seas. But none could perceive the danger, which, according to the King, England was exposed to by the alliance between France, and Holland To this pretence therefore was to be added that of preserving the dominion of the narrow seas. To this end he published a proclamation, declaring, "Whereas King James did, in the seventh year of his reign, set forth a proclamation touching fishing; whereby all persons of what nation or quality soever (being not his natural-born subjects) were restrained from fishing upon any of the coasts and seas of Great-Britain, Ireland, and the rest of the Isles adjacent, until they had orderly obtained licences in that behalf. Since which time, neither the King his father, nor himself have made any considerable execution of the said proclamation, but have expected a voluntary conformity thereto. But now finding by experience, that all the inconveniencies which occasioned that proclamation, are rather increased than abated; and his Majesty well knowing how far he is obliged in honour to maintain the rights of his crown, has thought it necessary to renew the aforesaid restraint of fishing, and to declare, that his resolution is to keep such a competent strength of shipping upon his seas, as may be sufficient both to hinder farther encroachments upon his regalities, and assist and protect those his good friends and allies, who shall henceforth with licence endeavour to take benefit of fishing upon his coasts."

These friends were the Hollanders, who came every year and fished for herrings on the coast of Scotland. It was therefore manifest, that after thirty years forbearance he sought a quarrel with the Dutch, only to have occasion to fit out a fleet, which served for pretence to impose the tax of ship-money. This quarrel produced the two famous treatises, intituled Mare Liberum, and Mare Clausum, the former penned by Grotius, the latter by Selden. But the King regarded not arguments drawn from history, or ancient treaties between the two nations; he made use of a more effectual method, namely, a fleet under the command of Algernon, Earl of Northumberland. This fleet attacking the dispersed fishermen, who little expected it, and sinking some, compelled the rest to retire into the English harbours as the safest retreat, and in short, to give the King thirty thousand florins, for permission to continue their fishing that summer.*

Soon after, the King raised thirty thousand pounds by a commission, to inquire concerning depopulations and conversions of arable lands to pasture, since the 10th year of Queen Elizabeth. There were many offenders of this kind, and so heavy a fine was imposed in the Star-Chamber on Sir Anthony Roper, that the rest, to avoid the same treatment, speedily compounded with the King.

But ship-money was the most important thing; and as such regarded by the court. The King neither would nor could depart from it, for three principal reasons. First, because he should be deprived of a very considerable aid, which he meant to render fixed and customary. Secondly, in desisting from this tax, after levying it two years successively, he would have given cause to believe he had no power to impose it, and consequently had acted contrary to law. Thirdly, having resolved never more to call a Parliament, it highly concerned him to establish his prerogative in such a manner that none should dare to contest it. So the city of London having petitioned the board, that the twenty ships they were rated at, might be reduced to ten, received a very sharp answer to this effect:

"That the tax of ship-money was necessary for the preservation of the state; and the charge was not immoderate: that his Majesty would admit of no excuse, but expected a ready compliance: that the precedents alledged in favour of the city, ought to induce them to obey, rather than to contradict and direct the King."

Notwithstanding all this, there were some that obstinately refused to pay their share of this tax, imagining, no court of Justice would be so bold as to compel them. As these examples were of dangerous consequence, the King, to discourage all opposition, proposed this question to the Judges: "Whether, in a case of necessity, for the defence of the kingdom, he might not impose this taxation; and whether he were not sole Judge of the necessity?" These guardians of law and liberty, replied, with great complaisance, "That in a case of necessity, he might impose that taxation, and that he was sole judge of the necessity."†

After these precautions, the King thought himself sufficiently authorized to order such to be prosecuted, as refused to pay ship-money. Nevertheless, there was a gentleman, who being persuaded, notwithstanding the Judges' determination, that ship-money was illegal, and contrary to the Petition of Right, resolved to stand the shock, and refused to pay the tax. Mr. Hampden of Buckinghamshire was the man, who being rated at twenty shillings, chose rather to be condemned than pay voluntarily. This case was argued in the Exchequer Chamber, before all the Judges of England, who were sent for to render the judgment more solemn and authentic. Though the point was only to decide, whether Mr. Hampden should pay twenty shillings or not, it was the most important case that had ever been argued in any Court of Justice. The thing in question was, to determine, whether the King had power to tax the subject, without the concurrence of the Parliament, and whether the people were obliged to pay taxes imposed in that manner. Accordingly Mr. Hampden's and the King's counsel displayed on this occasion, all that wit, learning, knowledge of the laws, solidity of reasoning, subtlety, chicanery, are able to produce.

The counsel for Mr. Hampden pleaded express laws, Magna Charta, the subsequent statutes, and the Petition of Right. The King's counsel insisted chiefly upon precedents and instances taken from some of the former reigns, and upon the impossibility in certain cases, of strictly observing the laws. From whence they inferred, that the laws were not so general, but that they were limited by extraordinary cases, and the King being bound to defend the state, ought to be the sole judge of such cases.

After the cause had been argued many days, from the beginning of November till Christmas, and in the following terms, till May and June, judgment was given against Mr. Hampden, and he was condemned to pay the sum he was taxed at. Thenceforth no one would have recourse to the law.‡

Whilst

* The Dutch agreed to give the King thirty thousand pounds for this summer, which was paid accordingly; and expressed their willingness to obtain a grant from the King, for their permission to fish for the time to come, paying a yearly tribute.

† Two of the Judges, however (Hutton and Crooke) were not of this opinion; but they were persuaded to sign, like the others, by the consideration, that it was the opinion of the body.

‡ This cause was not only argued by the King's, and Mr. Hampden's

Whilst endeavours were using in England to carry the prerogative-royal higher than ever, the King resolved to execute the project he had formed with regard to Scotland, namely, to reduce the kirk to a perfect conformity with the church of England. This project has been formed by King James, at his accession to the crown of England. He had even found means before he left Scotland to restore episcopacy. From that time, the Bishops were always protected and countenanced by James I. and Charles I. who gained the Parliaments to their interest, and moreover exerted their prerogative in favour of the prelates; for with them the execution of their design was to begin.

The Reformation was received in Scotland by public authority, in the reign of Queen Mary 1560, just before the death of Francis II. and whilst the Queen his widow was yet in France. The first that embraced the reformed religion in Scotland under the former reigns, were much persecuted, even to the time we have been speaking of, and yet, their number did not fail daily to increase.

From the year 1560, to 1609, the church of Scotland was governed by presbyteries, diocesan and provincial synods, general assemblies, and even superintendants were appointed, who continued till the year 1575. The general assemblies condemned and rejected episcopal government above thirty years, and, during that time, constantly demanded and earnestly solicited the abolition of episcopacy, with respect both to temporals and spirituals. Nevertheless, from the beginning of the Reformation till 1592, no express act of Parliament could be obtained, whether for or against episcopacy, or to approve or reject the presbyterian government, if we except the interval between the years 1571 and 1575.*

Had the general assemblies confined their demands to the abolishing of episcopacy as to the spiritual functions, very likely, they would have easily obtained it. But after the abolition of the episcopal office as far as in them lay, they were not contented with desiring that their acts might be confirmed by the Parliament, but demanded also that the name of Bishop might be abolished, and the Bishop deprived of all sorts of temporal honours and privileges, as the right of sitting in Parliament and the like. But the court always opposed it strenuously, because the bishopricks and abbies being filled by the King, he could almost depend upon as many votes in Parliament as there were Bishops and Abbots. For the same reason, the court, by secret practices, hindered the Parliament from passing any act to establish presbytery, and to abrogate the spiritual jurisdiction of Bishops, because it was perceived that this would tend to deprive them of their temporal honours. Not but that, in the actual practice of the church, episcopacy was really abolished, and presbytery established; but however, as long as there was no express act to abolish episcopacy, the Bishops and Abbots could not be prevented from voting in Parliament, which was a great advantage to the court. So the name and title of Bishops and Abbots still subsisted. They held the lands annexed to their benefices, and enjoyed the same temporal privileges with their predecessors, though the office had ceased.

The reign of Mary lasted till the year 1567. This Queen was a zealous Catholic, and yet so long as the Earl of Murray her natural brother had any credit with her, the Reformation was not attacked. But towards the end of her reign under Bothwel's administration, the general assembly lost ground. However, in 1566, they made the decree, to approve of the discipline of the churches of Switzerland, and of a parity among the ministers, which entirely destroyed episcopacy. But the Queen, regardless of this decree, openly restored the Archbishopric of St. Andrew's, notwithstanding the opposition of the assembly.

The interval from the deposing of Queen Mary, in 1567 to 1573, was a time of troubles and discord, under the administration of several Regents, whose authority was not firmly established: so that it was very difficult for the Parliament effectually to settle the discipline of the church. All that can be said is, that they rejected not what was established by the general assembly, though they gave not their consent to it. On the other hand, in 1572 and 1573, the Regent, for some private views, caused some acts to be passed in favour of episcopacy, but which were afterwards repealed.†

The Earl of Morton having lost his head in 1581, the Duke of Lenox and Earl of Arran ruled the young King as they pleased. They were expelled afterwards by the Ruthens, but the King recalled the Earl of Arran, who became more powerful than ever. This favourite's design was to disengage the King his master from the interest of England, and to countenance the Duke of Guise's project to invade Elizabeth by Scotland. It was the favourite's business therefore to curb the too great power of the general assembly, who strongly opposed the execution of this project. The best way to succeed, was, not only to protect the Bishops, but also to give them authority over the ministers, that these might be more humble. To that end, he procured four acts of Parliament in 1584; the intent of which was to abolish the general assemblies with the presbytery, and restore the episcopal government. These acts were repealed by the Parliament of 1592.

den's counsel, but afterwards by the Judges at the Bench, and all of them, (except Hutton and Crooke) argued, and gave their judgment for the King.

* In Scotland are eight hundred and ninety parishes, each of which is divided in proportion to its extent, into particular districts, and every district has its own ruling elders (that is, men of the principal quality and interests in the Parish) and Deacon (that is, one who has a competency, and is of a good character for manners and understanding.) A consistory of ministers, elders, and deacons, is called a kirk-session, the lowest ecclesiastical judicatory, which meets once a week, to consider the affairs of the parish. The minister is always moderator, but without a negative. Appeals lie from hence to their own presbyteries, which are the next higher judicatories. Scotland is divided into sixty-nine presbyteries, each consisting of, from twelve to twenty-four contiguous parishes. The ministers of these parishes, with one ruling elder, chosen half-yearly out of every kirk-session, compose a presbytery. They meet in the head town, and chuse their moderator, who must be a minister, half-yearly: he is only prolocutor. From hence appeals lie to provincial synods, which are composed of several adjacent presbyteries, two, three, four, to eight. There are fifteen in all. The members are the ministers, and a ruling elder out of every parish. These synods meet twice a year, at the principal towns of its bounds. They chuse a moderator, who is their prolocutor. The acts of the synod are subject to the review of the general assembly, the dernier resort of the kirk of Scotland. It consists of the commissioners from Presbyteries, royal burghs, and universities. A presbytery of twelve ministers, sends two ministers, and one ruling elder. Of between twelve and eighteen, it sends three, and one ruling elder. Of between eighteen and twenty-four, sends four, and two ruling elders. Of twenty-four, sends five, and two elders. Every royal burgh sends one elder, and Edinbugh two. Every University sends one commissioner, usually a minister. The assembly meets once a year.

† By the first, which is the 46th of the Parliament holden in 1572, it is declared, "The Archbishops and Bishops have the authority, and are ordained, to convene and deprive all inferior persons being ministers, who shall not subscribe the articles of religion, and give their oath for acknowledging and recognising of our Sovereign Lord and his authority, and bring a testimonial in writing thereupon, within a month after their admission."

By the 48th act of the same Parliament, it is declared, "That Archbishops and Bishops have authority at their visitations to design ministers' glebes."

By the 54th of the said Parliament, "Archbishops and Bishops were authorized to nominate and appoint at their visitations, persons in every Parochin for making and setting of the taxation, for upholding and repairing of kirks and kirk-yards, and to convene, try, and censure all persons that shall be found to have applied to their own use the stones, timber, or any thing else pertaining to kirks demolished."

By the 55th of the Parliament in 1573, "Archbishops and Bishops were authorized to admonish persons married, in case of desertion, to adhere, and in case of disobedience, to direct charges to the minister of the Porachin to proceed to the sentence of excommunication."

There appears in these four acts some signs of the episcopal jurisdiction, or at least, that the Parliament did not look upon episcopacy as entirely abolished. But on the other hand, if the Bishops actually exercised their functions at that time, where was the necessity of the Parliament's authorizing them to act in most of the things specified in these statutes? But there is a stronger objection still against the Bishops. And that is, they who have thus cited these acts, have curtailed them, and passed over in silence the superintendants who were joined with the Bishops, whence it is inferred, that the Bishops were impowered only as commissioners of the Parliament.

Though, at the beginning of the year 1587, Elizabeth had beheaded Mary, King James's mother, he was soon comforted by the hopes of possessing one day the crown of England, which he was afraid of losing, in case he continued to form projects against religion, as he had done during the Earl of Arran's ministry. This same year therefore he gave the royal assent to the Act of Annexation, whereby were annexed to the crown, "all Lordships and Baronies pertaining to whatsoever Archbishops, or Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Nuns and Monks; reserving always to Archbishops, &c. and others possessors of great benefices of the estate of Prelates, and which before had or hath vote in Parliament, the principal castles and fortalices."

It may be inferred from this act, that the depriving the Bishops of their lands, was depriving them withal of the right of sitting in Parliament, since that right was founded entirely upon the possession of the baronies. It seems even that the title of Bishop began now to be conferred on laymen, which gave them only the possession of the chief castle belonging to the see.

At last, in 1592, the Parliament repealed and annulled not only the fore-mentioned acts of 1583, but also such as were contrary to the discipline established, "approving, ratifying, and confirming the assemblies, presbyteries and synods, with the discipline and jurisdiction of the kirk, as most just and godly, notwithstanding whatsoever statutes, acts, canons, civil or municipal laws made in the contrary. Further, they abrogated all acts, granting commission to Bishops, and other Judges constitute in ecclesiastical causes; and ordained presentation to benefices, to be directed to presbyteries, with power to give collation thereupon."

This act was confirmed in 1593, and the power of presbyteries solemnly acknowledged by the Parliament of 1594, act 129.

But things remained not long upon the same footing. Whether the general assemblies usurped too much authority, after they were freed from the Bishops, or for some other reasons, the King formed new projects, and resolved to restore the Bishops. At that time, as at many other junctures, the court had so great an influence over the Parliament, that almost whatever was desired, was enacted.

The King therefore so ordered it, in 1597, that "the privilege of a voice in Parliament was granted to the whole kirk; and under that name to Bishops and Abbots, even as in times of Papistry." As to the office and spiritual government of Bishops, the Parliament remitted them to the King and the assembly, intending not to derogate from the provincial and general assemblies, and other whatsoever presbyteries and sessions, nor from the discipline established in the kirk.

The act shows, the Bishops had lost their right of seats in Parliament, since there was occasion to give it them again. By virtue of this act, they resumed their places in Parliament, and even Sir Robert Spottiswood a layman took his seat there, as Abbot of New-Abbey. The King desired nothing more at that time, than to introduce the Bishops and Abbots again into the Parliament. But he did not stop there.

Meanwhile, as the general assembly continued to oppose strenuously the promotion of churchmen to posts of authority in the state, and as the people seemed more inclined to follow the determinations of the general assembly, than those of the Parliament, it was to be feared, this dissention would at last raise disturbances in the kingdom. To prevent this inconvenience, the King caused the general assembly, held at Montrose, in the year 1600, to be pressed so earnestly to consent to what the Parliament of 1597 had granted to the Bishops, that they were obliged either to comply, or break entirely with him. They approved this act therefore, but upon certain conditions, the substance whereof was, that the Bishops should act in Parliament only as commissioners or deputies of the kirk, and should be subject to the general assembly.

As soon as James I. became King of England, he formed the project of establishing in the kirk of Scotland, the discipline and hierarchy of the church of England. To accomplish this design, it was necessary to restore the Bishops to all the rights they had enjoyed before the Reformation, and accordingly he resolved to begin with this restoration. His power in the Parliament was very great, during the last years of his being in Scotland; but it was nothing in comparison of what it was after his accession to the throne of England. It suffices to say, that this influence was in proportion to the means he had of dispensing to his Scotch subjects favours, which he had not been able to grant them in their own country. He made use of his credit in the year 1606, and obtained the following act of Parliament:

"The ancient and fundamental policy, consisting in the maintenance of the three estates of Parliament, being of late greatly impaired, and almost subverted, especially by the indirect abolishing the Act of Annexation: albeit it was never meaned by his Majesty, nor by his estates, that the said estate of Bishops, being a necessary estate of the Parliament, should any way be suppressed, yet by dismembering and abstracting from them of their livings, being brought in contempt and poverty, the said estate of Bishops is hereby restored, and redintegrate to their ancient and accustomed honour, dignities, prerogatives, privileges, lands, teindes, as the same was in the reformed kirk, most amply and free, at any time before the act of Annexation; rescinding and annulling all acts of Parliament made in prejudice of the said Bishops in the premisses, or any of them, with all that hath followed, or may follow thereupon, to the effect they may peaceably enjoy the honours, dignities, privileges and prerogatives competent to them or their estate since the Reformation of religion."

Thus far however it concerned only the temporalities, there not being in the act a single word from whence it might be inferred that the Parliament restored the Bishops to their spiritual functions, or ancient jurisdiction. The general assembly pretended indeed, that the King and Parliament could make no alterations in the spirituals, without the kirk's consent: but they had no power to hinder the King and Parliament from giving the lands of the crown to whom they pleased, and from admitting into the Parliament such as they thought proper.

In 1609, the King, under colour of confirming the act of 1606, obtained of the Parliament another act, which in confirming the other, added a clause, whereby the Bishops were restored to all their former authority, privileges and jurisdictions. By virtue of this last act it was that the Bishops took possession of the government of the kirk, notwithstanding the conditions of the Montrose assembly, which they little regarded, and supposed to be annulled by this act. But the general assembly protested in form against this act, affirming the Parliament had not power without the kirk's consent, to restore a spiritual office that had been abolished. They protested also against the promotion of churchmen to civil posts, as pernicious to religion. Their protestation was rejected: but however it was printed and dispersed throughout the kingdom.

The general assembly's opposition had a great effect upon the people, who loved not the Bishops, and for fifty years had been used to the Presbyterian government. They complained, the Parliament had been gained to impose upon them episcopal government, which was odious to the whole nation, not only without consulting the kirk, but even against her will. This opposition convinced the King, that notwithstanding the authority of the Parliament, he should find it very difficult to reduce the people of Scotland to obedience, so long as the general assembly opposed the restoration of the Bishops. He resolved therefore to cause a general assembly to be held at Glasgow in 1610, where he took care to gain a majority of votes, and of which the Bishops were the chief directors. The assembly thus disposed, agreed that the Bishops should resume all their spiritual functions, with the government of the church. After that, in 1612, the King called a Parliament, who, upon the consent of the Glasgow assembly, passed an act, whereby the Bishops were restored to all their spiritual rights.

The adversaries of the Bishops, astonished at this proceeding, were forced to be silent, the torrent being too strong, to be opposed. Besides, the general assemblies being grown less necessary, since the Bishops had the government of the church, the King very seldom gave them leave to meet, and when he did, it was after he had taken all necessary precautions to be assured that the Bishops would be the directors and managers. In 1617, he moreover obtained of the Parliament an act, whereby it was ordained, that the Bishops should be elected by the chapters, and consecrated with the accustomed rights, that is with those introduced of late years. As during the troubles in Scotland on account of religion, the people loudly complained of the restoration of the Bishops, the consent of the Glasgow assembly in 1610 was continually objected to them. For this reason the first general assembly that King Charles was obliged to grant in 1638, found no better method to evade this objection, than to declare the Glasgow assembly void from the beginning.

Such was the state of episcopacy in Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation to the reign of Charles I. who, at his accession to the throne, found it fully established, though contrary to the bent of the nation in general. James I. as we observed, had formed the design of putting the kirk of Scotland upon the same footing with the church of England. He had made great progress therein, and Charles I. pursued the same design with still more ardor than his father.

After James I. had entirely restored episcopacy in Scotland, he resolved to finish his work by degrees. To that purpose, he began with the five articles mentioned in the history of his reign, which he caused to be approved by the general assembly of Perth, by means as illegal perhaps as violent. The Bishops governed the presbyteries, by making themselves moderators, so that it was not possible to chuse any for commissioners to the assembly general, but such as they thought proper. However this be, the five articles being approved, the King, who by long experience was well acquainted with the genius and character of the Scots, thought it necessary, before all things, to curb the petulancy and boldness of the ministers, for fear they should raise disturbances in the kingdom. The people had for them a great veneration, which was even increased after the restoration of the Bishops, because these last were more careful to maintain their grandeur and power, than gain the love of their flocks. To compass his ends, the King set up in Scotland a high-commission, like that in England, but which, till then, was unheard of in Scotland. As the Scots had never given their King the title of supreme head of the church, as was done in England, there had been no occasion to establish a high commission in Scotland, to exercise the supremacy in the King's name. But James I. who was very apt to stretch his prerogative, readily believed, he had no less right to exercise the supremacy in Scotland than in England, though till now he had never thought of any such thing. Be this as it will, by means of this new court, which was at first very severe, he excommunicated and deprived the ministers for the least offence, and kept them so in awe, that not a man dared to stir. This, with the favours bestowed upon such as showed a readiness to countenance his designs, made him almost secure of success in his undertaking, which daily advanced. Nothing was wanting to complete it, but the causing the English liturgy and canons to be received in Scotland. So the King having convened a general assembly at Aberdeen, it was represented to them, that Divine Service was performed in the kirk of Scotland after an indecent manner, every minister having liberty to compose public prayers, and use what expressions he pleased, which was liable to great inconveniencies: that it would therefore be proper to compile a liturgy to be used in every church in Scotland, to the end the people might every where pray with one heart and one mouth. It must be observed, that it was not moved to receive the English liturgy, but only to compose one proper for the kirk of Scotland. Whereupon several members of the assembly believed, they might without danger agree, that a Common-Prayer-Book should be used, and the rather, as the Reformed churches of Geneva, Switzerland, France, and Germany, had their several liturgies, though very different from that of the English. This motion being approved, the assembly appointed commissioners to compose this new liturgy, and it may well be imagined, this nomination was agreeable to the King's desire. These commissioners, most of whom were Bishops, after spending a considerable time in framing this liturgy, only copied that which was set forth in England in the reign of Edward VI. and sent it to the King for his approbation.

The affairs of the Palatinate, and the Spanish marriage so engrossed King James during the last years of his life, that he could not effectually think of finishing the work he had undertaken in Scotland. As he knew the Scots perfectly, and their strong prejudice for presbyterianism, he doubtless thought proper to defer the execution of his design till he had ended his two principal affairs. He was apprehensive, that if any troubles should unfortunately happen to Scotland on account of the liturgy, they might divert him from what was then the principal object of his care.

Charles I. was no less eager than his father, to establish in Scotland the discipline of the church of England. But his circumstances in the beginning of his reign, did not allow him to apply himself to the finishing of this affair with all the speed he desired. His wars with Spain, and afterwards with France, his projects with regard to his prerogative, his continual quarrels with the Parliaments, required his whole application. Besides, it was not proper in these junctures to rouze the Scots, who indeed seemed quiet and submissive, but yet were very discontented, as the King well knew. He stayed therefore till he had concluded a peace with France and Spain, and rendered himself as it were, absolute by the dissolution of three Parliaments, by his resolution never to call any more, and by establishing his prerogative concerning taxes, without the concurrence of the Parliament. Then it was that he seriously thought of completing the reduction of the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England. He had not however been idle with respect to Scotland during these first years of his reign. Though he had delayed the execution of his design, it was ever his thoughts, and he had taken some measures which seemed to warrant success.

I. He had either continued or renewed the high-commission, introduced by the King his father.

II. He had almost abolished the general assemblies, by not allowing any since his accession to the throne.

III. He had so supported and countenanced the Bishops, that they had the clergy entirely in their power, whom they ruled with a very heavy hand.

IV. He had gained a great number of the ministers by means of benefices and ecclesiastical offices or dignities, which were granted only to those whose compliance he could depend upon.

V. He had so filled the council of Scotland, in whose hands the administration of affairs is lodged in the King's absence, that there was scarcely a Privy-Counsellor but what was engaged to promote his designs.

VI. There was in this council several Bishops, and the Archbishop of St. Andrews was vested with the Chancellorship, the prime office of the kingdom.

VII. He had secured the Lords of Session, that is, of the College of Justice, and in a word, all who had places depending upon the court.

VIII. He had charged Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, to hold continual correspondence with the Bishops and council of Scotland, and take with them the necessary measures to accomplish the design.

It seemed therefore impossible, that the King should meet with any opposition from a dispersed people, without out leaders, without support, and destitute of the assistance of their magistrates.

With all these advantages, Charles undertook to finish what still remained to be done in Scotland. To that end, after a revisal of the liturgy transmitted to the late King, he sent it back into Scotland, with orders to have it received in the kirk. 'But upon the objection, that this liturgy being word for word the same with that of the church of England, the Scots might take offence at the imposing upon them the liturgy of another kingdom, he thought proper to make some alterations, and ordered, that instead of the English Version of the Psalms, and of the Epistles and Gospel, the Scotch translation should be inserted in the liturgy of Scotland. After that, he believed it could not be complained of, with the least shadow of reason, that he had a mind to impose the English liturgy upon the kirk of Scotland.

During the revisal of the liturgy, the King sent into Scotland a book of canons, for the government of the kirk, and these canons enjoined a conformity to the liturgy, though it was not yet published, nor so much as known to the people. The pretence to introduce these new canons, was, that the acts of the general assemblies not being printed, but contained in many large manuscript volumes, remained unknown to the people. For this reason the King imagined, they would be obliged to him for his care in extracting the most material and principal things, in a little book which might be in every one's hands.

The liturgy being ready, the King sent it into Scotland, and appointed it to be read in all the churches of Edinburgh on Easter-day this year 1637. But upon farther consideration, this order was revoked. The King was told, it might be dangerous to surprize the people with the reading of the liturgy before they were prepared. That it was more proper to defer it some months, in order to see whether, in that interval, the mal-contents would attempt to oppose it. In that case, they might be oppressed, before they had time to take just measures, and the ill-success of their attempt would only serve to promote the King's design. This reason appeared so plausible, that the King ordered the reading of the liturgy to be deferred till Sunday the 23d of July the same year. During this whole interval, there was no unusual motion in Edinburgh, nor the least appearance that the King's orders would meet with opposition. To be still more secure, the council caused it to be published eight days before, in all the churches of the city, that the liturgy would be read the Sunday following. No person stirred the whole week, and all was so quiet in the city, that the council doubted not of success.

Nevertheless, the next Sunday, the Lord Chancellor, most of the Lords of the Council, some Bishops, the Lords of Session, or Judges of the Realm, and the Magistrates of Edinburgh, repairing to St. Giles's church, the cathedral of the city, when the Dean opened the the book to read the liturgy, the meaner sort of people, with clapping of hands, execrations and outcries, raised so hideous a noise, that it was not possible to hear a word. Whereupon the Bishop of Edinburgh, who was to preach, stepping into the pulpit, with thoughts to appease the people, was received with the same clamours and imprecations, and if a stool, thrown at his head, had not been diverted by the hand of one present, would have been in danger of being killed. The Lord-Chancellor and Judges found no more reverence. At last, the provost and bailiffs of the city came from their places, and with much difficulty thrust out of the church the enraged populace, and shutting the doors, the Dean read the liturgy, though continually interrupted by the noise without, and the stones thrown in at the windows. There were the same tumults in all the rest of the churches of Edinburgh, and yet no one was killed or wounded. Only the Bishop of Edinburgh ran some risk both in the church and in retiring to his lodging. This first tumult was raised only by the rabble, no person of condition or name appearing in it. The magistrates of Edinburgh openly disavowed these disorders, and promised the council to use their endeavours to discover and punish the authors and abettors. They offered likewise to take order for the security of the ministers who should be appointed to read the liturgy another time, and wrote to the Archbishop of Canterbury to clear themselves, desiring him to represent their innocence to the King.

Harvest approaching, many people left Edinburgh, and went into the country. Meanwhile, the magistrates of the city prayed the council that the liturgy might not be read, because they had observed the people were not yet disposed to receive it. But in October, after harvest, so great a concourse of people flocked to Edinburgh, that it was easy to see a fresh tumult was preparing. Wherefore the council published three proclamations. The first, to order all strangers to depart the city within twenty-four hours. A second, for removing the session from Edinburgh to Dundee. A third, for calling in and burning a seditious book, intituled, "A Dispute against the English Popish Ceremonies, obtruded upon the kirk of Scotland." The first and last were not much regarded.

On the morrow, the 18th of October, the people came together in a tumultuous manner in the streets of Edinburgh, and seeing the Bishop of Galloway as he was going to the council, a great multitude followed him all the way with continual cursings, but however did him no hurt. They even beset the council-house, demanding the Bishop's person, though it was in their power to have seized, or even to have killed him whilst he was in the street. The council finding themselves thus beset, sent to the magistrates to come to their relief; who answered, they were themselves surrounded in their town house by their own citizens, who threatened to tear them in pieces, if they did not immediately sign a paper, which for fear of their lives they were forced to do. The paper contained these three things: First, that the magistrates should join with the people in petitioning against the liturgy: Secondly, that by their authority they should presently restore to their pulpits Ramsey and Rollock, two silenced ministers, very much beloved by the people: Thirdly, that they should restore to his place one Henderson a silenced reader. Upon this the Earls of Traquaire and Wigton, the first of whom was Lord Treasurer, came to the town house to advise with the magistrates, what was best to be done for the safety of the Bishop of Galloway, who was still beset. After this consultation, the two Earls returning to the council were insulted by the populace. The Earl of Traquaire was thrown down, his hat, cloak, and white-staff taken from him, the people crying out, "God defend all those who will defend God's cause, and God confound the service book and all the maintainers of it." Presently after the provost came to the council, and declared, that though he had used his utmost endeavours, it was not possible to appease the people. At last, the Lords of the council applied themselves to some of the nobility and gentry and others who were now assembled to sign the petition against the service-book. These men had more credit with the populace than the magistrates, and prevailed with them at length to retire. This second tumult, wherein no person was killed or wounded, seemed however to be more important and dangerous, because in the first, none but the rabble were concerned, whereas in this it plainly appeared, the mutineers were countenanced by several Lords and Gentlemen, as well as by the better sort of citizens.

The tumult being appeased, a proclamation was published forbidding any meetings in the streets or elsewhere; a proclamation of no use, at a time when the council could not be ignorant how much their authority was contemned by those whom they would have inspired with fear. Accordingly, so far were the mal-contents from being terrified, that they sent their commissioners to the board, to require that the silenced ministers might be restored to them, and that they might have assurance for the punctual performance of what had been lately promised them by the magistrates. The council could easily see by this conduct, that the mal-contents had no design to stop here. And indeed, shortly shortly after, the Lord-Chancellor received two petitions, one in the name of all the men, women, children, and servants of Edinburgh against the liturgy: the other from the noblemen, gentry, ministers, and burgesses of the same city, against the liturgy and book of canons.

The King thought not fit to answer these petitions, being on the contrary determined to punish severely the authors of the late tumults.* However he commanded the Privy-Council to publish a proclamation on this occasion, supposing, though without any foundation, it would be capable of satisfying the people.†

Some time after, the council having removed the session to Stirling, the King sent them another proclamation, with orders to have it publicly read in the principal towns of the kingdom.‡

This proclamation was not capable of satisfying the mal-contents. First, there was not a word concerning the subject of their petition, and by that they could perceive, the King had no design to suppress the liturgy and canons. Secondly, the King represented as a great condescension, the pardon he was pleased to grant for their fault in presenting a petition without his leave. This shewed them, that, according to the King's intention, obedience was their only course for the future. Thirdly, the King clearly intimated to them, he would receive no more petitions, since he declared, he would reject such as should by the matter or form be prejudicial to his authority. In short, they saw plainly, the King, in forbidding all meetings, sought only to disunite and hinder them from concerting measures to obtain their desires. So, on the morrow, the Earls of Hume and Lindsey, accompanied with a great croud of nobles and people, came and publicly read in Stirling a protestation against the proclamation, the presence and authority of the council not being capable of hindering it. The same protestation was publicly read at Lithgow and Edinburgh, immediately after the proclamation had been published there.§

Hitherto the King and the council of Scotland had flattered themselves that the mal-contents might be curbed by acts of authority. But this protestation plainly shewed they were too powerful to be compelled to obedience, by orders of the council, or by proclamations. The mal-contents before they could know the effect of their protestation upon the King, erected at Edinburgh, which was at their devotion, several tables (as they called them) to manage their affairs. There were four principal ones: the first of the Lords; the second of the gentry; the third of the boroughs; and

* There were, on June 14, this year, extremely severe proceedings in the Star-Chamber against some persons, which served very much to incense the whole nation against that merciless court.

I. William Prynn, for writing in his confinement in the Tower, books called the Quench-Coal, News from Ipswich, The unbishoping of Timothy and Titus.

II. John Bastwick, M. D. (born at Writtle in Essex, brought up at Emanuel College, and Padua, and who professed physic at Colchester,) for a book called, Flagellum Pontifices & Episcoporum Latialium, and another against the high-commission, intituled, his Litany.

Henry Burton, B. D. Rector of St. Matthew's in Friday-street, and formerly closet-keeper to the King, for a sermon preached on November 5, in all which books were contained severe invectives against the Bishops. For this they were all three fined 5000*l.* a piece. Prynn condemned to lose the rest of his ears, and to be stigmatized on both cheeks with the letters, S. L. for a seditious libeller; and the other two to lose only their ears; and all to be imprisoned for life; Prynn in Caernarvon, Bastwick in Launceston, and Burton in Lancaster castle. From whence they were afterwards removed, Prynn to Montorgueil castle in Jersey, Bastwick to the Scilly Islands, and Burton to Guernsey. The Lord Clarendon observes, that as these three men were of the three professions which had the most influence upon the people, though they had formerly been looked upon under characters of reproach, yet when they were exposed on scaffolds, as common and signal rogues, to have their ears cut off, and faces branded with hot irons, men began no more to consider their manners, but the men; and each profession, with anger and indignation enough, thought their education, and degrees, and quality, would have secured them from such infamous judgments, and treasured up wrath for the time to come.——But this was not all: for John Lilburn, for writing in Prynn's behalf, to whom he had been clerk, was condemned to be whipped from the Fleet-Prison, to Westminster-Hall, and to stand in the pillory. He is said to have received five hundred stripes with a treble cord. Also Williams, Bishop of Lincoln; upon a charge of disloyal words against the King, and for suborning witnesses, was fined 10,000*l.*, committed to the Tower, and suspended ab officio & beneficio. And Lambert Osbaldeston, Master of Westminster-school, for some letters of his to that Bishop, which were supposed to reflect on Archbishop Laud, was fined 5000*l.* to the King, and 5000*l.* for damages to the Archbishop, and to stand in the pillory in Dean's-Yard, but he made his escape. Bishop Williams was also fined 8000*l.* upon this account.——The jealousy of the church appeared in another instance less tragical. Archy, the King's fool, who, by his office, had the privilege of jesting on his master, and the whole court, happened unluckily to try his wit upon Laud, who was too sacred a person to be played with. News having arrived from Scotland of the first commotions excited by the liturgy, Archy, seeing the primate pass by, called to him, "Who's fool, now, my Lord?" For this offence, Archy was ordered, by sentence of the council, to have his coat pulled over his head, and to be dismissed the King's service.—Here is another instance of that rigorous subjection in which all men were held by Laud: some young gentlemen of Lincoln's-Inn, heated by their cups, having drunk confusion to the Archbishop, were at his instigation cited before the Star-Chamber. They applied to the Earl of Dorset for protection. "Who bears witness against you?" said Dorset. "One of the drawers," they said. Where did he stand, when you were supposed to drink this health?" subjoined the Earl. "He was at the door," they replied, "going out of the room." "Tush," cried he, "the drawer was mistaken: you drank confusion to the Archbirhop of Canterbury's enemies; and the fellow was gone before you pronounced the last word." This hint supplied the young gentlemen with a new method of defence; and being advised by Dorset to behave with great humility and great submission to the primate; the modesty of their carriage, the ingenuity of their apology; with the patronage of that noble Lord, saved them from any severer punishment than a reproof and admonition, with which they were dismissed.

† After mention in the proclamation of the Lords' petition, &c. it was said, "His Majesty in a just resentment of that foul indignity, the late insurrections at Edinburgh, hath been moved to delay the signification of his Majesty's gracious intentions, in giving to his subjects such satisfactory answers to their petitions, as in equity might be expected from so just and religious a Prince: but yet his Majesty being unwilling that his loyal and faithful subjects should be possessed with groundless and unnecessary doubts and fears, his Majesty is pleased out of his goodness to declare, that as he abhorreth all superstition of popery, so he will be most careful, that nothing be allowed within his Majesty's dominions, but that which shall tend to the advancement of true religion, as it is at present professed within his most ancient kingdom of Scotland; and that nothing is or was intended to be done therein, against the laudable laws of this his Majesty's native kingdom."

‡ The proclamation was to this effect: "We find our royal authority much injured, (by some late petitions and declarations given in to our council against the book of common-prayer, and canons of the church,) both in the matter and in the carriage thereof; whereby we conceive those of our nobility, gentry, and others, who kept and assisted these meetings, for contriving and forming the said petitions, to deserve and be liable to our high censure, both in their persons and fortunes; yet because we believe, that what they have done herein is out of a preposterous zeal, we are graciously pleased to dispense therewith, and with what may be their fault or error therein, to all such as, upon signification or declaration of our pleasure, shall retire themselves as becometh good and dutiful subjects: to which purpose our will and pleasure is, that you discharge all such convocations and meetings in time coming, under the pain of treason. And also that you command, charge, and inhibit all our lieges and subjects, that none of them presume, nor take in hand, to resort nor repair to our burgh of Stirling, nor to no other burgh where our council and session sits, till first they declare their cause of coming to our council, and procure their warrant to that effect. And as concerning any petitions that shall hereafter be given us, upon this or any other subject, we are likewise pleased to declare, we will not shut our ears therefrom, so that neither the form nor matter be prejudicial to our regal authority."

§ In this protestation the mal-contents said, "They had presented a supplication on the 23d of September, and another upon the 18th of October; as also a remonstrance, December the 19th, against the service-book, and the canons, as well as against the Archbishops and the Bishops, as their parties, having the same day presented a declinator against them, to prevent their being Judges in their own cause. But the council having refused to admit of this declinator, they found themselves obliged to make the following protestation:—

"I. That they might have immediate recourse to the King, to present their grievances, and in a legal way to prosecute the same before the ordinary competent judges.

"II. That the Archbishops and Bishops could not be reputed or esteemed lawful judges, till they had purged themselves of such crimes as were laid to their charge.

"III. That no proclamation, nor any act of council, past in presence of the Archbishops and Bishops, could any ways be prejudicial to the supplicants.

"IV. That neither they, nor any that had joined, or should join with them against innovations, should incur any danger in life, lands, or any political or ecclesiastical pains, for not observing such acts, books, canons, rites, judicatures, proclamation, introduced without or against the acts of general-assemblies, or acts of Parliament, and the statutes of the kingdom.

"V. That if any inconveniences should fall out thereupon, they could not be imputed to them, since the council refused to hear their just remonstrances.

"VI. That their requests tended to no other end, but to the preservation of the true reformed religion, and the laws and liberties of his Majesty's kingdom."

the fourth of the ministers. And the gentry had many subordinate tables, according to their several shires. These tables consulted of what they thought fit to be proposed at the general table, consisting of commissioners chosen from the other four tables. Never was Sovereign more punctually obeyed than this general table, by all who disapproved the innovations introduced into the church for thirty or forty years past, that is, by almost the whole kingdom.

The first thing that proceeded from these tables was the famous covenant, or general bond entered into by the Scots, for maintenance of their religion from all innovations.*

This covenant, like an alarm-bell, brought all the Scots together that were dissatisfied with the government, that is, almost the whole nation. It was subscribed by the great men and the people, except the Privy-Counsellors, the Judges, the Bishops, and such ministers as were dignitaries in the church. These were, a little before it, vested with all the authority both in church and state, the King verily believing, that to have those for him, who were in the public places and offices, was sufficient to awe the people. But when the breach was once made, by the publication of the covenant, the number, not the quality of adherents, was to be considered, and then the royalists were not above one in a thousand, so that the King, Council, Judges, and Bishops, were on a sudden without authority and power. To urge the laws was in vain: the covenant was the sole law that the people would follow with respect to religion, as being bound by a solemn oath. Thus, the King's authority being no longer regarded, and his promises mistrusted by the people, as tending, in their opinion, only to deceive them, it is not strange, that the King's after-endeavours to extinguish the flame should prove fruitless.

Though the standard of rebellion was, as it were, erected in Scotland, and the King did not well see how he should free himself from these difficulties, he could not yet desist from his project. He still hoped the gathering storm might, by some artifice, be dispelled. So prepossessed was he in favour of the royal authority, that, though he saw it little regarded, he imagined, his declaration and proclamations, worded, for the most part, in ambiguous terms, would be sufficient to reduce the Scots to their duty. But he did not consider, that before the breach, the people were in a manner obliged to shut their eyes, and seem not to see what they saw: but that, when the breach was once made, the mal-contents were too wise to be taken in his snares, and too bold or insolent to refrain from publishing the artifices that were intended to amuse them. The King deceived himself also in another thing. As the Scots perpetually pleaded their laws, he thought to silence them, by alledging on his side, the laws enacted within forty years, not considering that these same laws were the principal cause of their complaints, and what they desired to be annulled. So, in producing these acts of Parliament, whereby the innovations had been approved, he only confirmed their belief, that he designed to support them, and consequently, it was necessary to use some violent means to make him desist. The King had for him the laws in force, since they were never repealed; and the people believed, they might rightfully cause to be abolished those laws, imposed on them by corruption, artifice, and violence, complaining, that these new laws were enacted in violation of the old. Thus, both sides complained of the breach of the laws.

The mal-contents having resolved to improve the weakness of the King's party, and the advantage given them by their covenant, to abolish the innovations complained of, used not so much the most just and legal means, as those they believed most proper for their ends. On the other hand, the King constantly adhered to the acts of Parliament, by which these pretended innovations were established, feigning not to see, in that respect, the least cause of complaint against himself, or the King his father.

Things being come to the point above-mentioned, by the almost universal subscription of the covenant, the King resolved to send the Marquis of Hamilton into Scotland, to represent his person under the title of his high commissioner. He imagined this Scotch Lord, being vested with so eminent a character, would by his credit and industry reduce the people to obedience, without giving them any real satisfaction, being still very unwilling to desist from his project. The tables having notice of this, doubted not but the King's aim was to amuse and surprize them, and therefore they used all possible means to divert the impending danger. The high-commissioner was received by the mal-contents with great coldness and little respect, and they prepared, to withstand him vigorously, in case he offered to assert his authority.

Meanwhile, the King having sent to Scotland a ship laden with arms for Edinburgh castle, the tables resolv-

* For the better understanding what this covenant was, it should be observed, that in 1580, whilst the Duke of Lenox and Earl of Arran, the King's favourites, were suspected of ill designs against the Protestant religion, the general assembly thought it necessary to draw up a confession of faith, and caused it to be subscribed by all the subjects, and by the King himself, to whom they presented a very humble petition on that occasion. As James could not reject this request, without confirming the people's suspicions, which might have been of dangerous consequence, he subscribed the confession of faith himself, and ordered it to be subscribed by persons of all ranks. This was done in the year 1580 and 1581, and the subscriptions were renewed in 1590, with an additional clause, whereby the subscribers engaged to maintain the true religion and the King's person.

It was this confession of faith of 1580, that was revived this present year 1638, by order of the general table, and offered to all sorts of persons to sign. Hitherto, there was nothing that could give the King just cause of complaint, at least, as to the matter, since it was the same confession that the King his father, and the whole kingdom, had signed in 1580 and 1581. But the tables were not satisfied with the bare confession of faith, they added also an obligation, whereby the subscribers bound themselves by oath, to maintain religion as it was in 1580, and to reject all the innovations introduced since into the church. This was directly contrary to the King's designs. Part of the oath which, being annexed to the confession of faith, was called the covenant, that is, contract, agreement, or league among the subscribers, was as follows:

"Finally, being convinced in our minds, and confessing with our mouths, that the present and succeeding generations in this land are bound to keep the aforesaid national oath and subscription inviolable: we Noblemen, Barons, Gentlemen, Burgesses, Ministers and Commons under subscribing, considering divers times before, and especially at this time, the danger of the true Reformed religion, of the King's honour, and of the public peace of the kingdom, by the manifold innovations and evils generally contained, and particularly mentioned in our late supplications, complaints, and protestations, do hereby profess, and before God, his angels, and the world, solemnly declare, that with our whole hearts we agree and resolve all the days of our life constantly to adhere unto, and to defend the foresaid true religion, and forbearing the practice of all innovations, already introduced in the matters of the worship of God, or approbation of the corruptions of the public government of the kirk, or civil places and power of kirkmen, till they be tried and allowed in free assemblies, and in Parliaments, to labour by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the gospel, as it was established and professed before the aforesaid innovations: and because after due examination we plainly perceive, and undoubtedly believe, that the innovations and evils contained in our supplications, complaints, and protestations, have no warrant of the word of God, are contrary to the articles of the aforesaid confessions, to the intention and meaning of the blessed Reformers of religion in this land, to the above-written acts of Parliament, and do sensibly tend to the re-establishing of the popish religion and tyranny, and to the subversion and ruin of the true Reformed religion, and of our liberties, laws, and estates; we also declare, that the aforesaid confessions are to be interpreted, and ought to be understood of the aforesaid innovations and evils, no less than if every one of them had been expressed in the aforesaid confessions; and that we are obliged to detest and abhor them, amongst other particular heads of papistry abjured therein: and therefore from the knowledge and conscience of our duty to God, to our King and country, without any worldly respect or inducement, so far as human infirmity will suffer, wishing a further measure of the grace of God for this effect, we promise and swear by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profession and obedience of the aforesaid religion; that we shall defend the same, and resist all these contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the utmost of that power that God hath put into our hands, all the days of our life. And in like manner, with the same heart we declare before God and men, that we have no intention or desire to attempt any thing that may turn to the dishonour of God, or the diminution of the King's greatness and authority; but on the contrary, we promise and swear, that we shall to the utmost of our power, with our means and lives, stand to the defence of our dread sovereign the King's majesty, his person and authority in the defence and preservation of the aforesaid true religion, liberties and laws of the kingdom; as also to the mutual defence and assistance, every one of us of another, in the same cause of maintaining the true religion, and his Majesty's authority, with our best counsels, our bodies, means, and whole power, against all sorts of persons whatsoever, &c."

ed to seize them, fearing that the King intended to surprise them, whilst he should amuse them with negotiations. This resolution could not be executed, because the King's party, having notice, instantly unladed the vessel, and carried the arms to Dalkeith, where the council then was. For this reason the tables set a guard near the gate of the castle, to prevent these arms from being carried in. At the same time, the mal-contents received two ships freighted with arms for their service. The King would hardly digest this affront. But the mal-contents did not think it prudent to be exposed to a surprize, on pretence that the rupture between the King and them was not yet intire.

The high-commissioner being come to Edinburgh, offered these three prepositions to the consideration of the mal-contents.

I. What they should expect to hear in the King's name for accommodating their grievances?

II. What might be expected from them for returning to their former obedience?

III. That they should renounce and deliver up their late covenant.

To which they answered,

I. That they insisted upon a general assembly, and a Parliament.

II. That they could not return to his Majesty's obedience, since they had never departed from it.

III. That they would sooner renounce their baptism than the covenant.*

The Marquis had brought with him a declaration, which however he was to make use of but in case of necessity, because the King was unwilling to promise the least condescension to the Scots, unless forced. But the Marquis soon perceived it was not possible to bring the mal-contents to obedience, without amusing them at least with the hopes that the King would have some regard to their grievances. He therefore thought proper to publish the declaration, though it evidently appeared by the very expressions, that the King would not be obliged to any thing.†

The high-commissioner being better informed of the affairs of Scotland, by what he had seen with his own eyes, thought it necessary to go himself and acquaint the King. He made therefore a journey to court, and returned shortly after, with a power to call a general assembly, and a Parliament. But as for the assembly, he would know beforehand what persons it should be composed of, and what was to be debated. The tables rejected this limitation, as tending to render the assembly useless. They likewise told him, if the King refused to convene a general assembly, they believed they were sufficiently authorised to call one themselves. At ength, the King's high-commissioner presented to the tables eleven articles, as so many conditions on which he was so willing to call an assembly. As he probably had good spies, he knew pretty well what the tables intended to do in order to reap great advantages by a general assembly, and these conditions solely tended to render their measures ineffectual. The tables being composed of the most able persons in Scotland, easily discovered the high-commissioner's aim. They replied therefore to these articles, so as to show him it would be very difficult to surprise them. Nevertheless he was not discouraged, and under colour of complying with the mal-contents, reduced the eleven conditions to these two, which however contained the substance of the eleven, and tended to the same end.

"I. That no laymen should have voices in chusing the ministers to be sent from the several presbyteries to the general assembly, nor any but the ministers of the same presbytery.

"II. That the assembly should not go about to determine things established by act of Parliament, otherwise than by remonstrance or petition to the Parliament."

The tables rejected these two conditions, regarding them as so many snares to surprise them, since they could not accept them without being at the King' mercy.

The high-commissioner clearly perceiving, he had to deal with men who were upon their guard, and that it would be difficult to surprise them, resolved to take a second journey to England, to inform the King of the state of affairs. By putting the mal-contents in hopes the King would grant such a general assembly, as they desired, he obtained with great difficulty, that the election of commissioners should be delayed till his return, which was fixed to the 21st of September. During his absence, the tables expecting only new snares, or fresh delays from the court,‡ resolved that a general assembly should be held, either with the King's permission, if he would grant it, or without his consent, and that the election of commissioners should be the 22d of September. In this interval, they sent to all the presbyteries, directions in eight articles, not to chuse any suspected minister, and to elect every where lay-elders, who should be persons of authority, and more numerous than the ministers. In a word, they took all possible measures to have an assembly at their devotion, wherein they perfectly succeeded, the King's party being every where so weak, that they were not in condition to oppose it successfully.

The high-commissioner being returned to Scotland with new instructions, immediately ordered a proclamation to be published, containing in substance these three principal articles:

"I. That his Majesty revoked the service-book, the book of canons, the high-commission, and the five articles of Perth.

"II. That for the future none of his subjects, whether ecclesiastical or civil, should be liable to the trial and censure of the Parliament, or general assembly.

"III. That persons of all ranks should be required to sign the confession of faith of 1580, with the oath he

* After this, they set new guards upon the castle of Edinburgh; doubled the watch; and, hearing that the Lord Commissioners was to have the next Sunday, Divine Service in the King's palace at Holyrood house, they sent him word, that whosoever should read the English service in that chapel, should never read more, and that there were a thousand men ready to disturb it.

† What follows is the most material part of the declaration; "And for further clearing of scruples, we do hereby assure all men, that we will neither now, nor hereafter, press the practice of the Service-book, or the aforesaid canons, nor any thing of that nature, but in such "a fair and legal way, as shall satisfy all our loving subjects," that we neither intend innovations in religion or laws; and to this effect have given order to discharge all acts of council there anent. And for the high-commission, we shall so rectify it, "with the help and advice of our Privy-Council," that it shall never impugn the laws, nor be a just grievance to our loyal subjects; and what is further fitting to be agitated in general assemblies and Parliament, for the good and peace of the kirk, and peaceable government of the same, in establishing of the religion at present possessed, shall likewise be taken into our royal consideration, in a free assembly and Parliament, which shall be indicted and called with our best convenience."

The King must have been ill-informed of the disposition of the Scots, to imagine that a declaration with so many restrictions and ambiguous expressions should be capable of contenting them. This declaration was no sooner proclaimed at the market-cross of Edinburgh, but the tables caused an answer in form of a protestation to be publicly read in the same place, the substance whereof was:

I. That no proclamation or declaration could settle their fears, nor secure them from the re-entry of any evil or innovation.

II. That they positively insisted upon a general assembly and a Parliament, which the King did not promise to call.

III. That the proclamation did not mention their complaints and grievances, but under the name of disorders, faults, and misdemeanors, &c.

IV. That the King took it for granted he had abundantly and sufficiently satisfied their fears, by his two former proclamations, and by his present declaration.

V. That this proclamation supposed them guilty of an unlawful combination, or rebellion.

VI. That it did not disallow nor discharge any of the innovations complained of, but left liberty to any prelate or person to practise the same.

VII. That it plainly evidenced his Majesty's intentions of pressing the practice of those innovations in a legal way, that is, according to those laws which were the subject of their complaints.

VIII. That his Majesty did not promise to abolish, but only to rectify the high-commission, with the advice of his Privy-Council, implying the King's power, with consent of his council, to establish any judicatory within his kingdom, without consent of the three estates convened in Parliament.

‡ This it seems was the grand design of the court, as appears by one of the King's letters to the high-commissioner; "in a word," says his Majesty to him, "gain time by all the honest means you can, without forsaking your grounds."

had annexed, but very different from that of the covenant."

After publishing this proclamation, the high-commissioner summoned a general assembly to meet at Glasgow the 21st of November this year, 1638, and a Parliament at Edinburgh the 15th of May the next year, 1639.

Though the confession of faith which the King ordered to be signed, was exactly the same with that prefixed to the covenant, the oath or general-band annexed by the King, imported, that they swore to maintain the religion at present professed, which was utterly destroying the oath of the covenant, whereby the subscribers were bound, to reject all the innovations introduced since 1580. This snare was so palpable, and so very injurious to the King's affairs, that the council, to prevent its ill effects, were forced to publish a declaration, that the meaning of the oath was, that they swore to maintain the religion professed in 1580. But notwithstanding this, the tables caused a protestation against the proclamation to be publicly read, to show, as they pretended, that the King acted not with sincerity; that by certain ambiguous clauses, restrictions, and additions, he took away with one hand, what he gave with the other; and reserved to himself a liberty to maintain at a more convenient season, the innovations he seemed to depart from.

During the interval between the publishing of the proclamation, and the general assembly, the high-commissioner and council used all possible endeavours to make all sorts of people sign the confession of faith as sent by the King, and the tables on their part forgot nothing to oppose it. But there passed at this time, a thing of great importance, which must not be omitted. Many Lords, Barons, Gentlemen, Ministers, Burgesses, who were not commissioners to the general assembly, presented to the presbytery of Edinburgh, an information against David Lindsey, Bishop of Edinburgh, and at the same time against all the rest of the Bishops. The substance of this information, which contained several articles, some whereof doubtless were much aggravated, was, that Lindsey and his brethren had not performed the conditions required of them by the Montrose assembly. The design of this information was to prevail with the presbytery to summon, as they did accordingly, the Bishops to appear before the assembly which was to be held at Glasgow. For as the abolition of episcopacy was now resolved, it was necessary that the general assembly should have some ground or pretence to prosecute and try the Bishops. And for this the information was intended.

The general assembly met at Glasgow on the day appointed; and, besides a great concourse of people, all the nobility and gentry of any family or interest were present, either as members, assessors, or spectators: and it was apparent, that the resolutions taken by the covenanters, could here meet with no manner of opposition. A firm determination had been entered into, of utterly abolishing episcopacy; and, as a preparative to it, there was laid before the presbytery of Edinburgh, and solemnly read in all the churches of the kingdom, an accusation against the Bishops, as guilty, all of them, of heresy, simony, bribery, perjury, cheating, incest, adultery, fornication, common swearing, drunkenness, gaming, breach of the sabbath, and every other crime that had occurred to the accusers. The Bishops sent a protest, declining the authority of the assembly; the commissioner too protested against that court, as illegally constituted and elected; and, in his Majesty's name, dissolved it. This measure was foreseen, and little regarded. The court still continued to sit, and to finish their business. All the acts of assembly, since the accession of James to the crown of England, were, upon pretty reasonable grounds, declared null and invalid. The Acts of Parliament which affected ecclesiastical affairs were supposed, on that very account, to have no manner of authority. And thus episcopacy, the high-commission, the articles of Perth, the canons, and the liturgy, were abolished and declared unlawful: and the whole fabric, which James and Charles, in a long course of years, had been rearing with so much care and policy, fell at once to the ground. The covenant likewise was ordered to be signed by every one, under pain of excommunication.

A. D. 1639.] Hitherto we have endeavoured to show the rise of the troubles of Scotland, to the end it may be the better conceived, how far the English ought to have been concerned in the war which broke out presently after, between the King and the subjects of Scotland. There were two parties in England, the courtiers and rigid episcopalians, who being religiously attached to the hierarchy, verily believed, the Scots were in the wrong to reject so obstinately this hierarchy, established thirty years by acts of Parliament. These looked upon the Scots as rebels, and wished to see them punished as such. The other party consisted of Puritans: under which name were included all those that were dissatisfied with the government, and thought the King assumed a power which belonged not to him. This party, though without posts or employments, and continually oppressed, was much superior in number to the other. These, far from disapproving the conduct of the Scots, said, that the Kings, James and Charles, having manifestly introduced innovations into the kirk, the Scots could not be justly blamed for desiring, things might be restored to their former state.

The King's party in Scotland was extremely weak, and consequently he had no other way left, than to use the forces of England to reduce the Scots to obedience. Accordingly, he took this course.* As soon as he heard that the general assembly of Glasgow continued their session by their own authority, and that the people approved of their conduct, he resolved to levy an army in England, to reduce the mal-contents of Scotland.

The King thought not proper to call a Parliament to enable him to raise the forces he wanted. Experience had taught him, that he was not to expect any great assistance from the Parliament, unless he would alter his maxims, and redress the people's grievances, which he did not intend. On the contrary, he flattered himself that he should easily reduce the Scots, and then be still more absolute in England. He chose therefore to suppose a defensive war, and on that supposition summoned the nobility to attend him at York the 1st of April following, each with as many horse as he could raise, and to inform the court within a fortnight, of the number that could be brought.

But, as having troops was not sufficient without money to subsist them, the King used two ways, besides those already in practice, as ship-money and others, to increase his revenues. The first was to demand voluntary contributions of the clergy, by means of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Laud wrote for that purpose a circular letter to the Bishops and all the clergy, to exhort them to contribute liberally for the defence of the kingdom, which was in extreme danger of a Scotch invasion. He added, by way of postscript, that his Majesty expected from the clergy a larger sum than what they were wont to give in the usual way. The second means used by the King was, to put the Queen upon writing to the Catholics, to incite them to aid the King on this urgent occasion. These two means brought in very nearly what the King expected.

Besides the horse to be brought by the nobility to York, all the counties were obliged to find a certain number of foot, horse, dragoons, artillery-horses, and a certain quantity of ammunition. The whole amounted to nineteen thousand four hundred and eighty-three foot, twelve hundred and thirty-three horse,† besides the

* This was the course the Marquis of Hamilton had from the beginning advised him to take; namely, to send his fleet quickly with two thousand land soldiers in it, and send down arms to the northern counties of England; to garrison Berwick with fifteen hundred men, and Carlisle with five hundred; and to come himself in person with a royal army.

† Upon the review taken afterwards by the King, the foot were found to be in all 19,614. The horse 1800, and the dragoons 1460.

the troops of the nobility, and thirteen hundred and fifty horses for the carriages. Moreover, the King equipped a fleet of sixteen men of war, the command whereof was given to the Marquis of Hamilton.

The King departed for York the 27th of March, his coronation-day, and on the 9th of April published a proclamation, to revoke sundry monopolies, licences, and commissions, which he had granted by his letters-patent.

Whilst the King was making his preparations, the Scots were not idle. They had also drawn forces together,* but their hopes were not so much built on their army as on their friends in England, and even at court. Some have suspected the Marquis of Hamilton, one of the King's favourites, of not having, at this juncture, faithfully served his master. As it was the King's interest to exasperate the English against the Scots, and persuade them that these last were in manifest rebellion; it was the Scots' interest on the contrary to show, they had never any ill design against England, and if they took arms, it was only in their own defence. They knew the success of the war depended upon the assistance England should freely give the King, and not upon the aid he should extort by force in virtue of his prerogative. And therefore their friends in England had advised them to mind two things especially. First, to clear themselves as fully as possible from the crime of rebellion, which the King laid to their charge. Secondly, to avoid every thing that might excite the English to engage in the war; for fear of giving the King the advantage of being able to say, they were undertaking an offensive war. They punctually followed these two advices, the former, by dispersing in England, by means of their emissaries, a great number of papers, wherein they set forth with all possible clearness the causes of their discontents, and the King's intentions. They forgot not to insinuate, that it concerned England no less than Scotland, to oppose the arbitrary power assumed by the King, as well in ecclesiastical as civil affairs. They followed the second advice, by obeying with intire submission a proclamation published by the King in Scotland, to forbid the Scotch army to approach within ten miles of the borders of England. By this obedience they evidently showed, the war was not offensive on their side. It is not unlikely, that some of their friends had counselled the King to publish this proclamation, on purpose to afford them an opportunity to give this proof of it.

But this was not the only advantage, the Scots reaped from the counsels given the King by their secret friends. He was persuaded, that their obedience to his proclamation was the effect of their fear; and was thereby induced to send another proclamation to Edinburgh, commanding the Scots to lay down their arms on pain of being declared guilty of treason, offering however pardon to all who should comply with his orders, and return to their duty. Nothing could be more prejudicial to him in Scotland, than such a proclamation, which showed he required a speedy obedience without any conditions; but the Magistrates of Edinburgh would not suffer it to be published. The same notion, that the Scots were intimidated, caused him to commit another error, in detaching the Earl of Holland with three thousand foot and a thousand horse, into Scotland by way of Kelsey. Lesley, General of the Scots, being informed of the Earl of Holland's march, sent five or six thousand foot and five hundred horse against him, who made him halt on a sudden. He sent however a trumpet to command them to retire, according to their promise. It was answered, he would do much better to withdraw himself; and indeed, he found it proper to take their advice. The Earl of Holland's march, which came to nothing, freed the Scots from their promise of not approaching the borders, and on the morrow, Lesley marched towards Kelsey, with about twelve thousand men.

The King began then to perceive that the obedience of the Scots was not owing to their fear, and that hitherto he had followed wrong counsels. Wherefore he took a sudden resolution to stand upon the defensive, and that very day, wrote to the Marquis of Hamilton, who was in the Frith with the fleet, to order him not to begin hostilities, though he had been sent there to take all possible advantages upon the Scots. But this resolution was taken too late, after what he had just done, at least if he had no other design than to make the public believe he had undertaken the war only in his own defence. But he had a stronger reason not to engage too far. For, upon notice of the Scots approach, most of his generals had advised him not to give battle, though he was much superior in number of troops, which he could ascribe only to their willingness to venture their lives in his service.

The two armies were so near each other, that a battle was expected every day, though, in truth, both sides were alike resolved to stand upon the defensive. But when it was least expected, the Lord Dumfermling, a Scotchman, came to the King's camp with a trumpet, and presented to his Majesty, in the name of the Scots, a very humble petition, intreating him to appoint commissioners to negotiate a peace. The King answered, he had sent a proclamation to Edinburgh, whereby he offered his subjects of Scotland the free enjoyment of their religion and laws, with a pardon to such as should return to their duty: that this proclamation had been rejected with contempt; but he desired it might be published in the Scotch army, after which, he would be graciously pleased to hear their petitions. Lord Dumfermling returning with this answer, the Scotch general ordered the proclamation to be publicly read in the army, which done, the King appointed six commissioners to treat with the Scots.

In the conference held the 11th of June, between the commissioners and both parties, the Scots desired three things; namely,

"I. That the acts of the late assembly at Glasgow should be ratified in the ensuing Parliament

"II. That all matters ecclesiastical might be determined by the assemblies of the kirk, and matters civil by Parliament.

"III. That his Majesty's ships and forces by land be recalled; that all persons, ships, and goods arrested be restored: and that all excommunicate persons, incendiaries and informers against the kingdom, who had caused these commotions for their own private ends, might be returned to suffer their deserved censure and punishment."

Upon this the King desiring the Scots to give in writing the reasons and grounds of their demands, the Lord Lowdon, one of the Scottish deputies, said, their desires were only to enjoy their religion and liberties according to the ecclesiastical and civil laws of the kingdom, and that, they would not insist upon any point that was not so warranted; humbly offering all civil and temporal obedience to his Majesty, which could be required or expected of loyal subjects. The King replied, if this was all that was desired, the peace would soon be concluded: and indeed, he granted immediately what the Lord Lowdon demanded, in the very same words, and on the same terms.

Then the Scottish deputies gave in writing the reasons and grounds of their three demands, and added, it was also desired that Parliaments might be held at set times, once at least in two or three years, by reason of his Majesty's absence, which hindered his subjects in their complaints and grievances to have immediate access to his Majesty. They took occasion likewise to declare in this paper, that it had always been far from their thoughts to refuse due obedience to their native King, or to make an invasion upon England. They said, these were calumnies, the authors whereof they most humbly desired might be made a public example.

It was the 15th of June before the King returned his answer,

Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel was General, Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, Lieutenant-General, and Henry Rich, Earl of Holland, General of the Horse.

* And seized Edinburgh and Dunbarton Castles; and applied to the King of France.

"I. That he could not ratify or approve the acts of the general assembly at Glasgow.

"II. That notwithstanding, he was pleased to confirm and make good whatsoever his commissioner had granted and promised in his name.

"III. That according to the petitioners' desire, all matters ecclesiastical should be determined by the kirk, and matters civil by the Parliament.

"IV. That a free general assembly should be held at Edinburgh the 6th day of August, and a Parliament at the same place the 20th of August next ensuing.

"V. That upon the Scots disarming and disbanding their forces, dissolving and discharging all their pretended tables and conventions, and restoring to every one, whatsoever had been taken and detained from them since the late pretended general assembly, his Majesty would presently after recall his fleet, and retire his land-forces, and cause restitution to be made to all persons of their ships and goods, detained and arrested since the aforesaid assembly."

Upon this answer the seven following articles were at last agreed on, the 17th of June, wherein however there was no mention of the principal reasons of the quarrel, because these matters were to be examined by the general assembly and Parliament of Scotland.

"I. The forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolved, within eight and forty hours after the publication of his Majesty's declaration being agreed upon.

"II. His Majesty's castles, forts, ammunitions of all sorts, and royal honours to be delivered after the said publication, so soon as his Majesty can send to receive them.

"III. His Majesty's ships to depart presently after the delivery of the castles, with the first fair wind, and in the mean time no interruption of trade or fishing.

"IV. His Majesty is graciously pleased to cause to be restored, all persons, goods and ships, detained and arrested since the first day of November last past.

"V. There shall be no meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations of his Majesty's lieges, but such as are warranted by act of Parliament.

"VI. All fortifications to desist, and no further working therein, and they to be remitted to his Majesty's pleasure.

"VII. To restore to every one of his Majesty's good subjects their liberties, lands, houses, goods and means whatsoever, taken or detained from them by whatsoever means since the aforesaid time."

Pursuant to these articles the Scots disbanded their troops, but in such a manner, that they could easily reassemble them in case of necessity.

As the general assembly and Parliament were to meet in August, the King appointed the Earl of Traquaire to represent his person in quality of high-commissioner. This Lord, who was Treasurer of Scotland, was entirely devoted to him, and it was with him that the Scotish Bishops and Archbishops of Canterbury held, before the war, a strict correspondence, in order to accomplish the King's designs.

The assembly, when it met, paid no deference to the King's prepossessions, but gave full indulgence to their own. They voted episcopacy to be unlawful in the church of Scotland: he was willing to allow it contrary to the constitutions of the church. They stigmatised the liturgy and canons as popish: he agreed simply to abolish them. They denominated the high-commission, tyranny: he was content to set it aside. The Parliament, which sat after the assembly, advanced pretensions which tended to diminish the civil power of the monarch; and, what probably affected Charles still more, they were proceeding to ratify the acts of assembly; when, by the King's instructions, Traquaire, the commissioner, prorogued them. And on account of these claims, which might have been foreseen, was the war renewed with great advantages on the side of the covenanters, and disadvantages on that of the King.

A. D. 1640.] The war being resolved, the King took measures to have a numerous army, by taxing, as usual, each county to find a number of troops. On the other hand, a sea-fight between the Spaniards and Dutch, near the coast of England, furnished the King with a pretence to renew his warrants for the payment of ship-money. As on this occasion the Dutch, who were the aggressors, had shown little regard to the Sovereignty of the sea assumed by the King, his Majesty loudly complained of the affront he had received, and upon this foundation seemed bent to equip a powerful fleet to preserve the dominion of the sea, and defend the kingdom. Wherefore he ordered ship-money, as well as the arrears of that tax, to be levied with great severity. The sheriff of Northamptonshire, having sent to court a petition of the county against ship-money, the council reprimanded him very sharply, commanding him to do his office on pain of exemplary punishment. On the other hand, Sir John Finch being made Lord Keeper* upon the death of the Lord Coventry, made a speech to the Judges, to exhort them to use in their circuits all their authority to promote this tax.

At last, the King appointed Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, General of the army against Scotland, and gave him for Lieutenant General Thomas, Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, lately made Earl of Strafford. As he always dreaded the correspondents the Scots had in England, and for that reason durst not trust his council with all his affairs, he appointed a secret council, consisting of three persons only, namely, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Marquis of Hamilton, and the Earl of Strafford. These three entirely directed the King's most important affairs, and were the persons, that after mature deliberation, advised him to call a Parliament. But as the King objected to them, that before the subsidies, which the Parliament should grant, could be payed, he should be reduced to great straits; the secret council provided against this inconvenience, by advising him to borrow of each of his counsellors or others, who should be willing to lend, the sums he should want to supply his present occasions. The Earl of Strafford alone subscribed twenty thousand pounds. The example of the counsellor being followed by some other Lords, the King was enabled to make preparations for the war, before he had received any aid from the Parliament. So, the Parliament was called for the 13th of April, and a few days after the King published a proclamation, to revoke the same patents which had served to establish monopolies, though they had been revoked once before without any effect.

The Earl of Traquaire had intercepted a letter written to the King of France by the Scotish mal-contents; and had conveyed this letter to the King. Charles, partly repenting of the large concessions made to the Scots, partly disgusted at their fresh insolence and pretensions, seized this opportunity of breaking with them. He had thrown into the Tower Lord Loudon, commissioner from the covenanters; one of the persons who had signed the treasonable letter. And he now laid the matter before the Parliament, whom he hoped to inflame by the resentment, and alarm by the danger, of this application to a foreign power. By the mouth of the Lord Keeper, Finch, he discovered his wants, and informed them that he had been able to assemble his army, and to subsist them, not by any revenue which he possessed, but by means of a large debt of above three hundred thousand pounds which he had contracted, and for which he had given security upon the crown lands. He represented, that it was necessary to grant supplies for the immediate and urgent demands of his military armaments: that the season was far advanced, the time precious, and none of it must be lost in deliberation: that though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhausted by unnecessary pomp, or sumptuous buildings, or any other kind of magnificence: that whatever supplies had been levied on his subjects, had been employed for their advantage and preservation, and, like vapours rising out of the earth, and gathered into a cloud, had fallen into sweet and refreshing showers on the same fields from which they had at first been exhaled: that, though he devised such immediate assistance as might prevent for the time a total disorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them from their right to inquire into the state of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the redress of their grievances: that as much as was possible of this season should afterwards be allowed them for that purpose: that, as he expected only such supply at present as the current service necessarily required, it would be requisite to assemble them again next winter, when they should have full leisure to conclude whatever business had this session been left imperfect and unfinished: that the Parliament of Ireland had twice put such trust upon his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the session, a large supply, and had ever experienced good effects from the confidence reposed in him: and that, in every circumstance, his people should find his conduct suitable to a just, pious, and gracious King, and such as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between Prince and Parliament.

This speech was not capable of hindering the Commons from proceeding in the examination of grievances, and thereby they perverted the order prescribed them by the King. He was extremely troubled to see the time pass away to no purpose, and that the Commons should so little regard him, as not to rely on his promise, to hearken to their grievances, when the affair of supply should be ended. In short, perceiving, the Commons were not much moved by whatever he could represent to them, he so managed, that the Lords demanded a conference, where they endeavoured to show, that the affair of supply ought to precede that of grievances. This conference served only to retard the King's affairs. The Commons taking offence, that the Lords should meddle with what did not belong to them, voted it to be a breach of privilege. Several days were spent in this contest, and many conferences held, in which, contrary to the King's expectation, much time was lost. Wherefore, on the 2d of May, the King sent a message to the Commons for a positive answer concerning the supply he expected. But as they made no haste to answer, on the 4th of May his Majesty sent Sir Henry Vane, Secretary of State, with the following message:—

"His Majesty (the better to facilitate your resolutions) this day has thought fit to let you know, that of his grace and favour he is pleased, upon your granting twelve subsidies to be presently passed, and to be paid in three years, with a provison, that it shall not determine the sessions, his Majesty will not only for the present forbear the levying any ship money, but will give way to the utter abolishing of it, by any course that yourselves shall like best."

The Commons having taken this offer into consideration, great debates ensued, many thinking the King's demand exorbitant. However, the Lord Clarendon, who was then a member of the House, affirms, that notwithstanding the clamours of those who opposed the court, the House was inclined by degrees to give the King some satisfaction. But as the House could not come to a resolution the first day, Sir Henry Vane was desired to acquaint his Majesty, that they hoped to return him an answer on the next. Meanwhile, the King was maliciously informed, that the Commons sought only to gain time, in order to vote on the morrow against the war with Scotland. The King, unfortunately, gave entire credit to this information, the falsehood whereof he perceived not till it was too late to repair his error. Where great evils lie on all sides, it is difficult to follow the best counsel; nor is it any wonder, that the King, whose capacity was not equal to situations of such extreme delicacy, should have formed and executed the resolution of dissolving this Parliament: a measure however, of which he soon after repented, and which the subsequent events, more than any convincing reason, inclined every one to condemn.

Next day officers were sent by the council to search the Lord Brook's pockets and study for papers, he being suspected of holding intelligence with the Scots. Henry Bellasis, knight of the shire for the county of York, and Sir John Hotham, were examined in council, and committed to the Fleet, for refusing to answer to questions concerning things done in Parliament. John Crew, Esq. afterwards Lord Crew, who had been chairman of the committee for the affairs of religion, refusing to deliver to the clerk of the House of Commons, such petitions and papers as he had received, was sent to the Tower.

The Lord Clarendon owns, the King had no sooner dissolved the Parliament, but he was heartily sorry for it.* Nevertheless, he published a long declaration to justify his conduct.

Though the Parliament was dissolved, the King continued the convocation, under the title of synod. Since the time of the reformation, it had been always customary to assemble the clergy, at the same time with the Parliament, and this assembly of the clergy, was called the convocation, and always begun and ended with the Parliament. The King not thinking himself bound to a strict observance of this custom, dissolved the Parliament, and continued the convocation, contrary to the opinion of several,† who believed that he thereby exceeded his power. But the judges of the realm determined, that notwithstanding the dissolution of the Parliament, the convocation subsisted, unless dissolved by the King's writ. It therefore continued a month longer; and, besides granting to the King a supply from the spirituality, and framing many canons, the convocation, jealous of like innovations with those which had taken place in Scotland, imposed an oath on the clergy, and the graduates in the universities, by which every one swore to maintain the established government of the church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Chapters, &c. These steps, in the present discontented humour of the nation, were commonly deemed illegal; because not ratified by consent of Parliament, in whom all authority was now supposed to be centered. And nothing, besides, could afford more subject of ridicule, than an oath, which contained an et cætera in the midst of it.

What still more inflamed the people's discontent, was the seeing the Popish recusants not only tolerated, but protected, countenanced, and considered as the best subjects. They resorted publicly to mass to Somerset house, and returned from thence in great multitudes, as though their churches had been allowed by authority. A public agent from Rome resided at London, Count Rozetti by name, who openly went to court in great pomp, and whose house was the general rendezvous of the Catholics. The Queen had prevailed with the King to receive this agent as a sort of nuntio, and by that, as well as by the avowed protection she afforded those of her religion, she so drew upon herself the people's hatred, that they were even wanting in that outward respect they ought to have paid her.

All these discontents were fomented by the Scots, who seeing themselves upon the point of being attacked, were extremely diligent by means of their emissaries, to incense the people against the King. In justifying their own conduct, they forgot not to insinuate to the English, that the tyranny which was intended to be established in Scotland, was in order to introduce the like into England. And that if the King laboured to support the hierarchy erected in the kirk of Scotland by his father and himself, it was not so much for the sake of episcopal government, as in order to establish

* He consulted, the same day, or the next, whether he might by his proclamation, recall them to sit again. Though the Lord Clarendon lays the blame upon Sir Henry Vane, yet Whitelock says, it was chiefly by Laud's, and the secret council's advice, that the Parliament was dissolved.

† Dr. Brownrigg, Dr. Hacket, and other members of this convocation, (in all thirty-six,) protested against the continuance of its session.

in that kingdom an arbitrary power, which would be one day fatal to the English. That there was even great danger, that after the accomplishment of his designs, he would restore Popery in his kingdoms, since he could refuse nothing to the Queen, to Laud, and the other enemies of the Protestant religion. The King himself, by his conduct, rendered those insinuations so plausible, that besides the Presbyterians, who were very numerous, there were many church of England men, who could not forbear dreading, that the King's zeal for the church was only to engage them to be subservient to his more hidden designs. Be this as it will, the kingdom was full of suspicions, fears, jealousies, divisions, so that if the King had been well informed, he might easily have seen there were but very few that served him willingly and cheerfully, in the war with Scotland.

The King foresaw, that it would not be possible for him to maintain his army, unless he had recourse to extraordinary methods to raise money. Accordingly, he made use of the following expedients, to supply in part what he had expected from the Parliament.

I. He ordered that the counties should advance coat and conduct money for their respective troops.*

II. He bought upon credit of the East-India merchants all their pepper, and sold it again for ready money.

III. He took forty thousand pounds' worth of the bullion, which the merchants had brought into the mint to be coined, which sum was afterwards punctually repaid.†

IV. He would have borrowed two hundred thousand pounds of the city of London, but had the mortification to meet with a denial. He was so displeased at it, that he resolved to be revenged. The city, having some time before settled a colony at Londonderry in Ireland, had obtained a patent from the King for certain lands in that country. The Londoners had no sooner refused to lend the King money, but the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs were cited before the Star Chamber, to answer to the charge of having abused the patent, by usurping more lands than the King had granted to the city. Upon this charge, whether well or ill grounded, the Londoners were condemned to forfeit their rights, and grievously fined, but upon payment of the fine, their patent was restored.‡ They had but too many opportunities afterwards to be revenged of the King in their turn. On the other hand, the writ to levy ship money having been sent to the city of London, as well as to all the other towns in the kingdom, it appeared that the Lord Mayor and the city council had neglected to levy this tax, or at least, they had not distrained any one person for non-payment, according to the tenor of the writ. For this reason, the council sent an order to the attorney general, to prosecute the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, in the Star-Chamber, for their contempt and default in the execution of the said writ.

Thus the King, instead of relinquishing this odious tax, continued to exact it with great rigour, though his affairs were then at a crisis, which should have inspired him with a dread, that in case the success of the Scotch war did not answer his expectations, he should be little able to support himself.

Part of the army designed against Scotland was now upon the frontiers, under the command of the Lord Conway, general of the horse, whilst the rest lay encamped near York. The Earl of Northumberland, who was to command under the King, remained sick at London, and the Earl of Strafford, who was lieutenant-general, had not been able to depart soon enough, because he was a very necessary member of the King's secret council. The Lord Conway being advanced as far as Newcastle, with three thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, was informed that Lesley, General of the Scots,§ was preparing to march at the head of two-and-twenty thousand men, in order to enter England. And indeed, he passed the Tweed the 20th of August, the very day the King departed from London for York, where he arrived on the 23d. Lesley pursuing his march, came the 27th to Newburn, on the north side of the Tyne, four miles from Newcastle. At his arrival, he found the Lord Conway posted with his troops on the south side of the river, where he had raised breast works over against the two fords, to oppose his passage. The Scots forced the passage of the Tyne, after a fight very faintly maintained by the English. The Lord Conway was seized with such terror, that he left Newcastle the next day, and retreated to Durham, where not thinking himself yet safe, he went and joined the King's army, which was advanced to Northampton. The King's troops had no sooner quitted Newcastle, but the Scots entered, and found there the artillery and stores ordered thither by the King, who designed that place for the magazine of his army.

The entrance of the Scots into England, and the taking of Newcastle, broke all the King's measures. Though in this first action he had not lost above three or four hundred men, this inconsiderable loss produced however great effects, all to the King's disadvantage.

I. The Earl of Strafford, having spoken a little too roughly to the officers and soldiers, who were returned from the defeat of Newborn, displeased the whole army, and thereby put the vanquished upon magnifying, in their own vindication, the valour and number of the Scotch troops. This could not but produce an ill effect in the King's army, which before was not very well inclined.

II. The English mal-contents were more at ease, and spoke more boldly against the government, knowing it was no proper season to silence them.

III. The Scots missed not this opportunity to show the English, by as moderate a conduct as the juncture could allow, that their design in entering England, was not to injure the English, but only to procure access to the King in order to lay their grievances before him. By this means they separated, as much as they could, the King's cause from that of the people of England, which did the King an unspeakable prejudice.

IV. The consternation caused by the Newburn defeat, and, on the other hand, the moderation of the Scots, who, notwithstanding the success of their arms, affected to desire only an accommodation, inclined the whole nation to a peace. None but the court party used their utmost endeavours, though in vain, to inspire the English with a desire of revenge.

V. As in the King's present circumstances, with an army of enemies before him, and numberless mal-contents in all the rest of the kingdom, as well as in his own army, it was not possible for him to raise money, by the same methods he had till then practised, there resulted a general opinion that a Parliament was absolutely necessary.

To this it was that the Scots and the English mal-contents desired to lead him, though against his will, knowing it was hardly possible that a new Parliament should be disposed in his favour.

The Scots had in England more correspondents than the King had till now imagined. They had dispersed two manifestos, of which one was intituled, "Six considerations of the lawfulness of their expedition into England," and the other, "Intentions of the Scots

---

* These troops were pressed out of the militia of each county. Their allowance was eight-pence a day; and their whole number amounted to 16,800. There were forces raised in the same manner to go by sea. London found 1200, Essex and Kent 700 a piece, &c. In all 10,000. The first were to be at the rendezvous the 10th of May, and the latter the 25th, or 27th.

† There was likewise a design to debase the coin, but it was laid aside by the remarks of Sir Thomas Rowe, in a speech at the council table.——These several methods, and particularly a voluntary loan of some Lords of the Council, and other gentlemen, brought the King in 300,000*l.*

‡ They offered, by way of composition, to build for the King, a stately palace in St. James's park, and to pull down Whitehall, and make a stately way by the Thames side, straight from Charing-Cross to Westminster Hall.

§ To maintain their army, the Scots imposed a tax of the tenth penny upon all the rents of Scotland.

and their army manifested to their brethren of England."*

These manifestos, which were doubtless owing to the counsels of some of the English mal-contents, produced such an effect upon the people, the army, and the Lords themselves, who were not only devoted to the court, that the King might very easily see how difficult it would be to support the war, and to what danger he would be exposed, if he hazarded a battle at such a juncture. Nothing was more disadvantageous to the King, than the extreme desire expressed by the Scots to end the quarrel by an agreement, which showed their aim was not to make war upon the English, whereas it was the King's interest to engage them both in a national quarrel. Wherefore the Scots did not fail to improve the advantage of their moderate conduct. As soon as they were masters of Newcastle, they sent a very humble petition to the King, beseeching him to give ear to their complaints, and cure their evils, by the advice of the Parliament of England. The King, who was pressed on all sides, had already summoned the nobility to meet him at York the 24th of September, to give their advice upon the present situation of his affairs. He therefore told the Scots, that their petition was expressed in such general terms, that he could not give them a positive answer. But if they would speak more plainly, and declare the particulars of their demands, he would give such answers as the Peers who were to meet at York should think proper. Upon this they sent their demands to the King, the 8th of September, namely:

"I. That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to command, that the last acts of Parliament may be published in his Highness's name, as our Sovereign Lord with the estates of Parliament convened by his Majesty's authority.

"II. That the castles of Edinburgh and other strengths of the kingdom of Scotland may, according to the first foundation, be furnished and used for our defence and security.

"III. That our countrymen in his Majesty's dominions of England and Ireland may be freed from censure for subscribing the covenant, and be no more pressed with oaths and subscriptions unwarrantable by your laws, and contrary to their natural oath and covenant approved by his Majesty.

"IV. That the common incendiaries which have been the authors of this combustion may receive their just censure.

"V. That all our ships and goods, with all the damage thereof, may be restored.

"VI. That the wrongs, losses, and charges which all this time we have sustained, may be repaired.

"VII. That the declarations made against us as traitors, may be recalled in the end, by the advice and counsel of the state of England convened in Parliament. His Majesty may be pleased to remove the garrisons from the borders, and any impediments which may stop free trade."† Presently after it was publicly talked at London of presenting a petition to the King, to pray him to summon a Parliament. The privy-council, left by the King at London, having some notice of this design, endeavoured to prevent it by a letter directed to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen: but they could not succeed. So a petition was resolved and sent to his Majesty at York by some of the aldermen and common-council; and, within a few days, this petition was followed by another from twelve Lords, in behalf of themselves and divers others.

Presently after, the King having called the Yorkshire gentry together, proposed to them the payment of the trained bands for two months. This proposition being accepted, the gentlemen prepared an address to inform the King of their consent: but withal they besought his Majesty to endeavour to compose the differences with the Scots, and to summon a Parliament. The Earl of Strafford being desired to present the address to the King, refused it, unless the clause about calling a Parliament was left out, alledging, he knew, the King fully designed it. But the gentlemen were unwilling to leave out these words, and delivered their address themselves.

The King, perceiving by the petitions which were presented to him, that it was the nation's fervent desire, a Parliament should be called, did not doubt it would be the first advice, the Peers, when assembled, would give him. He resolved therefore to prevent this advice, by summoning a Parliament to meet on the 3d of November, for fear, if he delayed it any longer, he might be thought to be forced to it. The great council of the Peers being assembled at York the 24th of September, the King told them in his first speech, that he had taken this resolution. He also informed them, that the Queen, in a letter which she had written to him, had very earnestly recommended that measure.

When the King had thus addressed the Lords, he commanded to be read the reasons which had induced his council to advise the levying an army against the Scots, and the petition of the Scots, presented to the King since their taking of Newcastle, as also the King's answer, and their particular demands. Then, the Earl of Traquaire, by the King's order, explained these demands to the Peers, and endeavoured to show, how some of them subverted the fundamental laws of the kingdom of Scotland, others the just prerogative and dignity of his Majesty, and of which many were to the detriment of the King's profit, and prejudice of divers good subjects there. The result of the deliberations of the Peers was, that certain of themselves should be sent as commissioners to treat with the Scots, and endeavour to conclude a peace. Pursuant to this resolution, sixteen Peers were chosen for commissioners, to whom were added by the King as assistants, the

* In these two papers, they were extremely careful to show, that the motive of their armament and entry into England, was not to invade that kingdom, but only to defend themselves against some particular persons, their sworn enemies, among whom they named as the principal, the Earl of Strafford, and Archbishop of Canterbury. They said, in their present situation, their country being blocked up by sea and land, and their trade interrupted, it was not possible to expect any longer the coming of their enemies to attack them, without being exposed to certain ruin. They compared themselve to a man who, when his house is beset, and his enemies ready to assault it, sallies out himself and attacks them in hopes of averting, by a vigorous effort, the impending ruin. They maintained, it was the King that had broken the peace, and having granted that the general assembly should regulate the affairs of the kirk, and its regulations be ratified in Parliament, had, without any lawful cause, prorogued the Parliament, before what the general assembly had judged necessary, was confirmed. He had even denied to give audience to the deputies of the Parliament, and though he had agreed, other deputies should be sent to him, it was only to amuse them, since the war with Scotland had been already determined in the council, and the Parliaments of Ireland and England convened in order for supplies. They carefully represented the justice and equity of the late Parliament of England, in denying the King money for a war so notoriously unjust. In short, their aim was to demonstrate to the people of England,

I. The justice of their cause.

II. The artifices of their enemies to surprise them.

III. The necessity they were under, of taking arms in their own lawful defence, and to prevent their ruin.

IV. They said, notwithstanding their entry into England, the war was defensive on their part.

V. That they intended not to offer any injury or violence, or inrich themselves with the spoils of the English, but only to procure access to his Majesty, to present their grievances, which was denied them, unless they would entirely deliver themselves to the mercy of their enemies.

VI. They called God to witness, this was their intention, and the better to gain belief, they made use of the strongest expressions and most solemn oaths.

VII. Lastly, they forgot not to insinuate to the English, that they had the same cause to maintain, since the liberties of England were equally in danger with those of Scotland.

† It appears by this last article, how careful the Scots were to lose no opportunity to gain the people of England to their interest. Of this they also gave the following instance. As the Londoners had all their coals from Newcastle, and could by no means be without that trade, the Scots were no sooner masters of Newcastle, but they wrote to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, "That knowing how necessary the free traffic of coals was for their city, and other places of England, they had, as a testimony of greatest respect and good will to the city of London, sent two noblemen to declare to the masters of ships, who, possessed with needless fears, were hastening out of the river, that their purpose was not to stop, but to use their best means to continue that trade."—This letter answered the expectations of the Scots.

Earls of Traquaire, Morton, and Lanerick, secretary of Scotland, Sir Henry Vane, Sir Lewis Steward, and Sir John Burrough. It was farther agreed, that the treaty should begin at Rippon * the 1st of October, and that the Earl of Lanerick should signify this resolution to the Scots.

This article being dispatched, the King desired the Lords to consider of means to maintain the army during the treaty. The Earl of Strafford having informed the Peers of the number of troops the King had on foot, namely about four-and-twenty thousand men, declared that the payment of this army amounted to three score thousand pounds a month, and that to keep the army together for three months, no less would serve than the sum of two hundred thousand pounds. He added, if the army should disband, all Yorkshire would be lost in two days, and the whole kingdom endangered. Whereupon it was resolved, that a letter, subscribed by all the Peers present, should be sent to the city of London for lending the two hundred thousand pounds, upon such security as should be agreed on, each of the Peers offering to become bound.

The Scots having appointed their commissioners to treat with the English, the negotiation began at Rippon the 1st of October. But before the principal point of the treaty was considered, certain preliminary articles were to be settled, which the Scots proposed as absolutely necessary to a happy conclusion. They represented therefore, that their army had stopped at Newcastle by his Majesty's express order: that they subsisted by means of the contributions raised upon Cumberland, Newcastle, and Durham, and as the negotiation might last some time, it was necessary, before all things, to provide for the subsistence of their troops during the treaty. This was the principal article on which they insisted, as a preliminary to the treaty. The Scots would never suffer the Earl of Traquaire to assist at the treaty, because he was one of those they called incendiaries, against whom they demanded severe justice. After many debates, the commissioners of the two nations agreed at last, the 16th of October, on the following preliminaries.

"I. That the Scotch army should have for a competent maintenance, the sum of 850*l.* per diem; and that the payment thereof shall continue for two months, in case the treaty shall so long last; which payment to be made weekly upon the Friday of every week.

"II. The days of the returning of the army to be numbered within the days of the allowed maintenance.

"III. That the Scotch army shall content themselves with the aforesaid maintenance, and shall neither molest papists, prelates, nor their adherents, nor any other persons of whatsoever quality.

"IV. That the inhabitants of the said counties shall also have liberty to return peaceably to their own dwellings, and shall be refused no courtesy, it being always presupposed, that the fit lodging of their army shall be allowed.

"V. That the army be furnished with coals in a regular way, and not at the pleasure of the soldiers.

"VI. That there be a provision of forage, at the prices to be set down in a table, which must also contain the particular prices of all sorts of victuals, and other necessaries for the army, to be indifferently agreed upon by persons nominated on both sides.

"VII. That free trade and commerce between both nations be restored, and not to be interrupted, but upon the warning of three months. But no victuals, arms, nor ammunition, to be imported into Newcastle, &c.

"VIII. That victuals and other necessaries for the army be free of custom; and that his Majesty's custom of coals and other ware be left free to be levied by his own officers.

"IX. That there be a freedom to furnish necessaries for both armies, and liberty be granted for milling, brewing, &c.

"X. That the arrears of the contributions due to the Scotch army, be compleatly paid to October 16.

"XI. That there be a cessation of arms, according to the particulars to be agreed upon.

"XII. As for securing the sum of 850*l.* per diem above specified, there is a committee appointed, who have power to treat with Northumberland, the Bishopric of Durham, Newcastle, and (if need require) with Cumberland, and Westmoreland, about the payment of it.

"XIII. The Lords will, before their going from York, settle a committee, who shall have charge to see the contribution orderly raised and paid; and that there shall likewise be a committee nominated, to whom either the Scotch commissioners, or the committees of the country, may weekly give an account of the carriage of the business."

The Scots had the address to prolong the signing of these preliminaries till the 16th of October, after which, it still remained to agree on the conditions of the truce. It was therefore almost impossible to enter into a discussion of the articles, which were to be the chief subject of the treaty, before the third of November, the day appointed for the meeting of the Parliament. Wherefore the English commissioners, whether of themselves, or by the suggestion of the Scots, proposed to the King the removal of the treaty from Rippon to London; and the King was forced to consent to it, though he plainly perceived the Scots expected to find many friends at London, and even in the Parliament, as indeed was the case.

* York was named first, but the Scots refused to treat there, "As not secure for their commissioners, so long as the Earl of Strafford commanded there in chief, who had proclaimed them traitors in Ireland, before the King had done it in England." This was the first public appearance of the Scots' enmity against Strafford.

BOOK XX.

THE SECOND PART OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES I.

A. D. 1640.] THE King's affairs at the meeting of the Parliament, were in a very bad situation. Instead of subduing the Scots, as he flattered himself, he had the mortification to see them enter England, force the passage of the Tyne, defeat a considerable body of his army, and render themselves masters of Newcastle. Moreover, he saw his own troops not very ready to serve him. They consisted principally of soldiers enlisted against their wills, in the several counties, and prejudiced, like the rest of the nation, against the government. Besides, the valour of the Scots being magnified by those who had been routed, and by the King's private enemies, inspired the English troops with some terror. Moreover, the King wanted money to pay them. His whole resource was the two hundred thousand pounds borrowed of the city of London, till it should please the Parliament to furnish him with the necessary supplies. However, he was so prejudiced and exasperated against the Scots, that he hoped the new Parliament would look upon their entrance into England as an invasion, as a war made, not upon the King, but the kingdom, and would furnish the means to drive them into their country, and chastise their audaciousness. But it was not long before he perceived his hopes were ill-grounded.

The Parliament met the 3d of November. There had never been a more numerous assembly, very few members being absent. Every one looked upon this as the fairest opportunity that could possibly offer, to cure the evils of the kingdom; and all the members, except such as were entirely devoted to the King, were ready to contribute to the restoring of the government to its true and ancient constitution. Accordingly this was what the people expected.

After the King had opened the session, the Lord Keeper Finch made his speech. He began with encomiums of the King and Queen, and then endeavoured to persuade the two Houses, that the calling of the Parliament was wholly owing to his Majesty, who had resolved it, before he received any petition on that subject. After that, he strove to shew, though in a very general manner, that the Scots had violated the late treaty, and the King, against his will, taken arms by the unanimous advice of his council, to reduce them to obedience. He concluded with informing both Houses, of what had passed as well in the beginning of the war as in the conferences at Rippon.

The Commons having returned to their House, chose for speaker William Lenthall, a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, who was proposed by Sir Henry Vane, Secretary of State.* This choice being approved by the King, they appointed, according to custom, a committee to examine all questions that might arise about elections, returns, or other privileges of the House. Then it was resolved, that a committee of the whole House should meet on certain days of the week, for these five principal heads; religion, grievances, courts of justice, trade, and Ireland.

A great number of petitions upon these and other subjects were presented to Parliament within a few days after their meeting. Many members were also charged with similar petitions from their boroughs and shires, and several very mortifying speeches to the King and his ministers were made in the House. Mr. Pym, member for Tavistock, in the county of Devon, in a long studied discourse, divided into many heads after his manner, enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and from a complication of such oppressions inferred that a deliberate plan had been formed of changing entirely the frame of government, and subverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom.

As Mr. Pym was one of the leading men in the House of Commons, he was extremely applauded. His speech was followed by another from Sir Benjamin Rudyard, who to intimate that there was a settled design to introduce Popery and arbitrary power into England, expressed himself after this manner:

"They have so brought it to pass, that under the name of Puritans, all our religion is branded; and under a few hard words against Jesuits, all Popery is countenanced. Whosoever squares his actions by any rule either divine or human, he is a Puritan; whosoever would be governed by the King's laws, he is a Puritan; he that will not do whatsoever other men would have him do, he is a Puritan; their great work, their master-piece, now, is to make all those of the religion, to be the suspected party of the kingdom."

The speeches were seconded with so great a number of complaints and petitions concerning grievances both public and private, that the House was divided into above forty committees, according to the different nature of the complaints. But before the particular examination of these grievances was begun, the Commons thought fit to desire the concurrence of the Lords to move the King, that he would be pleased to appoint a fast, which met with no opposition either from the Lords or the King.† Then they appointed a committee to examine what number of Papists were in and about London, and how they were armed. As the King had acquainted them with his design to publish a proclamation against recusants, this committee was empowered to examine the same after the publication, and see how it was executed.

Two days after, on the 9th of November, the House going upon the grievances, the Lord Digby, son of the Earl of Bristol, made on that subject a speech, which he concluded with this motion, "That a select committee may be appointed to draw out of all that has been

* The Lord Clarendon says, the King designed Sir Thomas Gardiner, recorder of London, to be speaker. But he could not get him elected. And no wonder, if it be true as Whitelock says, that such a spirit of opposition to the court proceedings, was in the hearts and actions of most of the people, that very few of that party had the favour to be chosen members of this Parliament.

† Dr. Cornelius Burgess, and Stephen Marshal, preached on that day before the House of Commons; and preached and prayed at least seven hours between them.

been complained of, such a remonstrance a may be a faithful and lively representation to his Majesty, of the deplorable estate of the kingdom." Probably, this motion had been resolved among the leaders, because they were apprehensive of the King's opposing the redress of grievances, and because in that case it was requisite to show the people the necessity of this redress, by informing them wherein consisted the grievances of the nation. The Lord Digby's motion being approved, the House appointed a committee of twenty-four to prepare the remonstrance. But because the King showed greater condescension than was expected, this remonstrance was not drawn till above a year after, and upon another occasion.

Sir John Culpeper, one of the members who had spoken upon the grievances, having chiefly insisted on monopolies, it was voted, that all such members as directly or indirectly had any share in, or benefit from, any project or monopoly, should be disabled to sit in the House, and that Mr. Speaker should issue out writs to chuse others in their room. There were afterwards four expelled the House upon that account.

During the four or five first days, the House of Commons was almost wholly employed in receiving petitions and complaints. Amongst the private petitions, the most remarkable were those of Bastwick, Burton, Prynn,* Lilburn, Leighton, Jennings, and Smart.† These men complained of the exorbitant pains and penalties inflicted on them by the Star Chamber, and High Commission. Within the space of about a year, the Commons found time to examine all these sentences one after another, and to punish the members of the Star Chamber, who had given their votes; by condemning them to pay all the costs and damages to the parties. The reparations to Bastwick, Prynn, and Burton, were fixed to above four thousand pounds each. All the other complaints of private persons, whether against the courts of justice, or the Star Chamber and High Commission, or certain Bishops and Deans, who laboured more than the rest, to introduce innovations in religion, were heard. The Commons took a pleasure to mortify in their turn, those who had stretched the prerogative royal, in persecuting the Puritans, or rather such as did not bear the yoke patiently, who were confounded, under that name, with the Presbyterians.

If the Commons endeavoured to do justice to private persons, who had suffered any injury during the first fifteen years of this reign, it may well be imagined, they neglected not to redress the grievances of the whole nation. This was their principal business during the first year of their session. Though the Parliament was composed of several parties, who had not all the same views, they were united with respect to the redress of grievances. Even those members who were most devoted to the King, durst not oppose the general sentiment, some because they thought the thing just, others not to lose their labour, and for fear of rendering themselves too suspected.

Among those who had most contributed to the public mischiefs, the Archbishop of Canterbury was considered as one of the chief and most worthy of punishment, as being author of the innovations in the church, promoter of the war with Scotland, persecutor of the Presbyterians, and head of the Arminians. The Earl of Strafford was likewise of this number, because he had so entirely devoted himself to the King, that in his two great offices of president of the court of York, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he had no other view than to stretch the prerogative royal, and increase the King's revenues. His proud and haughty carriage had no less offended the public than his actions, whereby he strove to establish an arbitrary power. He was accused of advising the King to transport his Irish army into England, to subdue the opposers of his will. Though he was highly in the King's favour, he had nevertheless made himself many enemies at court, and in the kingdom, who earnesly sought occasion to ruin him. The Lord Keeper Finch, was looked upon also as a pernicious counsellor, wholly devoted to the King, and ready for any attempt, to establish a despotic government. It was not doubted, but he was the man that had corrupted the judges in the business of ship money. Sir Francis Windebank, Secretary of State, was reckoned the patron of the Catholics, and it was by his means that the condemned priests and jesuits escaped one way or the other the sentence passed upon them. In short, the judges of the realm had rendered themselves extremely odious to the people, as well by the judgment they had given in Mr. Hampden's affair, as by numberless other acts of injustice to private persons. These were the principal authors of the grievances, whom the Commons intended to bring to exemplary punishment.

The Earl of Strafford was the first on whom the storm fell. The 11th of November, eight days after the opening of the Parliament, Mr. Pym, having desired, and obtained his desire of the Commons, that the doors of the House might be locked, and the outward room cleared of strangers, informed them, that there were several complaints against the Earl of Strafford, which afforded good ground to accuse him of high treason. Upon this information, the House immediately appointed a committee of seven, who withdrawing into another room, and conferring together, reported, presently after, that it was their opinion, there was just cause to impeach the Earl of Strafford. Then Mr. Pym was ordered to go to the House of Lords, and accuse the Earl of high treason, in the name of all the Commons. He had orders likewise to tell the Lords, that in due time the Commons would produce the articles of accusation, and in the mean time, desired the accused might be put into safe custody. The Earl of Strafford had that very day come from the army, and had taken his place in the House of Lords. Before his departure from the army, he had received notice that there was a design to attack him. But whether through pride, or a belief that having done nothing without the King's warrant, he was secure, he slighted the advice, and would be present in the Parliament. Indeed, some months before, the King's protection was more than sufficient to screen him from all danger. But the face of affairs was altered, and it is strange a person of so great a genius, and such good sense, could imagine the King was able to protect him in such a juncture.‡ However this be, upon the Commons' im-

* These three persons above were now, by order of Parliament, brought from their several places of confinement to London. Prynn and Burton landing at the same time, viz. November 28, at Southampton, were received with extraordinary demonstrations of esteem, had their charges borne, and liberal presents given them. This method and ceremony kept them company all their journey, and so many people met them upon their approach to London, that they were carried into the city by above ten thousand persons, with boughs and flowers in their hands.

† Leighton, a physician, father of Dr. Leighton, Archbishop of Glasgow, for writing a book called "Sion's Plea against prelacy," (wherein he advised the Parliament "to kill all the Bishops, by smiting them under the fifth rib," and railed against the Queen, calling her a Canaanite and Idolatress,) was thrown into a noisome prison, fined ten thousand pounds, stood in the pillory twice, having one ear cut off, one nostril slit, and one cheek fired, with thirty-six lashes each time. Alexander Jennings of Buckinghamshire, for refusing to pay ship money, was imprisoned in the Fleet by warrant of the council, without any cause expressed, and the court of King's Bench had refused to discharge or bail him when brought thither by Habeas Corpus.——Peter Smart, canon of Durham, having in 1628, printed two sermons against innovations in the church of Durham, by Dr. Cosins, was by the high commission of York, deprived of his prebend and living, fined 500*l.* and imprisoned many years.

‡ Whitelock says, it was considered at York, whether the Earl should repair to the House, or continue in the north with the army. The Earl humbly desired his Majesty to excuse his going to the Parliament, alledging, "He should not be able to do him any service there, but rather be a means to hinder his affairs, and besides, in case they should fall upon him, he being at a distance, might the better retire from danger, &c." The King, notwithstanding all he could say, insisted upon the Earl's coming up to Parliament, and told him, "As he was King of England, he was able to secure him from any danger, and the Parliament should not touch one hair of his head." So, in obedience to the King's commands, the Earl came to London, but not, as Rapin says, the same day he was impeached, but a few days before. The Lord Clarendon says, it was believed he came to the House that day, to accuse the Lord Say, and some others, of having induced the Scots to invade the kingdom.

peachment, the Lords committed him to the custody of the black rod, and some days after sent him to the Tower.

Secretary Windebank was attacked next. Several petitions were presented against him to the House, whereof he was member, complaining, that as Secretary of State, he had issued out warrants under his own hand, for the discharge of prosecutions against priests, and for their release out of prison. All these petitions tended to show, that he lost no opportunity to countenance the Papists, and gloried in being reckoned their patron. He was summoned several times to come to the House, and answer what was laid to his charge. But he believed it more proper to avoid the impending storm, and withdraw into France. When he was out of danger, he sent the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain, a letter, lamenting his misfortune, and intimating, that if he was guilty, it was only for having served the King faithfully, and obeying his orders.*

The convocation, their canons, oath, and the tax they had laid upon the clergy to aid the King in his war with Scotland, were next taken into consideration by the House. This affair was debated with great warmth. Several members made, on this occasion, speeches, tending to show, the King could not, by his authority, turn the convocation into a synod. They alledged for reason, that the clergy who composed it, could act but as members of the convocation, because to act as members of a synod, they ought to have been elected by the people, and it did not belong to the King to make this election as he pleased. That the convocation or synod had not power to make canons for the whole nation, without the consent of the people themselves, nor consequently without the intervention of the Parliament. That most of the canons were unjust in themselves, and tended to increase the clergy's power, to the prejudice of the King's authority, and the people's liberties. That by these canons the convocation assumed a power above the Parliament. That the oath they had imposed was strange, doubtful, contrary to the privileges of the Parliament, and the rights of the people, and obliged men to swear as necessary, things that were alterable, without any danger to religion. For instance, supposing it true, that Bishops are Jure divino, which the church of England never acknowledged, it could not be affirmed, that Archbishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, are of divine or apostolical institution, and yet people were made to swear, never to consent to the altering of the government of the church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. That by this oath, the representatives of the nation would be so tied up, that though the Parliament should have power to alter the government of the church, they could not even debate upon that subject, by reason of their oath. Upon these and many other reasons, the Commons voted unanimously,

I. That the clergy of England convened in a convocation or synod, or otherwise, have no power to make any constitutions, canons, or acts whatsoever, in matters of doctrine or discipline, or otherwise, to bind the clergy or laity of the land, without common consent in Parliament.

II. That the canons treated upon by the late convocation, do contain matters contrary to the King's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, to the rights of Parliament, to the property and liberty of the subject, tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence.†

Immediately after these resolutions, the House appointed a committee of thirty-six, to examine, who were the chief promoters of these canons, and how they had been executed: to consider how far, in particular, the Archbishop of Canterbury had been concerned, in the great design of subverting the laws of the land and religion: and to draw up a charge against him and such others, as should appear guilty of the same crime. The Scotish commissioners who were sent to London to continue the treaty, begun at Rippon, were in good understanding with the leading members of the Commons, and in all appearance, had been informed of the design to prosecute the Archbishop. Therefore, to make the blow fall the heavier on this prelate, by joining their complaints with those of the Commons, they presented next day to the Lords, a charge against him, to this effect:

"That he was the cause of all the troubles in Scotland, and the author and urger of introducing into Scotland, the book of canons, and the liturgy, as appeared by fourteen letters which they offered to produce: that the Scotch prelates having sent to him a book of canons, written upon the one side only, with the other side blank, he had made several interlinings, and filled up the blank pages with several directions; which changes and supplements were taken from the Romish rituals, that varied from the book of England. That they were contrary to the King's intentions, who in his large declarations had professed, that all the variations in the Scotch service from that of England, should be only in such things as the Scotish humours would better comply with. But that the Archbishop had no regard to this. On the contrary, the Scotish prelates having petitioned the suppression of some of the English ceremonies, as the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage, and some other things, he was so far from consenting, that he had added several others: that in the order of the administration of the communion in the book of England, he had made several alterations, which plainly showed his design of introducing Popery into Scotland: that he had kindled war between the King and the Scots; and been one of the chief causes of breaking the last pacification, and renewing the war: that he had inserted into the divine service a prayer against their nation, by name of traiterous subjects, having cast off all obedience to their anointed sovereign, and coming in a rebellious manner to invade England; that shame might cover their faces as enemies to God and the King."

On the morrow, Sir Harbottle Grimston made in the House a speech against the Archbishop, pretending to show, that all those who were concerned in the evils of the state, as the Earl of Strafford, the Bishops of Chester, Oxford, Ely, Bath, and Wells, had been raised by his means, and that there was not a single grievance but what flowed from him. Whereupon the Commons impeached, by Mr. Denzil Hollis, the Archbishop of high treason, and the Lords committed him to the custody of the gentleman-usher. Some time after he was sent to the Tower.

Then, the Commons sent a message to the Lords, to let them know, they had received informations of a very high nature against Matthew Wren, Bishop of Ely; and having heard that he intended to make an escape out of the kingdom, they desired them to think of some way to prevent it. Whereupon, the Lords ordered the Bishop to give ten thousand pounds bail for his forthcoming, to which he consented.

Of those whom the Commons considered as the chief authors of the public grievances, there remained only the Lord Keeper Finch, and the judges. The first was declared a traitor by a vote of the House of Commons, notwithstanding the eloquent speech he was permitted to make at the bar of the House in his vindication. But before he was accused in form, he fled into Holland. However, he was impeached afterwards, though absent. Presently after his flight, the King made Sir Edward Littleton, Lord Keeper.

In fine, the Commons sent word to the Lords, that they had received informations against three judges,

* Sir Francis Windebank had been Laud's pupil, and was by his recommendation, made secretary on June 15, 1632. In his letter to the Earl of Pembroke are these words, "What I am guilty of none knows so well as his Majesty, whom I have served faithfully, diligently, painfully, and with as true and loyal a heart, according to my poor abilities, as any other whatsoever."

† It was voted likewise, Nemine Contradicente, that the several grants of the benevolence or contribution granted to his most excellent Majesty by the clergy in their late convocation, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy.

Sir John Bramston, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench; Sir Humphrey Davenport, Lord Chief Baron; and Justice Crowley; and desired the House, that they might put in good security for their appearance. Whereupon, the Lords obliged these three judges, each, to give ten thousand pounds bail. The other judges were also accused afterwards.

Thus they who were considered by the Commons as the principal authors of the public grievances, were disabled not only to continue to advise the King, but also to escape punishment, except the Lord Finch and Sir Francis Windebank, who saved their persons, by leaving their estates in England. Many others of an inferior rank, were variously punished, for exercising monopolies, inventing means to raise the King money, introducing or countenancing innovations in religion, prevaricating in the exercise of their offices, &c.

Whilst the Commons were employed in securing those, they intended to punish, they also prepared whatever was necessary to free the nation from all their grievances. Several speeches were made in the House, to show how prejudicial these grievances were to the public; and the principles which gave them birth were particularly insisted on, as being directly contrary to the constitution, and tending to the subversion of the government. Whereupon, it was voted that such a thing was illegal, and ordered that a bill should be prepared to abolish it. This was the subject of divers acts which were presented to the King for the royal assent from the 3d of November 1640, to the 10th of August 1641. The principal were these:

An act for a triennial Parliament: that is, to ordain that a Parliament should be held, at least every three years, though the King should neglect to call it, in order to prevent the inconveniences arising from a too long intermission of Parliaments; an act to abolish the Star Chamber and High Commission; an act to reduce the forests to the same state as under Edward I.; an act to repeal the statutes made in the reign of Edward II. concerning knighthood; an act to permit any subject to make salt-petre and gun-powder throughout the kingdom; and an act to abolish ship money. The necessity of these acts was so manifest, that the King must have either consented to them, or plainly declared he would govern with an absolute power. But he was not so unwise as to oppose them in his present circumstances.

Besides these acts, the Commons passed many general votes upon several other articles. This design was not only to stop the evil by means of these votes, but also to terrify all those who had been concerned in the grievances, in order to take from the King all hopes of support in his people. For after the House had voted, for instance, that such a monopoly was illegal, if any person concerned in that monopoly, behaved in a manner disagreeable to the Commons, or appeared too much attached to the King, an accusation against him was the certain consequence of such a behaviour. By that means, the King's most devoted friends chose rather to relinquish his interest than be liable to a charge, from which, they plainly saw, it was not in the King's power to secure them. This had very clearly appeared by the great examples of the Earl of Strafford, Archbishop Laud, Lord Keeper Finch, and Secretary Windebank, after whom no private person could hope for any protection from the King. Thus the Commons rendered themselves so formidable at the very beginning of the Parliament, that the King was suddenly deserted by all, without having other refuge than to consent to whatever was proposed by the Parliament. He hoped however, that when all the grievances were redressed, he should be, if not in the same state he had been for fifteen years, at least in the natural state of a King of England, according to the laws and the constitution of the government. But it will hereafter appear, how much he was mistaken in his conjecture.

The Commons used also another expedient to make themselves feared. As there were many people who, in conformity to the intentions of the court, had been concerned in the monopolies, or countenanced the innovations, or been subservient to introduce and support the occasion of any grievance, the Commons, upon the petitions presented to them against these men, sent for them to London, and examining them by a committee, declared them delinquents. As much as to say, that according to the opinion of the House, they were guilty of faults or offences for which they deserved to be prosecuted and punished according to law. This word delinquent, was very much in use during this Parliament. Thus, a great number of those who had been most noted for their adherence to the maxims of the court, or the principles of the Archbishop, were voted delinquents, and thereby kept in awe by the Commons, who according as they behaved well or ill to them, could prosecute or leave them unmolested. But the number of those who were declared delinquents was nothing in comparison of such as had reason to fear the like declaration, upon the least petition against them. Hence there followed an unanimous approbation of whatever was done by the House; some consenting because they thought the things just, and others out of fear of chastisement. This is what rendered the redress of grievances very easy to the Commons, and would have made it impracticable for the King to oppose it, though he should have had such a thought. The King reaped at least this advantage from his consent to the redress of grievances, that he gave occasion to many to believe he sincerely concurred in that work. But his enemies drew from thence a very different inference. They said, as the Parliament's measures were so well laid, that it would have been in vain for the King to oppose them; he was not to be thanked for a consent, to which necessity forced him, since, whilst it was in his power to hinder the redress of grievances, he had always refused to hearken to the instant desires of his Parliaments.

During the first whole month of this session, scarcely a day passed, but the House received petitions from divers counties, concerning grievances, amongst which that of ship money was never forgotten. At last, on the 7th of December, the day appointed to debate upon that affair, the Lord Falkland, afterwards Secretary of State, made a long speech to the House; when it was resolved upon the question, nemine contradicente,

I. That the charge imposed upon the subjects for the providing and furnishing of ships, and the assessments for raising of money for that purpose, commonly called ship money, are against the laws of the realm, the subjects' right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

II. That the extrajudicial opinions of the judges published in the Star Chamber, and enrolled in the courts of Westminster in these words,——in the whole, and in every part of them, are against the laws of the realm, the subjects' right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

III. That the writ following——and the other writs commonly called the ship writs, are against the laws of the realm, the right of property, and the liberty of the subjects, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

After these resolutions, the House appointed a committee of sixteen, at the head of whom was the Lord Falkland, to go forthwith to the several judges, to know in what manner, and by whom they were solicited or threatened to give their extrajudicial opinion concerning ship money. It was ordered, that every one of the judges should be examined at the same time by two of the committee, and be told what had been voted in the House concerning ship money, and that the committee should ask such questions as they should think material, to the execution of this order.

Next day, the House ordered that the committee appointed to consider of the property of the subjects in their goods, should take into consideration some way of seeing the entering upon record, the King's several commissions for loans and excise, and the resolutions of former Parliaments thereon, and the addition that was offered by the Lords to the Petition of Right, with the resolution of the House; and also the resolutions of the questions proposed in the House concerning ship money, that they might remain fair to posterity. It was also referred to the same committee to make a preparation of the vote passed about ship money, to be sent to the Lords; to draw up a charge against the Lord Finch, and the rest of the judges that gave their opinion upon that tax; and likewise to take into consideration their extrajudicial opinions and the judgments in the case of ship money; to inquire of the several denials of Habeas Corpus, and prohibitions, their extrajudicial proceedings and opinions concerning ecclesiastical jurisdictions, and the court of Admiralty; their denial of legal and ordinary proceedings in cases of justice, and the binding of the whole kingdom by any one man's particular case. The same committee had power to send for parties, witnesses, papers, records, or any thing else that might conduce to this business, and were to present the state of the whole matter to the House.

On the other hand, the 26th of February 1640-41, the Lords ordered to be brought to their House the record in the exchequer of the judgment in Mr. Hampden's case, and also the Rolls in the Star Chamber and other courts, wherein the extrajudicial opinions of the judges were entered, and caused them to be annulled in their presence. They ordered moreover, that a copy of what they had done should be delivered to the judges to be published at the assizes in every county within their circuits, and that an act of Parliament should be prepared concerning this matter.

All this produced at length charges against the Lord Keeper, and each of the judges, with an act to abolish ship money, to which the King gave the royal assent the 7th of August 1641.

Much the same method was taken with regard to the other grievances, and in the end, there was not one, public or private, but what was redressed within the nine first months of this session.

When the disputes concerning grace arose in Holland, James I. espoused the opposite party to Arminius, and used even threats to oblige the states of Holland to condemn Vorstius his successor. After that, he sent Bishops and Divines to the synod of Dort, to strengthen the contra-remonstrants. Meanwhile, the Arminians in England were forced to lie dormant, because the court was not their friend. Laud, then only a private doctor in the university of Oxford, had yet no credit, though shortly after the Duke of Buckingham procured him the Bishopric of St. David's in Wales. At the same time King James was vigorously pushing his design to stretch the prerogative royal, to which he met with great opposition, chiefly from the Puritans, who concerning grace were directly contrary to the Arminians. For this reason the King and Duke thought fit to caress and support the Arminians, in order to oppose them to the Puritans, the King's grand aim being to weaken that party, which was always ready to obstruct the execution of his designs. From that time the Arminian party became powerful. The heads were Neil, Bishop of Winchester, and Laud Bishop of St. David's who found means to gain the King's confidence, and to have the disposal of the church preferments. They improved this advantage to strengthen their party, by promoting to the benefices such as were most averse to the Calvinists, for so these began now to be called who embraced Calvin's opinion concerning grace, whether Presbyterians or church of England men. There were therefore three principal causes of the animosity of the court and its friends, against the Presbyterians.

The first was, that they rejected the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The second, that they were entirely against the King's design to stretch his prerogative, knowing the more power he had, the more they should be persecuted. The third, that they were all Calvinists as to the notions of grace. Though the King had not, perhaps, altered his opinion concerning that point, he deserted the Calvinists, because they were in other respects, for the most part, Presbyterians and Puritans. From that time the court and their agents counted among the Puritans, those who refused to conform to the church of England; all the Calvinists, Presbyterians, or others; all who opposed the King's designs with regard to the prerogative; and they were all, under the name of Puritans, equally obnoxious to the hatred of the King and his ministers. So, by this policy, many people who had no inclination for Presbyterianism, were made to become Puritans. At least, they were forced to join with the Puritan party, to hinder the court, on pretence of destroying Puritanism, from establishing by degrees an arbitrary power, which would have been fatal to the whole nation. For the King pretended, his will could be opposed but upon puritanical principles.

The reign of Charles I. was still more violent in this respect, than that of James. Laud being made Bishop of London, and afterwards, Archbishop of Canterbury, and one of the King's prime ministers, used all his industry and credit to humble the Puritan army, that is, not only the Presbyterians, but also the Calvinists, and such who would not patiently bear the yoke of servitude. Matthew Wren, Bishop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Cosins, prebendary of Durham, being all of the same principles, seconded him in this design. And as if the difference between the church of England and presbytery, had not been sufficiently marked, they added to the worship sundry innovations, and represented as absolutely necessary, things indifferent, which religion might well have dispensed with.

The wisest part of the nation had long since perceived the King's and the court's policy, and their artifices to pave the way to arbitrary power. But it had not been possible to avoid the effects of it, because the King had dissolved the Parliaments, the moment they were bent to examine the grievances. Thus the regal power had gained ground by degrees, no one being in a capacity to hinder its progress. But as soon as the King's affairs had taken a new turn, by the entrance of the Scots into England, and the taking of Newcastle, and when the King saw himself under an absolute necessity of calling a Parliament, most of the members resolved not to lose the opportunity of abolishing the persecution, introduced under the specious pretence of stopping the progress of Puritanism, but in reality for the better advancement of arbitrary power. Above all, the House of Commons considered the innovations, and the rigour wherewith people were made to observe them, as so many artifices of the court party, for the more easy attainment of their end. It must not therefore be thought strange, if most of the members being united with regard to the grievances, were so likewise for the abolishing of innovations, and punishing the authors, as having served for instruments to the King in the execution of designs, wherein religion was not solely concerned. This is what produced the charges against the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, Bath, and Wells, and against Cosins, besides the brand of delinquents given by the Commons to a great number of ministers and others, who had countenanced the innovations.

Most of the members were united as to this point, because there was not one but what considered it as a branch of the design to subject the realm to the King's will and pleasure. But among this great number, there were real Presbyterians, who had more extensive views, and thought, no doubt of altering the government of the church, on pretence of the ill use which the Bishops had made of their power. These, though not very numerous in the Parliament, were supported by a great party in the kingdom, and particularly by the Scots, whose assistance was then absolutely necessary. But they took care not to discover their intentions. They were contented at first to join with those who only intended the redress of grievances, and to restore the government to its natural state. They hoped, as it happened indeed, that the strict examination of the grievances and innovations, would convince most of the members of the necessity to abolish the hierarchy, of which the court had made such great use in the execution of their designs. They proposed to show on all occasions, that it was almost impossible to restore the civil government, whilst the King had in the clergy of the church of England, a support capable of raising insuperable obstacles to the reformation of the government. For this reason, on all occasions, the leaders of the Presbyterians were the most forward to speak against the grievances. They aggravated chiefly those that concerned the innovations in religion, which they openly ascribed to the design of introducing the Romish religion. All this was done with a view to cast upon the hierarcy, and the Bishops in general, the faults and ill conduct of some particular persons.

The other members who were of the church of England, though very opposite to the King, saw what was the intention of the Presbyterians. But they were kept in awe by the fear of losing the assistance of the Scots, who supported this party, and rendered it very considerable. Wherefore they durst nor displease the Presbyterian party, for fear of causing in the Parliament a division, which must be fatal to the common cause, and consequently very advantageous to the King. Besides, the men we are speaking of, did not believe the hierarchy to be absolutely necessary in the church, or that religion could not subsist without Bishops. Only the rigid Episcopalians, and the King's party were of this opinion, but they made not a majority. Those therefore who had only in view the reformation of the state, and not that of the church, could not, without great inconveniences, help having some condescension for the Presbyterians, for the reasons just mentioned. Perhaps they had no other view in their policy, than to gain time, till the civil grievances were redressed, without any design to go farther. But they had to deal with very able heads, who artfully led them beyond their first resolutions.

On the other hand, the Bishops perfectly knew the intention of the Presbyterians, and that in lessening the King's power, their design was to render him unable to oppose the change they were meditating. Wherefore they adhered the more firmly to the King's interest, and often, by the number of their voices, so managed it, that the upper house voted directly contrary to the resolutions of the lower. But thereby they procured the Presbyterians a considerable advantage. For these last took occasion from thence, to represent how advantageous it was for the King to have at his devotion so great a number of voices among the Lords, and consequently, how impossible it would be to succeed in the intended reformation, so long as the Bishops had votes in the Upper House. This led them at length to bring in a bill for the exclusion of all ecclesiastics from civil employments, and the Bishops in particular, from a right of sitting in the House of Lords.

Those who had only in view to restore the civil government, without meddling with the hierarchy, and whom we call the politicians, were greatly embarassed. They plainly saw, that sundry abuses had crept into the church, and would have readily agreed to their abolition, provided nothing more had been required. But it was proposed to go one step farther, and exclude the Bishops from the Upper House, in which they saw several inconveniences, with regard to the interest of the church of England, to which they were attached.

Then began to be debated the famous question, by what title do Bishops sit in Parliament? It was not denied, they had enjoyed this privilege from the beginning of the monarchy; but some pretended, they sat in Parliament as Barons only, on account of the crown lands granted them by the Anglo Saxon Kings, for which they did homage to the King like the rest of the Barons. Others maintained, they had a seat there as representatives of the clergy, who could not be bound by the laws made in Parliament, without giving their consent to them, according to the constant maxim of the kingdom, and the undeniable privilege which all English subjects had ever enjoyed. That the Lords gave their consent to the laws, for themselves; and the Commons for all the Commons of the kingdom, and therefore it was necessary, there should be in the Parliament representatives of the church and clergy, otherwise the maxim would be false, that no man can be bound by the laws to which he has not consented. They added farther, that the Parliament had always been thought to consist of three estates, of which the clergy had been always considered as one, whence they inferred, that to exclude from the Parliament one of its three estates, would be to subvert the constitution of the government.

To these arguments it was answered: though it should be true, that the clergy were an estate of Parliament distinct from the rest of the people, which was contested, it did not follow, that the Bishops represented the whole church: that there were in the Parliament two houses, one of the Lords, and the other of the Commons; and two houses in the convocation, the upper of the Bishops, and the lower of the inferior clergy; and therefore, according to this rule, the inferior clergy should likewise have representatives in the Parliament, that they might be deemed to give their consent to the laws, which however, was never pretended. Hence it was inferred, the Bishops did not represent the clergy, and added, that this supposed representation was a new thing, unheard of before, and that a few months since, the Bishops would have been very angry to be counted only bare representatives: that though it was necessary, the clergy should be represented in the Parliament, it would not follow, that they ought to be represented by the Bishops, as all the people of England were not represented by the Lords. That the abbots had formerly a seat in Parliament, not as representatives, but as being Tenants in chief, and when they were excluded, it was not said, that a breach was made in the constitution of the Parliament, either by the exclusion of the abbots, or dissolution of the monasteries.

These are the principal arguments alledged for and against the Bishops, with regard to their seat in Parliament. This question was the more difficult, as it had been never determined by what right the Bishops sat in Parliament. Very probably, from the beginning of the monarchy, till about the end of the reign of Henry III. the Parliaments consisted only of Lords, who were in possession of all the lands of the kingdom, for which they did homage to the King. And indeed it appears, the Lords, before that time, granted the King the money necessary for the support of the government, without any mention of the Commons. It may therefore be said, that the Lords sat in Parliament by a double title, namely, for themselves, and as representatives of the nation. But after the Commons were introduced into Parliament, and had a separate House, the Lords lost the last of these titles, and sat only for themselves, the rest of the people having other representatives. The Bishops and Abbots, who belonged to the body of the Lords, had probably their seat too by a double title, as possessors of baronies, and as representatives of the clergy, secular and regular. But as in introducing representatives of the Commons into the Parliament, representatives of the inferior clergy were not also introduced, the Bishops and Abbots may be said to preserve their double title to sit there, as possessors of baronies, and as representatives of the clergy. The dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII. rendered needless the representation of the regulars, who no longer subsisted; but it made no alteration in the Bishops' right, who, according to this supposition, represented the secular clergy, and continued to sit in Parliament, though the Abbots were abolished.*

The

* It seems to be plain, that the clergy never thought themselves represented by the Bishops, seeing that after the restoration, when the convocation dropped the privilege of taxing themselves, the inferior clergy had in lieu of that privilege, a right to vote for members of Parliament, and so have, ever since the year 1665, been represented by the Commons, like the rest of the freeholders. However, Mr. Hyde (afterwards Lord Clarendon) and others, made use of this argument, of the Bishops being the representatives of the clergy, in their

The heads of the Presbyterians never ceased to represent to the politicians the impossibility of restoring the government to its natural state, so long as the Bishops should sit in the House of Peers: that the King had found means to gain the clergy to his interest, by expressing a great zeal for the church of England, and an extreme aversion to the Presbyterians; that the clergy, and especially the Bishops, were entirely devoted to the King, in the belief that he was their protector and only support; that therefore they were persuaded he could not be too powerful, since this power would be so advantageous to the clergy; that there were convincing proofs of this truth in the conduct of Laud, Wren, and other clergymen, particularly Sibthorpe, Montague, and Manwaring, who had used their utmost endeavours to procure the King an unlimited power; that the clergy in general were still in the same dispositions, and could do for the future as much mischief as formerly, if care was not taken to humble their pride and power, by confining them within the bounds of their calling.

The politicians granted all these things, and besides, were not very well pleased with the Bishops and the rest of the clergy. But they were loth to yield, for fear the alteration proposed might produce others in church and state, which they did not care to meddle with. Meanwhile, after long weighing the inconveniencies which might flow from their acceptation or refusal, they resolved at last to sacrifice the Bishops' right, rather than run the risk of seeing all their projects fall to the ground, by the obstacles which the Bishops might raise. Whether this resolution was taken by the leaders at the beginning of the Parliament which is not unlikely, or whether it was necessary to use some time to prevail with the politicians, those who solicited the thing, judged that before it came to be publicly debated, it was convenient to breed prejudices against the Bishops in the minds of the people, and to cherish those already entertained. The House wanted not opportunities to execute this design. The bill to take from the Bishops their seat in Parliament was not voted in the House of Commons till the 11th of March 1640-1, and passed not the House of Peers till the 27th of May following. But before the moving of this bill, the Lower House had taken several steps tending to incense the people against the Bishops. The great number of petitions against the Bishops in general, against episcopal government, against some particular prelates and clergymen, against innovations, against the late convocation, served them for foundation to examine the conduct of the Bishops with all the rigour, their design required.* There is no clearer evidence of the Commons' design with regard to the Bishops, than their resolution on the 20th of November, seventeen days after the opening of the Parliament, namely, that on Sunday the 22d of the same month every member should be obliged to receive the communion, and bring with him a ticket of his name and the place for which he served, and that after the communion day none should sit in the House but those that had first received the sacrament. This resolution could be with no other view, than to prevent the Commons from being esteemed Presbyterians, and their resolutions disparaged on that pretence. Thus in the reign of Henry V. the House of Commons intending to give a mortal blow to the clergy, began with passing an act for burning heretics, lest the clergy should pretend that the House consisted only of such.

To show now all the preparations that were made in the House of Commons, before they proceeded in the bill we have been speaking of, we shall only briefly mention the petitions that were presented, the speeches that were made on this subject, and the several resolutions that were taken.

On the 10th of November, seven days after the opening of the Parliament, Sir Edward Deering made a speech in the House, to persuade them to enter upon matters of religion. He took occasion to present a petition from one Wilson, a minister, against the Archbishop who had suspended him, and concluded with saying, "Our manifold griefs do fill a mighty and vast circumference, yet so that from every part our lines of sorrow do lead unto him, and point at him the centre, from whence our miseries in this church, and many of them in the common-wealth do flow."

From this time, till the 25th of January, 1640-1, the House was chiefly employed in receiving and hearing a multitude of petitions against the Bishops and Clergy.† On that day, the King having marked the evil designs of the Commons against the Bishops, sent for both Houses to attend him at Whitehall, where he addressed them on the necessity of attending to the military and other affairs of the kingdom; and assured them of his willingness to concur in the Reformation of all innovations both in the church and the commonwealth. However, he spoke against the dismissal of the Bishops from Parliament; observing that, there was a great difference between the reformation and alteration of government; and though he was decidedly in favour of the former, he could not assent to the latter. This speech produced but little effect.

The next day, a complaint was brought to the Commons against Matthew Wren, for having, whilst Bishop of Norwich, by oppressions, innovations, and requiring certain oaths, compelled above fifty families of that city to withdraw out of England.

On the 1st of February, the Commons examined part of the London ministers' remonstrance against the Bishops. In the debate upon this subject, some smart repartees passed between Mr. Grimston and Mr. Selden. Mr. Grimston argued thus: "That Bishops are Jure divino, is a question; that Archbishops are not Jure divino, is out of question. Now that Bishops which are questioned whether Jure divino, or Archbishops, which out of question are not Jure divino, should suspend ministers that are Jure divino, I leave to you to be considered." To which Mr. Selden answered, "that the convocation is Jure divino, is a question; that Parliaments are not Jure divino, is out of question: that religion is Jure divino, there is no question. Now, Sir, that the convocation, which is questionable whether Jure divino, and Parliaments, which out of question are not Jure divino, should meddle with religion, which questionless is Jure divino, I leave to your consideration."

On the 5th, upon the complaint of the inhabitants of Wood-Church in Kent, against Mr. Bowen their minister, who being also a justice of peace, had, by colour of that office, done several things contrary to the laws, the House ordered, that the Lord Keeper should be desired to leave out the clergy of England and Wales, at the renewing of the commission of the peace.

On the 8th and 9th, the House resumed the debates concerning the Bishops, and many speeches were made for and against them.

The 13th of February, a bill was brought in for abolishing superstition, in the supposition, that Bishops had their speeches against the taking away the Bishops' voices in the House of Peers; which certainly was no argument at all, the prelates, doubtless, as well as mitred abbots, sitting in Parliament on account of their baronies, like the rest of the nobility.

* The Lord Clarendon says, their way was to prepare a petition very modest and dutiful for the form; and for the matter, not very unreasonable; and to communicate it at some public meeting, where care was taken it should be received with approbation; the subscription of very few hands filled the paper itself, where the petition was written, and therefore many more sheets were annexed, for the reception of the number, which gave all the credit, and procured all the countenance to the undertaking. When a multitude of hands was procured, the petition itself was cut off, and a new one framed suitable to the design in hand, and annexed to the long list of names which were subscribed to the former.

† That which made most noise was the city petition for a total alteration of church government; a petition to which 15,000 subscriptions were annexed, and which was presented by Alderman Pennington, the city member. It is remarkable, that among the many ecclesiastical abuses there complained of, an allowance, given by the licensers of books, to publish a translation of Ovid's Art of Love, is not forgotten by these rustic censors.—The greatest vices, however, which the petitioners in general could reproach the greater part of the clergy with, were, bowing at the name of Jesus, placing the communion table in the east, reading the King's orders for sports on Sunday, and other practices, which the established government both in church and state had strictly enjoined them.

introduced into the church sundry superstitious practices.

The 1st of March the Commons appointed a committee to prepare reasons to be offered to the Lords, that all clergymen in England and Wales, should be put out of the commission of the peace.

The 9th it was moved in the House, that a bill be drawn against pluralists and non-residents.

The same day were presented from the committee, for the ministers, remonstrance against the Bishops, three heads for the debate and consideration of the House. The first concerned their secular employments, namely, their legislative and judicial power in Parliament; their judicial power in the star-chamber, and commissions for the peace; their employment as Privy-Counsellors, and temporal officers. The second related to their sole power in ecclesiastical things, as ordination and censures. The third concerned the greatness of the revenues of deans and chapters, the little use of them, and the inconveniencies thence arising. The House having debated upon the first of these heads, came to these resolutions:

I. That the legislative and judicial power of Bishops in the House of Peers, is a great hindrance to the discharge of their spiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away by bill, and that a bill be drawn to that purpose.

II. That the Bishops or any other clergymen, to be in the commission of the peace, or to have any judicial power, in the star-chamber, or in any civil court, is a great hindrance to the discharge of their spiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away; and that a bill be brought in to that purpose.

The same day, the Lords ordered to be burnt two books, written by Dr. Pocklington, intituled, Sunday no Sabbath, and Altare Christianum.

The 15th, the Commons sent up to the Lords articles against Dr. Cosins, who was accused of introducing into the church of Durham divers innovations, tending to restore popery.*

The 21st of April, petitions against the hierarchy were presented by Nottinghamshire and Lancashire.

The 26th of the same month was read a second time a bill, for punishing and fining the members of the late convocation. The Archbishop of Canterbury's fine was of twenty thousand pounds. There were others of ten thousand pounds, of five thousand, three thousand, two thousand, and the least of a Bishop was of a thousand. The rest of the members were rated, each in proportion to his ecclesiastical revenues.

The same day was read a bill, for regulating abuses in ecclesiastical courts.

It was evident, that the Commons were projecting some great reformation, in the ecclesiastical state, and probably, the deans and chapters were first to be attacked, because their use did not appear so manifest. For this reason, Dr. Hacket desired leave to speak before the House, on the behalf of deans and chapters, which was granted him. But after he had done, Dr. Burgess was permitted also to answer his reasons. The two Universities presented likewise petitions to the House on the same account, but to no purpose.

At last, the bill against the Bishops and clergy exercising temporal jurisdiction, passed in the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords for their concurrence. But this bill meeting with great opposition in the House of Peers, who put off the debate from day to day, the Commons caused a new bill to be brought into their house, for the taking away of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. which was read the first time. Whilst they were debating whether it should be read again or laid aside, a message came from the Lords, signifying, that they were ready to concur with them as to the former bill, except only taking away the Bishops' votes in Parliament. But the Commons, without taking any notice of this offer, ordered the new bill to be read a second time.

The second of June, at a conference between the two Houses, the Lords gave reasons why they did not judge it unlawful for the Bishops to sit in Parliament, alledging, that for their right to vote there, they conceived by the common and statute law, and ancient practice there was no question of it. As for any inconveniencies, they did not yet understand any such as might induce them to deprive the Bishops and their successors of their right. But for removing them from the star-chamber, council-table, or any office in secular affairs, they would fully concur with the Commons.

Next day, heads for a conference with the Lords were reported, containing nine reasons, why Bishops ought not to have votes in Parliament.†

Meanwhile the Commons ordered a bill to be prepared against the convocation, and another to abolish the high-commission.

The 7th of June the Lords voted for maintaining the Bishops' right to sit in Parliament.

The 11th, the affair of episcopacy coming again into debate, lasted from seven in the morning, till night,‡ and it was resolved by the Commons, that the preamble to the bill should be expressed in these words:—

"Whereas

---

* Cosins was extremely zealous for ecclesiastical ceremonies; and so far from permitting the communicants to break the sacramental bread with their fingers, a privilege on which the puritans strenuously insisted, he would not so much as allow it with an ordinary household instrument. A consecrated knife must perform that sacred office, and must never afterwards be profaned by any vulgar service.—— Cosins likewise was accused of having said, "The King has no more authority in ecclesiastical matters, than a boy who rubs my horses' heels." The expression was violent, but it is certain, that all those high churchmen, who were so industrious in reducing the laity to submission, were extremely fond of their own privileges and independency, and were desirous of exempting the mitre from all subjection to the crown.

† "I. Because it is a great hindrance to their ministerial function.

"II. Because they do vow and undertake at their ordination, when they enter into holy orders, that they will give themselves wholly to that vocation.

"III. Because councils and canons in several ages, do forbid them to meddle in secular affairs.

"IV. Because the twenty-four Bishops have dependence on the two Archbishops, and take their oath of canonical obedience unto them.

"V. Because they are but for their lives, and therefore are not fit to have legislative power over the honours, inheritances, persons, and liberties of others.

"VI. Because of Bishops' dependency and expectancy of translation to places of greater profit.

"VII. That the several Bishops have of late much encroached upon the consciences and liberties of the subject; and they and their successors will be much encouraged still to encroach; and the subject will be much discouraged from complaining against such encroachment, if twenty-six of that order be to be judges upon that complaint. The same reason extends to their legislative power in any bill to pass for the regulation of that power, upon any emergent inconveniency by it.

"VIII. Because the whole number of them are interested to maintain the jurisdiction of Bishops; which hath been found so grievous to the three kingdoms, that Scotland hath utterly abolished it.

"IX. Because the Bishops, being Lords of Parliament, it setteth too great a distance between them and the rest of their brethren in the ministry; which occasioneth pride in them, and discontent in others, and disquiet in the church.

"And as to their having votes a long time, the answer is, if it be inconvenient, time and usage are not to be considered with lawmakers: some abbots voted as anciently in Parliament as Bishops, yet are taken away."

Among these reasons the Commons only insinuated the principal in the 6th article, which however was universally known, namely, that the Bishops had been too much devoted to the King, and countenanced arbitrary power. To these reasons there was soon an answer in print, called, An Abstract, &c. (said to be done by the Archbishop of York,) and to that presently came forth a reply.

‡ In this long debate the authority of that very ancient parchment MS. copy of the Bible, the Codex Alexandrinus, was asserted by Sir Simon de Ewes, the celebrated antiquary. This invaluable MS. was transmitted to England by Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador from King Charles I. to the Ottoman Porte. Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, in Egypt, being removed from the city of Constantinople, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, brought with him a valuable collection of ancient books; and, possibly, not without apprehension of what might befal himself, and with him, his collection, among a people so little swayed by deference to Christian learning as the Turks; or by whatever other motive influenced, the Patriarch sent the most valuable article in his treasury as a present to his Majesty of England. It was placed in the royal library at St. James's, whence it was subsequently added to our national collection, the British Museum; of which it forms one of the glories. It consists

"Whereas the government of the church of England by Archbishops and Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans, Archdeacons, and other ecclesiastical officers, hath been found by long experience to be a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of religion, and very prejudicial to the state and government of this kingdom, &c."

The 15th, the Commons voted that all deans and chapters, archdeacons, prebendaries, chanters, canons, and petty-canons, and their officers, shall be utterly abolished: that all the lands taken from deans and chapters shall be employed to the advancement of learning and piety, provision being made that his Majesty be no loser in his rents, first-fruits, and other duties; and that a competent maintenance shall be made to the several persons concerned, if such persons appear not to be delinquents.

The 21st, the House being resolved into a grand committee to debate the bill for abolishing episcopacy, Sir Edward Deering proposed, that there should be in every shire twelve Divines and a president, to whom might be given what title they pleased, whether that of Bishop or any other: but nothing was resolved thereupon.

The King could not but be very much displeased with the proceedings of the Commons, as well in the affair of grievances, as in that of episcopacy. The two things he had most at heart, since the beginning of his reign, were the stretching his prerogative, and maintaining the church of England in its full lustre, and the Bishops in all their authority. Nevertheless, upon these two points it was that the Commons seemed to affect to give him daily mortifications, not only by their speeches, but also by their votes and the bills they sent up to the Lords.

But besides grievances and episcopacy, there was another article, wherein the Commons showed no great complaisance to the King; and that was the affair of the Catholics. Charles followed the King his father's method; that is, he appeared to be entirely attached to the Protestant religion and church of England; whilst on the other hand, he protected and countenanced the Papists. But there was this difference between the father and son; King James's religion was always very doubtful, notwithstanding his outward profession of the Protestant religion; whereas King Charles was never accused of being a Papist, but by men of very warm and passionate tempers.*

The face of affairs being changed by the calling of the Parliament, and the King unable to protect the Papists, they were treated somewhat roughly. It was supposed, there was a settled design to introduce Popery, and that several Bishops and other clergymen were in the plot. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, and of Bath and Wells, Dr. Cosins, Secretary Windebank, and some others, were accused of being chiefly concerned in this affair, which was openly said to be managed by the Queen and her confidents. Though this charge was perhaps carried too far, with respect to private persons, it can hardly be denied, that they gave some cause for it by their proceedings. Their hatred to the Presbyterians made them not scruple to make too near approaches to Popery, in order to be at a greater distance from Presbyterianism. This, was the true cause of all the innovations introduced into the public worship, and of the inviolable attachment to the observance of certain indifferent or needless customs and ceremonies.†

The 30th of November, the Commons desired the General of the army to dismiss all popish officers; and moved his Majesty, that all commanders and other officers in any town or garrison that were papists, might be removed. The King answered, he knew of no papist that had the command of any place, but however, had given orders to be more particularly informed.

The 1st of December, the House ordered the preparing of a remonstrance to his Majesty, concerning the Pope's pretended nuntio. This was Count Rosetti, who exercised in England the function of nuntio, under colour, that it was necessary to the Queen for matters of conscience.

The 5th, the House sent an order to all the Justices of four volumes: the first three contain the Old Testament; the fourth contains the New Testament; to which is annexed, the first Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, with a portion of the second: and this is the only copy known to exist of that performance. The writer of this manuscript is said to have been Thecla, an Egyptian lady who lived early in the fourth century. It had not been long in England, before its value, as an important document in behalf of Christianity became known. Mr. Patrick Young, the learned keeper of the King's library, at that time, soon discovered the Epistles of Clement, and was commanded by the King to publish them, which he did in 1633, with a Latin translation. The spirit of rivalship between the supporters of the Romish church, and those who protested against her errors, extended to indifferent things; and the Vatican copy, merely because it was at Rome, was preferred, by the learned Catholics especially, to the Alexandrian copy now in the hands of Protestants. To restore the balance of opinion, Dr. Grabe was commanded by Queen Anne, to publish the manuscript. He accordingly communicated to the world in 1707—1710, the Old Testament part of it; being the Septuagint translation. But the greatest honour done to this copy, or that could be done to any copy, and altogether original in its nature, was a fac simile edition of the New Testament, published in London in 1786, by Dr. Woide of the British Museum. In this edition the work is represented page for page, line for line, letter for letter, contraction for contraction, rasure for rasure, with a degree of similarity hardly credible. The ink was composed to suit the colour of the faded pigment; and the types were cut with the closest possible resemblance as to form, in alphabets exhibiting the variations of the original. Nothing like it had ever appeared in the learned world. Some years afterwards, Mr. Baber, of the British Museum, published the Book of Psalms with equal accuracy. Having proposed to publish the remainder of the copy, his statements were submitted to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and to Parliament, who, in the year 1814, most graciously patronized the undertaking. It has also received the full sanction of the Bishops. Only 250 copies are to be printed; the expence of which will be 7,339*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* Mr. Baber has engaged to finish the work in nine years, reckoning from the spring of the year 1814.

* Several things induced him to favour the Catholics, which gave his enemies some advantage.

I. The example of the King his father, who, throughout his whole reign, could never be prevailed with to execute the laws against them.

II. Though the papists would not take the oath of supremacy, they refused not to swear allegiance, and that was sufficient for him to reckon them good subjects.

III. In his project of humbling the Parliament, and reducing the Commons to the sole affair of supply, the Parliament's desiring the execution of the laws against the papists, sufficed to throw him upon a contrary course, in order to deprive them by degrees, of the custom of obtaining every thing by importunity.

IV. The Catholics having no other refuge but the King's protection, it was natural for them firmly to adhere to his person and interest, and the King thought himself obliged to grant them an extraordinary protection, in reward of their fidelity.

V. Nothing was more grating to the puritans, than to see the papists well received at court; and as the King hated the puritants he took a pleasure in mortifying them, by caressing their enemies.

VI. The Queen, for whom the King had a very great condescension, did not a little contribute to inspire him with a good opinion, if not of her religion, at least of its professors.

VII. Archbishop Laud, who was an Arminian, took care not to strengthen the Calvinistical-party, by incensing the King against the papists.

VIII. Lastly, Charles I. was naturally of an inflexible temper, and this quality, added to his maxims of government, made him impatient of whatever tended to curb his will.

These are probably, the reasons that induced the King to countenance the Catholics, during the first fifteen years of his reign. He carried his regard for them so far, that not only the penal laws enacted against them, were never executed, but the papists were all considered at court as the best subjects, whereas the puritans were regarded as enemies to the King and State.

† In the beginning of the Parliament, the King having published a proclamation against recusants, the committee, charged with examining it, reported, it was not according to his Majesty's intentions, or the expectation of the house. The committee added, that many recusants had letters of grace to protect their persons and estates.—In the continuation of this report, a few days after, the committee said, that upon the examination of the keepers of two prisons only, Newgate and the Clink, they found sixty-four Priests and Jesuits discharged in one year, some by privy-signet, others by warrants from the Lords of the Council, but most of them by warrants from secretary Windebank, without any mention of the King's pleasure: that upon examination of the clerk of the peace for Middlesex, and the clerk of the crown in the King's-Bench, it was found, that within the compass of seven or eight years there had been seventy-four letters of grace. Then they descended to particular circumstances, concerning the discharge of several persons condemned for treason, all by the order of Windebank: they said moreover, that they had discovered sixty-four letters of grace to stay the prosecution against papists, directed to several counties and judges. It was added, that indeed the King had power to pardon the condemned: but to command no further prosecution, was contrary to law.

of peace of Westminster, London and Middlesex, enjoining them to proceed against recusants according to law, notwithstanding any inhibition or restraint.

In January following, there was a sort of dispute between the King and the Commons, on account of John Goodman, a Jesuit, who had been condemned to die, but was reprieved by the King. The Houses had several conferences upon this subject, and at last agreed to join in a remonstrance to his Majesty, to move him, that the laws might be executed against Priests and Jesuits, and particularly against Goodman. The King, who desired to save this Jesuit, alledged, that he had been condemned merely for being in orders of a priest, and had never been condemned or banished before. But the two Houses represented to him, that this priest and Jesuit had been a minister in the church of England, and had been formerly twice committed and discharged. In short, the King replied, that if Goodman were put to death, the Protestants abroad, in Catholic countries, might suffer for it; but however, would leave it to both Houses to do as they thought fit. Next day, Goodman sent a petition to the King, which was immediately communicated to the House of Lords, wherein he said, that he was content to die, rather than live the subject of so great discontent between him and his people. As it does not appear that the Parliament insisted any more upon this matter, it is likely, the King obtained his desire, and saved the Jesuit's life. But this sort of victory failed not to do him some prejudice, in that his enemies took occasion from thence to represent, that there was no depending upon his proclamations or promises with respect to the papists, since they were never executed. It is not doubted but the Queen solicited strongly in Goodman's behalf.

The 11th of February 1640-1, notice was given to the Commons, that the papists were preparing to execute some great design,* and that by the Queen's order, all Roman Catholics fasted every Saturday, for the prosperous success of the same. Whereupon an order was made, that all Judges in their circuits should effectually put the laws in execution against Priests and Jesuits.

The 17th of May, the Commons ordered the Lord Mayor of London, and the justices of peace for London, Westminster, and Southwark to prevent papists from resorting to Ambassadors' houses, and the Queen's chapels.

The 21th, the members of the House had orders to bring in, by a certain time, the names of all recusants convicted in each county.

The 2d of June, was read in the House of Commons a bill, for disarming all the papists in the kingdom.

In January last, the Commons had begun to take into consideration the contribution raised among the Roman Catholics, for carrying on the late war against the Scots, at the instance of the Queen, who wrote a circular letter to exhort them to it. Walter Montague and Sir Kenelm Digby, who had written on the same occasion to some of the principal of the Popish party were sent for and examined, and the Commons seemed resolved vigorously to push this affair. But the Queen found means to appease them by a message, wherein she said, that she was moved to raise money in that manner for the King's assistance, merely out of her tender affection to him, and if it were illegal, she was ignorant of the law, but promised to be more cautious for the future. She said moreover, that understanding, the having one sent to her from the Pope was distasteful to the kingdom, she was desirous to give the Parliament satisfaction, and in convenient time would remove him. This convenient time was not yet come in June following, when the nuntio Rosetti was still with the Queen. But at last, the Commons having ordered him to be brought to the bar of their House to be examined, he hid himself, and on the morrow departed for Rome. Montague, Winter, and Sir Kenelm Digby, withdrew into France.

Father Philips, the Queen's Confessor, was also examined by the Commons, who afterwards brought an accusation against him to the Lords, and against the superior of the Capuchins belonging to the Queen. Probably, this accusation was only to frighten, and oblige them to retire.

The King had flattered himself, that the Parliament would espouse his cause against Scotland, and furnish him with means to drive the Scots out of the kingdom. This was the first, or rather the only thing he recommended in his first speech to both Houses. But to perceive how vain this hope was, it needs only to be considered, that the leading men of the party against the King, were the persons that encouraged the Scots to enter England, and that this party was so superior in the Parliament, that but few of the King's friend's durst open their mouths to support his interest. It was this Scotch invasion that compelled the King to call a Parliament, and enabled the Parliament to break all the King's measures, and oblige him to suffer the redress of grievances. In a word, it was solely by means of the Scots, that the Parliament had it in their power to restore the government to its ancient and natural state. They would therefore have acted against their own interest, and directly contrary to the end they proposed, if they had supplied the King with means to drive the Scots out of the kingdom. Accordingly, they took not one step tending to that purpose. On the contrary, it evidently appeared, that they considered the Scots as brethren, who, having the same interest as the English, were come to assist, and act in concert with them.

The 9th of November, six days after the opening of the Parliament, Sir William Widdrington, Knight of the shire for Northumberland, speaking concerning the matter of a petition, presented by that county, on account of the oppressions they laboured under from the Scotch army, called the Scots, invading rebels. The House was so offended at the expression, that Widdrington escaped imprisonment only by recanting, and promising to call them rebels no more. Nothing was more capable to show the King, how averse the Commons were from aiding him against the Scots. But this was not the only mark they gave of their intention. In the first place, they thought proper to give the Scots the sum of three hundred thousand pounds, in reward for their brotherly assistance to England. In the second place, they found means to prolong the negotiation of peace till the 7th of August, 1641, that is, till almost all the grievances were redressed, the Triennial bill passed, and another, that the Parliament should not be dissolved, but by an act for that purpose. All this was very remote from the hopes the King had flattered himself with, that he should have a sufficient supply to compel the Scots to return home.†

To finish in a word what relates to Scotland, we shall only say, that the King went thither in August, 1641,‡ staid there till the 19th of November, assisted in person at the Parliament, and gave the royal assent to all the acts presented to him.§

What

* Particularly that there were fifteen hundred in Lancashire, eight thousand in Ireland, and several thousands in south and north Wales, well furnished with arms, and well paid and provided for.

† The King had promised his Scottish subjects, that he would this summer pay them a visit, in order to settle their government; and, though the English Parliament was very importunate with him, that he should lay aside that journey, they could not prevail with him so much as to delay it. As he must necessarily in his journey pass through the troops of both nations, the Commons seem to have entertained great jealousy on that account, and to have now hurried on, as much as they fomerly delayed, the disbanding of the armies. The arrears therefore of the Scots were fully paid them; and those of the English in part. The Scots returned home, and the English were separated into their several counties and dismissed.

‡ A small committee of both Houses was appointed to attend the King into Scotland, in order, as was pretended, to see that the articles of pacification were executed; but really to be spies upon them, and extend still farther the ideas of Parliamentary authority, as well as eclipse the Majesty of the King. The Earl of Bedford, Lord Howard, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Armyne, Fiennes, and Hambden, were the persons chosen. Endeavours were used, before Charles's departure, to have a protector of the king appointed, with a power to pass laws without having recourse to the King. So little regard was now paid to royal authority, or to the established constitution of the kingdom.

§ The Scots thought that they had finished a very perilous undertaking, much to their profit and reputation. Besides the large pay voted them for lying in good quarters during a twelvemonth, the English

What has hitherto been said of the Parliament's behaviour to the King, is sufficient to show, how sensible the King must have been of the mortifications he daily received,* He had passionately desired to be revenged of the Scots, or at least to drive them out of the kingdom; and he saw that the Parliament had rewarded them for their coming. He hated the Presbyterians, and would have been glad to have had it in his power to root out Presbyterianism: but he saw, that on the contrary, the House of Commons openly took their part, and laboured to destroy episcopacy. His two principal ministers, in whom he most confided, were in the Tower, and he easily perceived the Commons intended not to stop there, since with regard to the Earl of Strafford, they were daily seeking means to make good their charge. Two other of his ministers, had been forced to fly, and the appearing to be still well affected to him, was sufficient to render any person the object of the persecution of the Commons.

It has already been seen after what manner the King governed for fifteen years, and the reader must be convinced, that he intended to alter the government, and procure for himself and successors, a power much more extensive than what was allowed him by the laws, and to which none of his predecessors, except Richard II. had ever pretended; not even Henry VIII. the most absolute of all the Kings of England, since William the Conqueror. But there was this difference between Henry VIII. and Charles I. Henry did whatever he pleased by way of Parliament; whereas Charles protended to rule without Parliaments, looking upon them as little necessary to the constitution of the government. Nothing was more contrary to his inflexible temper, than to be forced to stoop to a House of Commons, for whom he had before shown the utmost contempt. It is therefore no wonder, that in his sad situation, he should think of some way to free himself from this bondage. But a slight attempt to compass this end, served only to throw him into irretrievable ruin. This was the project of gaining the army, and causing them to declare for the King. The King approved of the project, without perceiving the consequences, having no minister about him, that had either the inclination or ability to give him good counsel. This plot to gain the army, is by some looked upon as a chimera, a mere fiction, to render the King odious. On the other hand, the Parliament considered it as a real conspiracy, and pretended to draw from thence an evident proof, that the King's compliance with respect to the redress of grievances, was all dissimulation, in expectation of an opportunity to restore himself by force, to the state he was in before this Parliament. This bred in the Parliament an invincible distrust of the King, and a resolution to put it out of his power to break his word, and the means they used to execute this resolution, occasioned the civil wars, of which we shall speak hereafter. Before we proceed to this plot, however, it will be requisite to say something of the Earl of Strafford's affair, with which this has some connexion.

The Earl had been impeached by the Commons the 11th of November, 1640; but his process could not be ready to be tried till the 22d of March, 1640-1. This trial lasted till the 12th of April, and then the Commons, who had been always present, perceiving, doubtless, that the sentence would not be so rigorous as they wished, resolved to proceed against the Earl by way of bill of attainder. They voted therefore, on the 16th and 19th of April, that it was sufficiently proved, that the Earl of Strafford had endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government into the realms of England and Ireland, and that this was high-treason. On the 21st of the same month, the bill of attainder passed, with the majority of 204 against 59.

A. D. 1641.] The bill met with such great opposition in the House of Peers, that it was very doubtful, whether it would pass, or be thrown out. For which reason, on the 24th was presented to both Houses a petition, subscribed by above forty thousand inhabitants of London, setting forth the causes of their suspicions and fears. And amongst others, that justice was not executed upon the Earl of Strafford, and that there was reason to dread some secret plot against the Parliament. The 28th of April, the Commons sent by Mr. Hyde a message to the Lords, that they had received information, that the Earl of Strafford had a design to make an escape out of the Tower: that the guard about him was weak, and therefore they desired he might be a close prisoner, and his guards strengthened, to which the Lords consented. The 1st of May, the King came to the Parliament, and in a speech to both Houses, said to this effect:—"That having been present at the trial of the Earl of Strafford, he could not in conscience condemn him of high-treason, though he thought him guilty of misdemeanors. Therefore he desired the Lords to find some way to bring him out of this great streight."

The Commons were much troubled and discontented with this speech, and immediately adjourned till May the 3d, on which day great multitudes of people † repairing to Westminster, insulted and threatened the Lords, as they were going to their House, crying out Justice, Justice.

The same day Mr. Pym made known to the House, "That there were divers informations given of desperate designs both at home and abroad, against the Parliament, and the peace of the nation; and that the persons engaged therein were under an oath of secrecy: that there was an endeavour to disaffect the army, not only against the Parliament's proceedings, but to bring them up against the Parliament to over-awe them: that there was also a design upon the Tower; and endeavours used for the Earl of Strafford to escape: that these combinations at home, had a correspondency with practices abroad; and that the French were drawing down their forces amain to the sea-side: and there was a cause to fear, their intent was upon Portsmouth: that divers persons of eminency about the Queen were deeply engaged in these plots: that it was necessary that the ports should be stopped; and his Majesty desired to command, that no person attending upon the King, Queen, or Prince, should depart without leave of his Majesty, with the humble advice of his Parliament."

The House fell into a serious debate of this matter, and were generally of opinion, that it was necessary to enter into a common resolution for the safety of the kingdom. However, there seems to be ground to suspect, that it was only an artifice to stir up the people, and induce the Lords to do as the Commons desired, from a fear of the imminent danger the kingdom was threatened with.

The Commons next came to several resolutions, to provide for the safety of the kingdom, and the town of Portsmouth in particular. They communicated to the Lords the informations they had received, the votes they had passed, and the protestation which they had sworn to on the behalf of the kingdom, desiring that every Peer might be ordered to take it.

It was very difficult for the Lords to refuse the Commons desire. In the first place, they had inspired the nation with such a terror, that no man durst oppose their resolves, for fear of being looked upon as having ill-de-

English Parliament had conferred on them a present of three hundred thousand pounds for their brotherly assistance. In the articles of pacification, they were declared to have ever been good subjects; and their military expeditions were approved of, as enterprises calculated and intended for his Majesty's honour and advantage. To carry farther the triumph over their sovereign, these terms, so ignominious to him were ordered, by a vote of Parliament, to be read in all churches, upon a day of thanksgiving, appointed for the national pacification: all their claims for the restriction of prerogative were agreed to be ratified: and what they more valued than all these advantages, they had a near prospect of spreading the presbyterian discipline in England and Ireland, from the seeds which they had scattered of their religious principles.

* May 2, was solemnized at Whitehall the marriage, between William, Prince of Orange, and the Lady Mary, King Charles's eldest daughter.

signs, and exposed to inevitable ruin. Secondly, the people still continued to flock to Westminster, and openly threatened the Lords. Thirdly, the multitude presented the same day a petition to the Lords, demanding justice upon the Earl of Strafford, and that their Lordships would please to free them from the fears of the conspiracy. Fourthly, on the morrow, being the 4th of May, the people repaired to Westminster in greater numbers than the day before, and some incendiaries posted up against a wall in the Old Palace-Yard, the names of fifty-six members, calling them Straffordians, and betrayers of their country. Lastly, the same day the multitudes presented to the Lords another petition, saying, "That they understood the Tower was going to receive a garrison of men, not of the Hamlets, (as usually) but consisting of other persons under the command of a Captain, a great confident of the Earl of Strafford's, and that this was done to make way for the Earl's escape."

Upon this petition, the House sent six Peers to examine Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower, concerning the truth of this fact. Balfour answered, it was true, he had his Majesty's order to receive one hundred men * into the Tower, and Captain Billingsly to command them, and to receive only such men as the Captain should bring to him; but understanding now their Lordships' pleasure, he would receive no other guard into the Tower but the Hamlet men.

The Lords did farther declare, at a conference with the Commons, that they were drawing to a conclusion of the bill of attainder, but were so encompassed with multitudes of people, that they might be conceived not to be free, and therefore desired the Commons to join with them, to find out some way to send the people to their homes. Then they debated the Protestation, passed it, and took the same. It was taken by four hundred and thirty-three Commoners, and one hundred and six Lords, including the Bishops and Judges. The Commons having ordered Dr. Burges to acquaint the multitude with the protestation taken by both Houses, and that they were desired to return to their homes, they forthwith departed.

The same day, the Commons ordered a bill to be prepared for the continuance of this present Parliament, that it might not be dissolved without the consent of both Houses. They ordered likewise the protestation to be tendered to the whole kingdom.

The same day, May the 4th, the House was informed, that six or eight of the conspirators were fled, of whom Mr. Henry Jermin, and Mr. Henry Percy, members of the House, were two, and that they were gone towards Portsmouth. At the same time, information came that the Queen was preparing to go to the same place. These two successive informations causing strong suspicions, the Houses dispatched to Portsmouth one Lord and two Commoners, to propose certain queries to the Governor, and take care for the security of the town and haven. They agreed withal, to move the Queen to defer her journey to Portsmouth. They desired also the King to publish a proclamation, for calling in Jermin, Percy, and other fugitives, which the King promised to do. The same day, the Speaker sent, by order of the House, a letter to Sir Jacob Ashly, with a charge to communicate it to the army. The object of this letter was, to conciliate the army, and to assure them of speedily receiving their full pay.

Meanwhile, the committee, appointed to inquire into the conspiracy, made their report in the following manner:

"That this plot consisteth of three heads: the first was, the design upon the Tower. The second, to engage the army. The third, to bring in foreign forces. For the Tower, it appeared to be thus: Captain Billingsly being examined upon oath, confessed, that he was acquainted with Sir John Suckling: that the said Sir John lately offered him employment in one of the King's ships, then at Portsmouth; afterwards employment for Portugal: that this deponent having notice to meet at the privy-lodgings at Whitehall, did there receive orders to get an hundred men to serve in the Tower, under him. And if he did fail, he should answer it with his life. And afterwards meeting with Sir John Suckling, and acquainting him therewith, he told him he would furnish him with the said number. Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower, being examined, said, that he had command to receive Captain Billingsly with an hundred men into the Tower, who should be under his command. That the Earl of Strafford at that time expostulating with him about his escape, told him, he would attempt nothing in that kind without his privity; and that he should have the King's warrant for his indemnity; and that the warrant should be to command him to remove the Earl of Strafford from the Tower, to some other castle; and he would then take his opportunity to escape; that the Lieutenant of the Tower not giving any complying answer thereunto, the said Earl sent again to intreat him to come to him, and would have persuaded him to let him make an escape; saying, "Without your concurrence it cannot be done; and if you will consent thereunto, I will make you present payment of twenty-two thousand pounds, besides you shall have a good marriage for your son." To which the Lieutenant of the Tower replied, he was so far from concurring therein, that he was not to be farther moved in such a thing. Thus much the Lieutenant of the Tower delivered upon his oath.

"Colonel Goring, upon his examination in the House of Commons, did confess, that Sir John Suckling was the first person that ever made any overture unto him, concerning the army's marching towards London: Afterwards being in the Queen's lodgings, he met with Mr. H. Percy, which was about the beginning or middle of Lent last, and Mr. Percy told him, there was a consultation of officers to be had, concerning the good of the army; and desired him to go along with him to his chamber, where the meeting was to be. There were present at the same meeting, Commissary Wilmot, Colonel Ashburnham, Captain Pollard, Sir John Berkly, Daniel O'Neal, Mr. Jermin, and himself: that Mr. Percy said, there were propositions to be made which were of great concernment; and that it was necessary there should be an oath of secrecy taken before any thing was propounded: that the oath should be to this purpose: that we should neither directly nor indirectly discover any part of this consultation, nor ever to think ourselves dissolved from that oath, by any other oath which might be imposed upon us hereafter: Which oath was read out of a paper, when it was tendered unto them; and thereupon they were sworn, by laying their hands upon the bible; that he and Jermin were sworn together, for the rest had taken the oath before. Then three propositions were made to them:

"I. Concerning the Bishops' functions and votes.

"II. The not disbanding of the Irish army, until the Scots were disbanded also.

"III. The endeavouring to settle the King's revenue in its former proportion.—

"He farther said, that the whole number there met, were of opinion, that the army should not march towards London, till a declaration had been first sent up to the Parliament: that he, the said Goring, answered, it was a nice point to interpose in the proceeding of the Parliament; and did propound some difficulties to allay the business, to divert Commissary Wilmot, and those other persons from so dangerous a business: and said, that he did not think it was a design of folly to undertake it; for they must think the Scots would take the advantage upon the army's removal southwards, whose correspondence was so great with the city; and for them to begin to show their teeth, and not be able to bite, would argue little prudence; that they should either undertake it so as to go through with it, or let it alone: that he did ask them what ammunition they had to accommodate so great an army; and whether they could

* Whitelock says, it was two hundred men; and that Balfour confessed two thousand pounds had been offered him, to consent to the Earl's escape. He adds, that this design was discovered by three women, who hearkened at the key-hole of the Earl's door, and heard his discourse with Captain Billingsly.

command the ammunition in the Tower: that Wilmot, Pollard, and Ashburnham, then made answer, they had no purpose to go to London; for to surprise the Tower, was to conquer the kingdom: that this, among other passages, was part of the discourse at the first meeting.

"That shortly after there was another meeting of the same persons, and in the same place, in Mr. Percy's chamber, where there were propositions of another nature, desperate and impious on the one hand, and foolish on the other; and that he endeavoured by argument to divert them, by propounding an impossibility to effect the same: for how could the army, lodged in several quarters, unpaid, and at such a distance, march on a sudden to London, and surprise what they had in design?

"That Mr. Jermin was the person that first proposed the marching of the army towards London: that for his part he declared himself absolutely against it. That Mr. Jermin replied to him in private, 'You do not dislike the design, for you are as ready for any wild, mad undertaking, as any man I know; but you dislike the temper of those persons who are engaged in the business.'

"He did farther confess, that he propounded that Suckling might be admitted to the consultation: but Wilmot, Ashburnham, and Pollard, would not hear of it. And they three did then declare themselves against the army's marching towards London.

"Then he took occasion to say, that he did not acquaint some members of both Houses, whom he could name, that there were some of the army whom they did not think so well of, were more faithful and serviceable to the Parliament than they were aware of, which time would produce; and named them: and they did accordingly give testimony of his integrity, so far as general terms could discover the design. He confessed, that Mr. Jermin did make some offers unto him, to relinquish the government of Portsmouth upon some terms of advance: but he said, he did not conclude any thing, for he would first see the performance of what was offered; so had no farther discourse with him concerning that business. But he doth believe that Suckling and Jermin did confer together about the design. He said, they did not desire his opinion about a general; some were for Essex, some for Holland; but he, with Mr. Jermin, were for Newcastle.

"Being again examined upon his oath before the committee of Lords and Commons, and pressed more particularly to answer questions not before proposed unto him, he did confess, that meeting with Mr. Jermin in the Queen's withdrawing chamber, her Majesty came and told him, the King would speak with him; and meeting with his Majesty, he told him, he was minded to set his army in a good posture, being advised thereto by the Earl of Bristol (as he said) and his Majesty then commanded him to join with Mr. Percy, and some others in that business.

"As for the designs from beyond the seas, the Committee did make report to the House, that it was cleared unto them, that Jermin endeavoured to have got the possession of Portsmouth; that the King of France had drawn down great forces to the sea-side; that the governor of Calais had examined some Englishmen, whether the Earl of Strafford's head was cut off? And this was in point of time, the 1st of May, according to the English style, and Sir William Cartwright, Governor of Guernsey, wrote letters also, which came in great haste, that he understood the French had a design upon that Island, or some part of England. It also appeared to the committee, by divers of the letters which were opened coming from beyond sea, that they expected the Earl of Strafford there; and that they hoped the horse-leeches should be starved for the want of blood: and in some of those letters there was advice to the Cardinal to bestir himself betimes, to interrupt the heighth of the proceedings here in England. Also examinations of some priests were taken in Lancashire, and sent up to London, which were there taken the 3d of May, which did testify, that the priests did say, the Parliament should be suddenly dissolved; for the army was to march up thither with all speed, and they would be seconded by forces out of France; and that Montague did write out of France to Mr. Percy (which was also intercepted) that if he did perform what he had undertaken, he would be made a Knight of the Garter."

Founded upon these depositions, the House of Commons passed votes against Percy, Jermin, and Suckling.

Besides the depositions, there was Percy's letter after his flight into France, to his brother the Earl of Northumberland; of which the Parliament made great use. This letter showed plainly, there was really a project to gain the army, and engage them to serve the King against the Parliament, and knew that the King had approved of the same.*

The 16th of June, the committee appointed to examine the affair of the plot to seduce the army, made a second report to the House, and caused several depositions to be read. The House was further informed, that the officers who had undertaken to serve the King, had communicated to him the draught of a petition, which was to be directed to the King and Parliament from the army: that they hoped to get it subscribed by most of the officers, and that the King, after reading it, had approved of the same, and written at the bottom these two letters, C. R. in token of his approbation.

These are the grounds whereon was built the reality of this plot, which was extremely injurious to the King, by the distrust it bred in the minds of most of the members of Parliament, and of the nation in general. But it must be added, that King Charles's favourers call it a mere chimera, even to this day. We cannot help saying, that we believe there was some truth in it; but we are of opinion, that the heads of the contrary party to the King, greatly aggravated the circumstances and consequences, in order to cause to pass the more easily, the bill of attainder of the Earl of Strafford, and the act for the continuance of the Parliament, to which the King gave the royal assent the same day, and in this same juncture. What confirms us the more in this opinion, is, the very arguments themselves alledged by the King's friends, to shew that it was a fiction to render the King odious. For they cannot help owing, there was a project to engage the army to declare for the King. They say only, that the end proposed by the authors of this project, was to hinder the army from being seduced to espouse the interest of the Parliament. But 1st, there appears not the least sign of this pretended sole end, either in the depositions of the witnesses, or in Percy's letter, or in the reports of the committee appointed to examine it. 2dly, The King, whom the Parliament so often reproached afterwards with this plot, never used this reason to excuse the authors. In the third place, it is not probable, the officers should have any such purpose, since at that time the army was too much displeased with the Parliament, to afford any ground to fear, they should be seduced to declare against the King. The most plausible thing they say, is, that there was never any express design to march the army to London, upon which however the Commons chiefly insisted. The denial of this circumstance was what the King solely adhered to. He called God to witness, he never knew of any such design. But he never denied positively his having been informed of a design to engage the army to his side. We must therefore carefully distinguish two things in this conspiracy, namely, the design of gaining the army, which clearly appears, and the design of marching the army to London. It appears by the depositions, that this design was proposed in the assembly of officers, but was not approved. So the King could affirm he knew not of it, because indeed it was never resolved, though he was not ignorant of its having been proposed.*

If it is not supposed, that Charles I. from the beginning of his reign to the time of this last Parliament, had formed a design to establish in England an arbitrary government, it will be almost impossible to understand his history, and particularly this second part. But, upon this supposition, which appears incontestable, all difficulties vanish.

There is no doubt, when the Commons impeached the Earl of Strafford, his ruin was resolved by the leading men of that House. The Earl being looked upon as the most powerful, and most in favour of all the King's ministers, and as the principal author of the miseries of the kingdom, this was sfficient to make it thought requisite to sacrifice him to the public. Besides this, he had made himself many enemies, by his imperious behaviour, to which great ministers, who are secure of their master's favour, are generally but too liable. Moreover, he had deserted the people's interest, after having strongly supported it whilst a member of the House of Commons, and devoted himself entirely to the King. This sufficed to render him odious, and the Commons, when they impeached him, knew they could not do any thing more grateful to the people. He was therefore accused of high-treason, upon certain public evidence, and the inward conviction of most of the members. After his being sent to the Tower upon this impeachment, the House considered of the articles on which they were to ground this accusation, and when they were brought to the Lords, proofs were sought to support them.†

These articles, to the number of twenty-eight, tended to prove in general, that the Earl of Strafford had endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws of the state, and establish an arbitrary power. So, though each of the pretended crimes, whereof he was accused, could not be accounted high-treason, the House pretended, that all together manifestly showed his design, and the means he had employed to accomplish it.

The Parliament of Ireland hearing the Earl of Strafford was in the Tower, immediately sent a committee of both Houses to England, to lay before the Parliament remonstrances concerning the grievances endured by the Irish, under that Lord's administration.

This process was not ready to be tried till the 22d of March 1640-1, and lasted till the 12th of April. It would be too tedious to give a particular account of the proofs, depositions of the evidences, answers of the party accused upon each article, and replies of the Commons. To give a general idea of the thing, it will suffice to say in two words, that the impeachment running wholly upon the Earl of Strafford's pretended intention to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the greatest part of the crimes he was accused of, could be accounted high treason but on supposition of this same intention. And therefore the managers ‡ insisted upon every one of the articles in order to prove this intention, maintaining, that though each singly was not capable of proving it, they were, when joined together, of the utmost evidence. But besides, that each of these articles was not equally well proved, it remained also to decide, whether the intention could render a man guilty of treason. The counsel for the Earl of Strafford maintained that although by the law, the bare intention of killing the King was high treason, it did not follow that the intention could be considered upon the same footing, with respect to other treasons, which the law had not explained in the same manner. On the other hand the Earl of Strafford showed that none of the particular crimes he was charged with could be deemed treason, and that a hundred felonies could never make one treasonable crime. If the Commons had been satisfied with accusing the Earl of Strafford of felony, or misdemeanors, very probably they would have obtained a speedy sentence against him.§

But

* Whitelock's account of this matter, is thus: the officers put themselves into a junto of sworn secrecy, drew up some heads by way of petition to the King and Parliament: for money for the army; not to disband before the Scots; to preserve Bishops votes and functions; to settle the King's revenues. The army being tainted from hence, met, and drew up a letter, or petition, which was shewed to the King, and approved and signed by him with C. R. and a direction to Captain Legge, that none should see it but Sir Jacob Ashly; the main drift was, That the army might be called up to attend the safety of the King's person, and Parliament's security, or that both armies might be disbanded.

† The committee appointed to draw the articles of accusation against him, were, Mr. Whitelock the chairman, the Lord Digby, Sir Walter Earl, Mr. Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Stroud, Selden, St. John, Maynard, Palmer, Glynn. As some of the treasons charged upon him were of fourteen years' standing, the Earl desired three months' time to make his answer, but was allowed only till the 24th of February. ——The chief manager during the whole trial was Mr. Pym, of whom Dr. Welwood, tells the following story. When the Earl, then only Sir Thomas Wentworth, was upon making his peace with the court, he gave Pym some obscure intimation of it. Pym understanding his drift, stopped him short with this expression, "You need not use all this art to tell me, that you have a mind to leave us: but remember what I tell you, you are going to be undone; and remember, that though you leave us now, I will never leave you while your head is upon your shoulders.

‡ They were, George Lord Digby, John Hampden, John Pym, Oliver St. John, Sir Walter Earl, Jeoffery Palmer, John Mainard, John Glynn. Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, was Lord High-Steward upon this occasion. The place of the trial was Westminster-Hall; to which a theatre and seats were erected for both Houses of Parliament, and for the judges. The members of the House of Commons sat uncovered: and the Lords in their robes.

§ The articles of impeachment against Strafford regarded his conduct as President of the Council of York, as Deputy or Lieutenant of Ireland, and as Counsellor or Commander in England. But though four months were employed by the managers in framing the accusation, and all Strafford's answers were extemporary; it appears from comparison, not only that he was free from the crime of treason, of which there is not the least appearance, but that his conduct, making allowance for human infirmities, exposed to such severe scrutiny, was innocent and even laudable.—The powers of the northern council, while he was president, had been extended by the King's instructions beyond what formerly had been practised: but that court being at first instituted by stretch of royal prerogative, it had been usual for the Prince to vary his instructions; and the largest authority committed to it was altogether as legal as the most moderate and the most limited. Nor was it reasonable to conclude that Strafford had used any art to procure those extensive powers; since he never once sat as president, or exercised one act of jurisdiction, after he was invested with the authority so much complained of.——In the government of Ireland his administration had been equally promotive of his master's interests, and that of the subjects committed to his charge. A large debt he had paid off: he had left a considerable sum in the exchequer: the revenue, which never before answered the charges of government, was now raised to be equal to them. A small standing army, formerly kept in no order, was augmented, and was governed by exact discipline: and a great force was there raised and paid, for the support of the King's authority against the Scottish covenanters.—— Industry, and all the arts of peace, were introduced among that rude people; the shipping of the kingdom, augmented a hundred fold; the customs trippled upon the same rates; the exports double in value to the imports; manufactures, particularly that of linen, introduced and promoted; agriculture, by means of the English and Scottish plantations, gradually advancing; the Protestant religion encouraged without the persecution or discontent of the Catholics.—The springs of authority he had enforced without overstraining them. Discretionary acts of jurisdiction, indeed he had often exerted by holding courts-martial, billetting soldiers, deciding causes upon paper petitions before the council, issuing proclamations, and punishing their infraction. But discretionary authority, during that age, was usually exercised even in England. In Ireland, it was still more requisite, among rude people, not yet thoroughly subdued, adverse to the religion and manners of their conquerors, ready on all occasions to relapse into rebellion and disorder. While the managers of the Commons demanded, every moment, that the deputy's conduct should be examined by the line of rigid law and severe principles; he appealed still to the practice of all former deputies, and to the uncontroulable necessity of his situation.—So great was his art of managing elections and ballancing parties, that he had engaged the Irish Parliament to vote whatever was necessary, both for the payment of former debts, and for support of the new-levied army, nor had he ever been reduced to the illegal expedients practised in England, for the supply of public necessities. No imputation of rapacity could justly be made against his administration. Some instances of imperious expressions, and even actions may be met with. The case of Lord Mountnorris is the most flagrant and least excusable. It had been reported at the table of Lord Chancellor Loftus, that Annesly, one of the deputy's attendants, in moving a stool, had sorely hurt his master's foot, who was at that time afflicted with the gout. Perhaps, said Mountnorris, who was present at table, "it was done in revenge of that public affront, which my Lord Deputy formerly put upon him: but he has a brother, who would not have taken such a revenge." This casual, and seemingly innocent, at least ambiguous expression, was reported to Strafford, who, on pretence that such a suggestion might prompt Annesly to avenge himself in another manner, ordered Mountnorris, who was an officer, to be tried by a court-martial, for mutiny and sedition against his general. The court, which consisted of the chief officers of the army, found the crime to be capital, and condemned that nobleman to lose his head. In vain did Strafford plead,

But having solely impeached him of high treason, it belonged to the Peers to condemn or acquit him solely upon that sort of offence. In the reign of Edward VI. the Duke of Somerset was accused of high treason and felony. He was acquitted as to the former, but condemned for the latter.

The Earl of Strafford defended himself with all the ability, presence of mind, judgment and temper that could be expected from a person of his parts.* Accordingly the Commons easily found that the Lords would hardly be induced to condemn him. And therefore they thought fit to take another course to accomplish their ends.

The 19th of April it was voted by the Commons, that the endeavour of the Earl of Strafford to subvert the fundamental laws of the realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government in both those kingdom, was high treason. Two days after, a bill of attainder was brought in against the Earl.† The bill was read twice in the morning, and the third time in the afternoon, and passed with the majority of 204 against 59, after which it was sent up to the Lords.

Among the opposers of the bill, the Lord Digby distinguished himself by a very eloquent speech, wherein he endeavoured to show, that to condemn the Earl of Strafford in that manner was nothing short of murder.‡ Great exceptions were taken at this speech, and though the House seemed at first not much to regard it, they ordered, afterwards, that it should be publicly burnt by the hangman.

The bill of attainder produced not the effect the Commons desired. The Lords were in no haste to examine it, or to answer the impatience of the Commons. They had a mind first to consider the arguments for and against the bill. In this interval the Peers caused Sir William Balfour to be examined concerning the project of letting the Earl of Strafford escape. Several thousands of the inhabitants of London presented to both Houses a petition against the Earl, saying, he was sworn enemy of the city. The 29th of April Mr. St. John, in the name of the Commons, made a long speech to the Lords to prove that the bill of attainder was not contrary to law. May the 1st, the King came to the Parliament, and made a speech to both Houses; in which § as before observed, he declared that, although the Earl had been guilty of misdemeanors, he believed him to be altogether innocent of the crime of treason.

This speech produced a quite contrary effect to what the King had expected. Accordingly, the Earl of Clarendon intimates that the Lord Say advised the King plead, in his own defence, against this article of impeachment, that the sentence of Mountnorris was the deed, and that too unanimous, of the court, not the act of the deputy; that he spake not to a member of the court, nor voted in the cause, but sat uncovered as a party, and then immediately withdrew to leave them to their freedom; that sensible of the iniquity of the sentence, he procured his Majesty's free pardon to Mountnorris; and that he did not even keep that nobleman a moment in suspense with regard to his fate, but instantly told him, that he himself would sooner lose his own right hand than execute such a sentence, nor was his Lordship's life in any danger. In vain did Strafford's friends add, as a further apology, that Mountnorris was a man of an infamous character, who paid court, by the lowest adulation, to all deputies, while present; and blackened their character, by the vilest calumnies, when recalled; and that Strafford, apprehending like treatment, had used this expedient for no other purpose than to subdue the petulant spirit of the man. These excuses alleviate the guilt, but there still remains enough to prove, that the mind of the deputy, though great and firm, had been not a little debauched by the riot of absolute power and uncontrouled authority.

* Dr. Welwood observes, that he expressed in his defence, such nervous and moving flights of eloquence, as came nothing short of the most celebrated pieces of antiquity. This appeared from his summing up his long answer extempore, with this pathetic conclusion: "My Lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these dear pledges, a Saint in heaven has left me."——At this he stopped, pointing to his children that stood by him, and dropped some tears, then went on—"What I forfeit for myself is nothing, but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity, wounds me to the very soul. You will pardon my infirmity; something I should have added, but am not able, therefore let it pass. And now, my Lords, for myself I have been by the blessing of God, taught, that the afflictions of this present life, are not to be compared to that eternal weight of Glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so my Lords, even so, with all tranquillity of mind, I freely submit myself to your judgment, and whether that judgment be life or death."——Mr. Whitelock observes, "That certainly never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and gestures, than this great and excellent person did; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors (some few excepted) to remorse and pity."

† Preparatory to this measure, a new proof of the Earl's guilt was produced, in order to remove such scruples as might be entertained with regard to a method of proceeding so unusual and irregular.—Sir Henry Vane, Secretary, had taken some notes of a debate in council, after the dissolution of the last Parliament; and being at a distance he had sent the keys of his cabinet, as was pretended, to his son, Sir Henry, in order to search for some papers, which were necessary for completing a marriage settlement. Young Vane, falling upon this paper of notes, deemed the matter of the utmost importance; and immediately communicated it to Pym, who now produced the paper before the House of Commons. The question before the council was: "offensive or defensive war with the Scots." The King proposes this deficiency. "But how can I undertake offensive war, if I have no more money?" The answer ascribed to Strafford was in these words. "Borrow of the city a hundred thousand pounds: go on vigorously to levy ship-money. Your Majesty having tried the affections of your people, you were absolved and loosed from all rules of government, and may do what power will admit. Your Majesty having tried all ways, shall be acquitted before God and man. And you have an army in Ireland, which you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience: for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months." There followed some counsel of Laud and Cottington, equally violent, with regard to the King's being absolved from all rules of government.—This paper, with all the circumstances of its discovery and communication, was pretended to be equivalent to two witnesses, and to be an unswerable proof of those pernicious counsels of Strafford, which tended to the subversion of the laws and constitution. It was replied by Strafford and his friends, that old Vane was his most inveterate and declared enemy; and of the Secretary himself, as was by far most probable, had willingly delivered to his son this paper of notes, to be communicated to Pym, this implied such a breach of oaths, and of trust, as rendered him totally unworthy of all credit: that the Secretary's deposition was at first exceedingly dubious: upon two examinations, he could not remember any such words: even the third time, his testimony was not positive, but imported only that Strafford had spoken such or such-like words: and words may be very like in sound and differ much in sense: nor ought the lives of men to depend upon grammatical criticisms of any expressions, much less of those which had been delivered by the Speaker without premeditation, and committed by the hearer for any time, however short, to the uncertain record of memory. That, in the present case, changing This kingdom into That kingdom, was a very slight alteration! The Earl's discourse could regard nothing but Scotland, and implies no advice unworthy of an English counsellor. That even retaining the expression, This kingdom, the words may fairly be understood of Scotland, which alone was the kingdom that the debate regarded, and which alone had thrown off allegiance, and could be reduced to obedience. That it could be proved, as well by the evidence of all the King's ministers, as by the known disposition of the forces, that the intention never was to land the Irish army in England, but in Scotland. That of six other counsellors present, Laud and Windebank, could give no evidence; Northumberland, Hamilton, Cottington, and Jackson, could recollect no such expression; and the advice was too remarkable to be easily forgotten. That it was no wise probable such a desperate council would be openly delivered at the board, and before Northumberland, a person of that high rank, and whose attachments to the court were so much weaker than his connections with the country. That though Northumberland, and he alone, had recollected some such expression as that "Of being absolved from rules of government," yet in such desperate extremities as those into which the King and kingdom were then fallen, a maxim of that nature, allowing it to be delivered by Strafford, may be defended upon principles the most favourable to law and liberty. And that nothing could be more iniquitous, than to extract an accusation of treason from an opinion simply proposed at the council table, where all freedom of debate ought to be permitted, and where it was not unusual for the members, in order to draw forth the sentiments of others, to propose counsels very remote from their own secret advice and judgment.

‡ The Lord Digby in his speech has these words:——"I am still the same in my opinions and affections as to the Earl of Strafford; I confidently believe him to be the most dangerous minister, the most insupportable to free subjects that can be charactered."—"I believe his practices in themselves as high, as tyrannical, as any subject ever ventured upon, and the malignity of them hugely aggravated by those rare abilities of his, whereof God has given him the use, but the devil the application. In a word, I believe him still that grand apostate to the commonwealth, who must not expect to be pardoned in this world, till he be dispatched to the other: and yet, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand must not be to that dispatch." Thus far a nobleman, who for his zeal to the royal cause, became the most obnoxious to the Parliament.——The reason, it seems, of his being against the bill of attainder, was, because he believed the Earl's "advising the King to bring over the army from Ireland to reduce this kingdom, did refer to the kingdom of Scotland, and not to England," the thing then under debate, being how to reduce Scotland.

§ At the trial there was on the stage, a chair and cloth of state for the King, on either side whereof was a close gallery for the King, Queen, and Prince to be private. In this place his Majesty remained all the time of the trial.

to it, in order to draw him into a snare, and render the Earl of Strafford's ruin more certain.* The Commons were highly offended with it, saying, it was an unprecedented thing, that the King should meddle with bills before they were presented to him, and a means to take away the freedom of votes, and immediately adjourned till Monday, the 3d of May.

On that day it was that the rabble of London flocked to Westminster: and on the same day the House of Commons drew the protestation before mentioned, and on the morrow, the 4th of May, the Lords approved of the same, and on the 7th passed the bill of attainder of the Earl of Strafford, there being not above forty-six Lords in the House, of the fourscore who had constantly attended the trial.† It is pretended that those who absented themselves, were terrified by the threats of the populace.

The King was then in the most uneasy situation. He loved the Earl of Strafford, and was convinced the Earl had done nothing but what was agreeable to his intentions and his maxims of government. He might be guilty with regard to the people on many accounts, but certainly he was not so with respect to the King, who had always approved his conduct. Besides, the King had protested in full Parliament, that he neither could nor would do any thing against his conscience, and that he did not believe in his conscience, the Earl was guilty. On the other hand, if he consented to the bill of attainder, after such a declaration, he would show that he was reduced to this extremity by the necessity of his affairs, so would not be thanked for it, and for the future would have nothing more to deny his Parliament. But in case he rejected the bill, he plainly perceived the consequences of his refusal, and that at least he should be accused of denying his people justice, contrary to the advice of both Houses of Parliament.

It is not unlikely that in this extremity some one advised the King to dissolve the Parliament. At least, the Commons imagined he had no other way to free himself from his present embarrassment. And therefore to deprive him of this refuge also, the same day, the 4th of May, they ordered the bringing in of a bill for the continuance of the Parliament, that it might not be dissolved without the consent of both Houses. This bill was read thrice and passed in the Commons the next day, and three days after in the Upper House, with the bill of attainder of the Earl of Strafford.

The bill of attainder having passed the House of Lords, the King assembled his privy council, and sent for his lawyers. He laid before them his scruples and reasons for not consenting to the bill. But Juxon, Bishop of London, was the only person that ventured to advise the King, to reject a bill presented to him by both Houses. All the rest endeavoured to persuade him to satisfy his people, and that the life of any one person ought not to be put in the balance with the safety of the kingdom. As to his scruples, they told him, he might consult his Bishops, who would give him the properest advice. The King not meeting with the satisfaction he expected from his council, sent for some Bishops to advise with. It is affirmed, that Williams, Archbishop of York, said to him on this occasion, "That there was a private and a public conscience for a King; and that his public conscience might not only dispense with, but oblige him to do that which was against his private conscience as a man." And therefore in plain terms advised him, "Even for conscience sake to pass the act." But, what contributed, in a great measure, to determine him, was a letter from the Earl of Strafford, who, hearing of the streights the King was in, "Humbly besought him himself to pass the bill, to remove him out of the way towards a blessed agreement, which he doubted not God would for ever establish between him and his subjects." Adding, "That his consent would more acquit his Majesty therein to God, than all the world could do besides. To a willing man there is no injury." At last, the King, no longer able to withstand the pressing instances of the Parliament and his own counsellors, or rather the fear of the calamities he foresaw would befal both himself and posterity, if he refused to consent to the bill, signed a commission to four Lords to pass it in his name.‡ By the same commission he impowered these Lords to give the royal assent to the bill for the continuance of the Parliament, which was of much greater importance to him than the Earl of Strafford's life. This bill was brought in the 6th of May, and in five days passed both Houses, and received the King's approbation, on the 10th.

On the 12th of May, the second day after the royal assent to the bill of attainder, the Earl of Strafford was executed, and suffered death with great constancy.

Not long after his death, this same Parliament passed an act for restoring his children in blood and honour, and for settling his estate upon his heirs, and the act of attainder was repealed in the reign of Charles II.

The death of the Earl of Strafford was a great, though not the only, mortification to the King. After the Commons had made this trial of their strength, they resolved to complete the reformation of the government, which till now was but commenced. The King, on his part, endeavoured, though in vain, to cool the great ardour of the Commons, by granting or promising places to such as were most agreeable to them. He had made Sir Edward Littleton, Lord Keeper, in the room of the Lord Finch, who was forced to fly. For the same reason, Dr. Juxon, Bishop of London resigned his treasurer's staff, which was to be given to the Earl of Bedford. But the Earl died, whilst he was earnestly labouring to procure an agreement between the King and Commons. Oliver St. John, a leading man in the House of Commons, had been made solicitor general. The Lord Cottington was to surrender the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of Mr. Pym, and the place of Master of the Wards in favour of the Lord Say. The office of Secretary of State, exercised by Windebank, was designed for Denzil Hollis. The Earl of Essex, the Lord Kimbolton, and Mr. Hampden, were likewise to have places.§ But the Earl of Bedford's death put an end to most of these projects. The King ceased not, however, after the death of the Earl of Strafford, to gratify the Commons, by making the Earl of Essex, Lord Chamberlain, having first removed the Earl of Pembroke; for the Earl of Essex was a great favourite of the Commons. But all this produced not the great alterations expected by the King.

The general aim of the Parliament was not only to redress past grievances, but also to free the kingdom from the fear of being exposed hereafter to the like calamities. Hitherto, they had only prepared matters by votes, which plainly showed their design, and by the protestation subscribed by both Houses. But they expected to meet in the House of Peers, with obstacles so much the greater, as the King had there a strong party. The affairs of church and state went hand in hand, so that scarcely a day passed, but the Commons gave the King some mortification, one while by pass-

* When the Earl of Strafford was told with joy by his friends, that the King had made a warm speech in his favour to both Houses, he received it as his doom, and told them, "The King's kindness had ruined him, and that he had little else to do but to prepare himself for death."

† The Lord Clarendon says, of the forty-six, eleven only dissented. According to Whitelock, there were but forty-five, of whom twenty-six voted the Earl guilty of high-treason, upon the 15th article, "For levying money in Ireland by force, in a warlike manner." And upon the 19th article, "For imposing an oath upon the subjects in Ireland."

‡ Notwithstanding his letter to the King, when his Majesty sent Secretary Carleton to the Earl, to acquaint him with what was done, and the motives of it, the Earl seriously asked the Secretary, whether his Majesty had passed the bill or not? As not believing, without some astonishment, that the King would have done it. And being again assured that it was past, he arose from his chair, lifted up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand on his heart, and said, "Put not your trust in Princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation." And it was likewise reported, that in order to bring the King to sign the bill, he was promised, the Earl's life should be spared. Some have concluded that this alledged letter of Strafford's was a forgery; but there is a mass of preponderating evidence, tending to prove its authenticity.

§ The Earl of Essex was to be governor, Mr. Hampden tutor to the Prince of Wales, and the Lord Kimbolton Privy-Seal.

ing bills or votes against the King's former proceedings, another while by prosecuting the authors of the grievances or innovations; sometimes by exclaiming against the forementioned conspiracy, and sometimes by increasing the yoke of the Papists.

All this tended to the end proposed by the opposite party to the King. It was supposed as a thing publicly known, that there had been a settled design to introduce Popery, and that some of the Bishops were concerned in the plot. Thus, by accusing the Papists of having ill designs, and by rigorously prosecuting them, this accusation was made, in some measure, to reflect on the Bishops and clergy. It was pretended, that the innovations introduced into the divine service, were a consequence of this design, and for that reason, by condemning them, the clergy, who had countenanced them, were rendered odious to the people. The accusations against particular persons, who had been most zealous to support these innovations, produced also the same effect. In short, nothing was omitted that could contribute to show the people the necessity of restoring the government to its natural state, and convince them, that the ecclesiastical hierarchy was more prejudicial than necessary to the church and state. With these two things the Commons were taken up for the space of three months, from the death of the Earl of Strafford, to the King's journey to Scotland.

First, with respect to the state, in this interval it was that bills were brought in to abolish the Star Chamber and court of York, to regulate the council table, to abolish ship money, and prevent vexatious proceedings concerning knighthood, against illegal imprisonments, and for ascertaining the bounds and limits of forests. Each judge in particular was accused. The tax imposed by the King on the shires, for the wages of the muster master, was declared contrary to law. The conspiracy to seduce the army was likewise examined, and Wilmot, Ashburnham, and Pollard, were expelled the House, and committed to prison. All the patents for monopolies, of which most were suppressed, were brought before the House. It was also examined, by what means a certain clause had been inserted in the Petition of Right, concerning tonnage and poundage, and care was taken to register a declaration on that head, to hinder posterity from being deceived by that surreptitious clause.

As to religion, besides what was done with respect to the Papists, the Commons declared illegal the oath by which ministers were bound to maintain the hierarchy in the church. A bill was brought in against pluralists. The canons made by the late convocation were condemned. A bill was passed to abolish the high commission. The suppression of deans and chapters was voted. Matthew Wren, Bishop of Ely, was impeached. The protestation was ordered to be subscribed by the whole nation. An accusation was brought to the Lords against thirteen Bishops, who had assisted at the convocation. There was some difference between the two Houses concerning the protestation. The Lords would have left every man at liberty to sign it: but did not think proper to use compulsion. The Commons, on the contrary, looked upon the protestation as a Shiboleth, to distinguish the Ephraimites, and at last the Lords agreed to what the Commons desired.*

There was also another dispute between the two Houses, concerning the Star Chamber. The Lords were willing to agree, it should be reformed, but refused to consent to its abolition. Meanwhile, the Commons vigorously supporting the bill, they had sent up to the Peers, it passed at last, and the King gave his assent the 5th of July.

In this same interval, the officers of customs, who had collected the duties imposed on merchandises by the King's sole authority without consent of Parliament, finding they were likely to be attacked, offered of their own accord one hundred and fifty thousand pounds for an act of oblivion, and their offer was accepted.

The Lord Digby, son of the Earl of Bristol, and member of the House of Commons, was called by writ to the House of Lords the 10th of June. In the beginning of this Parliament, he had distinguished himself by his zeal for the redress of grievances: but his speech against the bill of attainder of the Earl of Strafford, made him forfeit the good will of the Commons. Whether he was already gained by the King, or on this occasion first joined his party, his Majesty thought proper to screen him from the resentment of the Commons, by calling him to the House of Peers. He will hereafter appear the King's chief minister and counsellor, and a great enemy to the Commons, as they on their part never forgave his defection.

The Irish army ought to have been long since disbanded, as there was no occasion to keep it on foot, and the Commons had frequently desired it of the King. Nevertheless, this army subsisted the last, though the Commons had taken care for their payment. When they came to be disbanded, the King acquainted both Houses, that the Spaniard having desired to take this army into his service, and intimated the same by his ambassador, he had promised to send him four thousand men. The Lords made no scruple to agree to the King's engagement. But the Commons, ever full of fears and suspicions, thought not proper, that the King should keep these troops in the King of Spain's name, who would make them serve in the Low Countries, whence the King might draw them whenever he pleased. Besides, the French ambassador had desired the rest of the army for his master, to which the King had also consented. They thought it was an artifice of the King's to keep this Popish army, which was devoted to him, and on which he could much better rely than on that of England. Wherefore they prayed the King to call in his word. They had on this occasion several conferences with the Lords, where they alledged sundry reasons to support their opinion, without expressing the true one: but it was easily perceived. The King was much displeased with the Commons' opposition, whether he thought himself bound in honour to keep his promise, or really intended to preserve this army, by lending it to the Kings of France and Spain, in order to use it himself in case of necessity. What gives cause to suspect he had formed such a project is, that it does not appear the Kings of France and Spain had then any great occasion for these troops. Be this as it will, the King, without regarding the Commons' opposition, shewed that his intention was to perform his promise, and this affair was not yet ended when the King departed for Scotland. Some time after, he sent a message to the Lords, dated from Edinburgh, wherein he appeared resolved to stand to his engagement, let what would be the consequence. But the two Houses found means to render his resolution ineffectual, by publishing an ordinance, declaring, that whoever should assist in transporting these Irish troops into any foreign country, should be deemed an enemy to the state. This ordinance broke all the King's measures, not one owner of ships being willing to hazard inevitable ruin for his sake.

* One of the articles of the Protestation occasioning some disputes, the Commons explained more fully that article, which was thus worded: "I swear to defend the true Reformed Protestant religion, expressed in the doctrine of the church of England, against all popery and popish innovations within this realm, contrary to the same doctrine." Some persons insisting upon the first part of this clause, pretended, that there was no other doctrine of the church of England than what is contained in the thirty-nine articles drawn up in the reign of Elizabeth, of which one is "to preserve the government of the church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans," &c. Hence they inferred, that those who should take the protestation were bound to maintain episcopacy. But the Commons considering the whole clause as expressed in the protestation, declared, "That by these words was, and is meant, only the public doctrine professsed in the said church, so far as it is opposite to popery and popish innovations; and that the said words are not to be extended to the maintaining of any form of worship, discipline of government, nor of any rites or ceremonies of the said church of England." This clearly showed what was their intention with regard to the hierarchy.

As

As the Commons had undertaken to redress all grievances, that of the city of London, concerning the plantation of Londonderry, was considered, whilst the King was in Scotland. The House passed several votes upon this subject, and declaring illegal all the proceedings of the Star Chamber, reversed the sentence against the city of London, as unjust and given by incompetent judges. They declared, that when the King should be pleased to repay to the city the money he had received, the patent thereupon granted should be cancelled or surrendered.

After that, both Houses resolved to adjourn from the 9th of September, to the 20th of October, that the members might go to their homes, whence they had been absent ten months. As soon as this resolution was taken, a great number of both Houses retired into the country, to gain a little more time to repose themselves, so that there remained but twenty-two Lords in the Upper House, and a hundred and fifteen members in the Lower House. Then some one, willing to improve so favourable an opportunity, moved, that it was necessary to make some alterations in the Common Prayer Book. This motion occasioned a very warm debate. Mr. Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, strenuously defended the liturgy, so that, contrary to the expectation of the person who had raised the debate, nothing was resolved.

But some days after, the affair of innovation in the church was debated, and the House passed several votes, declaring, that certain innovations ought to be abolished. At the same time, the Lords seeing, that in the Lower House, the authenticness of the Common Prayer Book was questioned, voted, that it should be observed as before in all the churches, without any omission or alteration. This begot a conference between both Houses, wherein the Commons desired the Lords to consent to a declaration, for removing the communion table from the east end of the church, taking away the rails, leveling the chancels, pulling down the pictures, &c.

The Lords regarded not the desire of the Commons. But on the morrow, September the 9th, the day appointed for the adjournment, they communicated to the Commons, in a conference, an order dated January the 16th, 1640-1, enjoining that divine service should be performed without any alteration, as appointed by acts of Parliament, and a confirmation of the same order, pursuant to a resolution taken on the present 9th of September, desiring the Commons to concur with them in the publishing thereof.

The Commons absolutely refused to join in the publication of this order, thinking it unseasonable at such a juncture, to press the rigorous observance of the laws concerning divine service, when a great part of the people called for a reformation. Then they drew up a declaration, inserting that of the day before, to which the Lords had returned no answer, with an order of the Peers of the 16th of January, and the confirmation of the same order of the 9th of September, with the refusal of the Commons to concur with them, and ordered, that their declaration should be printed and published.

The same day, before the adjournment, the Commons appointed a committee of forty-seven to take care, during the recess, of the most weighty and urgent affairs. The Lords appointed a committee also, consisting but of seven Peers, which done, both Houses adjourned to the 20th of October.

During the recess, the committee, which had followed the King into Scotland, sent word to the committee of the House of Commons, that there was a sort of conspiracy in Scotland, and that the aim of the parties concerned, seemed to be, to interrupt the proceedings of the Parliament of that kingdom, and to destroy the Marquis of Hamilton, the Earl of Argyle, and the Earl of Lanerick. As the committee received this notice but two days before the meeting of the Parliament, they only ordered the Lord Mayor of London to place convenient guards in several places of the city, fearing that the conspirators of Scotland might have correspondents in England, to disturb at the same time the peace of the kingdom.

The Parliament being met the 20th of October, Mr. Pym made a report to the House, of what the committee had done during the recess. Whereupon the Commons desired a conference with the Lords, where they represented to them:

"I. That a letter from the committee in Scotland, gave ground to think, that when there was a design in England, to seduce the King's army, and interrupt the Parliament, that there was the like design at that time in Scotland.

"II. That the principal party named in that design in Scotland, the Lord Crawford, is a person suspected to be Popishly affected; and therefore may have correspondence with the like party in England.

"III. That it has been lately published in England, that some things were to be done in Scotland before it broke out there. Therefore we may suspect some correspondence here."

Upon these grounds the Commons propounded to the Lords, that a strong guard should be kept in the cities of London and Westminster, and care taken for the defence of the whole kingdom; and that an express messenger be sent to the committee of both Houses in Scotland, to acquaint them, that the Parliament of England was ready to give the Scots all necessary assistance against those who should disturb the peace. The Lords approving of these proposals, instructions were sent to the committee agreeably to the Commons' desires.

The same day, the 20th of October, both Houses desired the Earl of Essex, whom the King had made general on the south of the Trent, to place a guard at Westminster, for the security of the Parliament, which was accordingly done.

The next day, a complaint was made to the Commons against some persons for not obeying the declaration of the 9th of September, published by order of the House; and, on the morrow, the bill for disabling persons in holy orders to exercise temporal jurisdiction was again debated, and several speeches made pro and con. At last, it was resolved to prosecute the Bishops who had assisted at the late convocation, and to push the bill for excluding the Bishops from their votes in Parliament. To that end, the House desired a conference with the Lords, where Mr. Pym and Mr. St. John explained the demands of the Commons, with the reasons to support them. This affair was carried no farther at that time, doubtless by reason of the obstacles which occurred in the Upper House, where the Bishops gave their voices, to decide whether they were to vote or not.

The Parliament seemed to have nothing more to do, all the grievances being in a manner redressed, and the armies disbanded. But after what has been said, it will not doubtless be thought strange, that the House of Commons should order the committee, which, at the beginning of the Parliament, was charged with preparing a remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, to resume and finish that work. Nothing would have been more needless than such a remonstrance, after the grievances were redressed, if it had not been intended on purpose to quarrel with the King, and afford a pretence to defer to another time the settling his revenues, which was the only thing that remained to be done, and which the King expected. We have already observed there was a party in the Parliament, who meant not to stop at the redress of grievances. It was this party that caused the remonstrance to be resumed, in expectation the King would be displeased with it, and take some step that should promote the execution of their project.

But whilst this remonstrance was preparing, an affair of such consequence unexpectedly happened, that the Commons were obliged for a time to lay aside all other business. This was the Irish rebellion, the news whereof came to London the 1st of November 1641.

Since the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, when Tirloen's rebellion was happily quelled, the Irish had lived peaceably under the dominion of James I. and Charles I. Not but that the Lords deputies had always an eye over them, considering them as men, whose fidelity was very suspicious; however, they had at least no occasion to complain, that they were worse used than in the former reigns. As to their religion, it is easy to imagine, they had suffered no new troubles under these two Princes, who thought of nothing less, than of persecuting the Catholics. Nevertheless, in March or April this year, 1641, the Irish formed the project of casting off the English yoke, of seizing upon all the fortified places, and of cutting the throats of all the English throughout the whole kingdom. The day appointed for executing this bloody design, was the 23d of October, on which day, they were to rise all over the island. This design was really executed, as projected, and it is said, on that and the following days, above forty thousand English Protestants were massacred by the Irish. But the project of seizing the same day upon the castle of Dublin, where was a great magazine of provisions and stores, was discovered by Owen O'Conally the night before, and prevented by the diligence of the Lords justices of Ireland, who governed in the absence of Robert Sidney, Earl of Leicester, who had been appointed Lord Lieutenant some months before, and was yet in England.

This news being communicated to the Commons by the Lords of the privy council, filled the House with consternation and terror, and at the same time with indignation against the rebels. They immediately turned themselves into a grand committee, and passed the following resolves:

That 50,000*l.* shall be forthwith provided for the service of Ireland; that a conference be had with the Lords, to move them, that a select committee of the members of both Houses may be appointed to go to the city of London, and propose unto them the loan of that sum; that a select committee of both Houses may be named to consider of the affairs of Ireland, and of the sending of men and ammunition from hence into that kingdom; that Owen O'Conally, who discovered this great treason in Ireland, shall have 500*l.* presently paid him, and 200*l.* per annum pension, until provision be made for an inheritance of greater value; that the custody of the Isle of Wight be taken for the present from the Lord Weston, suspected of being a Catholic, and sequestered into another hand; that the persons of Papists of quality in the several counties of this kingdom, wherever they reside, may be secured; that the Lords be desired to join concerning the dissolution of the house of Capuchins, and the speedy sending them away, according to the former desires of this House; that the ambassadors may be sent to from both Houses to deliver up such priests of the King's subjects as are in their houses; that a list be brought in of the Queen's priests, and other her servants; that a proclamation be issued forth, commanding all strangers that are not of the Protestant religion, to deliver in tickets of their names, and an account of their stay here, within two days after the issuing forth of the said proclamation, or else to depart the kingdom forthwith, &c.

The Lords agreed to the proposed loan, and named some of their members to form a committee of both Houses. Whereupon the Commons appointed fifty-two to meet the Lords, and to be a standing committee for the affairs of Ireland.

Two days after the Commons voted again,

That the House holds fit that 20,000*l.* be forthwith supplied for the present occasions of Ireland; that a convenient number of ships shall be provided for the guarding of the sea coast of Ireland; that six thousand foot, and two thousand horse shall be raised with all convenient speed for the present expedition into Ireland; that the Lord Lieutenant shall present to both Houses of Parliament, such officers as he shall think fit to send into Ireland, to command any forces to be transported thither; that the magazines of victuals shall be forthwith provided at West-Chester, to be sent over to Dublin, as the occasions of that kingdom shall require; that the magazines of arms, ammunition, and powder, now in Carlisle, shall be forthwith sent over to Knockfergus in Ireland; that it be referred to the King's council to consider of some fit way, and to present it to the House, for a publication to be made of rewards to be given to such as shall do service in this expedition into Ireland, and for a pardon of such of the rebels as shall come in by a time limited, and of a sum of money to be appointed for a reward of such as shall bring in the heads of such principal rebels as shall be nominated; that letters shall be forthwith sent to the justices in Ireland, to acquaint them how sensible this House is of the affairs of Ireland; that the committee of Irish affairs shall consider how, and in what manner this kingdom shall make use of the friendship and assistance of Scotland in the business of Ireland; that directions shall be given for the drawing of a bill for the pressing of men, for this particular of Ireland.

Some days after both Houses published a declaration, to acquaint the public that they had resolved to assist the King with all their power to reduce the Irish rebels.

The King, who was still in Scotland, had received intelligence of what had passed in the north of Ireland, but did not know that the Irish had miscarried in their design upon the castle of Dublin. He immediately communicated his intelligence to the Parliament of Scotland, and demanded their assistance. The Parliament replied, "That Ireland being dependent on the crown of England, and his Majesty having already written to the Parliament of England, and sent to Ireland for farther information, no other course could be taken, and the rather as the Parliament of England might conceive jealousies; but that after fuller information, if the English should think the assistance of Scotland necessary, it should be ready, as soon as England."

The rebellion daily increased. The English themselves of the Pale joined with the Irish, having pretended for some time to be attached to the interest of England. These English of the Pale were descendents of the ancient conquerors of Ireland, who settled there in the reign of Henry II. and who at the time of the Reformation continued in the Roman Catholic religion. It was therefore necessary to send a strong force into Ireland to reduce the rebels to obedience. And yet, though the letters from the Lords justices for assistance were frequent and pressing, though the rebels continually increased in number and strength, though the King most earnestly pressed both Houses to send men, money, and ammunition to Ireland, though the Parliament shewed an extreme desire to reduce that kingdom, it is certain that the succours sent thither, were but small and fitter to continue than end the war. It would doubtless be thought strange to see so much ardour in words, and so little desire to show it in deeds, if the reason of this conduct was not known.

The disposition of the House of Commons, whilst the King was in Scotland, has been before shown. A resolution was taken to divest him of part of his power. The views of some were only to hinder him from abusing it for the future. Others added to this motive, the design of rendering him unable to oppose the change they were meditating, with respect to the government of the church. The order of the House to the committee to prepare the remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, was a clear evidence, they had some secret design which would show itself in due time. Whilst measures were taking to execute this design, the Irish rose in rebellion, at a time when they seemed to have the least reason, since the government had never been more gentle to them than in the present reign. They massacred in cold blood above forty thousand English Protestants,* and unfortunately for the King, spread spread a report that they had his authority for what they did. They called themselves the Queen's army, and dispersed all over the kingdom, copies of a supposed commission under the great seal, which they pretended to have from the King to authorise them to take arms.* It cannot be denied that all this was capable of making impressions on the minds of those who were already ill-affected to the King, and believed him capable of any thing to avoid the servitude that was preparing for him. Indeed, the sober and most considerate did not think it possible, or even probable, that the King should be willing to have his Protestant subjects of Ireland massacred. But they suspected that this rebellion, raised at such a juncture, was not wholly owing to the discontent of the Irish, and that very possibly the King had excited it, to find the Parliament employment, and divert them from the project they had formed. As to the massacre of the Protestants, they did not believe the King had any hand in it, but imagined it very possible, that after raising the rebellion, it was not in his power to restrain the Irish. The King on his part not knowing what was said against him in England, used his utmost endeavours to clear himself from this black imputation, by pressing the Parliament to send a speedy aid into Ireland. But these solicitations had a quite contrary effect, because it was believed that his aim was to leave England unprovided with troops, and to engage the Parliament in an Irish war, which must have been very expensive. This was the reason that the Commons proceeded with deliberation, and sent but inconsiderable succours into Ireland, being apprehensive, the Irish rebellion was a snare laid for them by the King, to cause them to consume the English troops and money.

* Above one hundred and fifty-four thousand Protestants, were massacred in that kingdom, from the 23d of October, 1641, to the 1st of March following, according to the computation of the priests themselves that were present. But, according to Sir J. Temple there were, since the rebellion first broke out, unto the cessation made September 15, 1643, above three hundred thousand British and Protestants

The pretension of the Irish that they had the King's and Queen's authority, was of very ill consequence to the King. There were but too many who had an ill opinion of his zeal for the Protestant religion, and thought him capable of being induced by the Queen's solicitations to restore the Catholic religion in England. The former Parliaments had discovered their suspicions, and the King, instead of undeceiving them, had given them words only, which were followed with no effects. When therefore the news came, that the Irish Papists were in arms, and had massacred the Protestants, it was very natural to dread the like plot in England, which could not but be extremely prejudicial to the King. Though the Parliament did not seem to regard much the calumny spread against the King, they were full of distrust, and this distrust made them think it not proper to leave England without troops, money, and ammunition, in order to assist Ireland, lest England should be unprovided, in case the same plot was contriving there. It was even the interest of the leading men in the Parliament to feign a greater distrust than they really had, to strengthen the suspicions and fears of such members as were not fully persuaded. This served to convince them how necessary it was to curb the King's power, and render him incapable to execute his designs.

But though the party of those who were for lessening the regal power was numerous in the Parliament, they were not yet in condition to proceed as they pleased. Matters were to be prepared by degrees, one while by cherishing suspicions and fears, another while by engaging the House to take proper steps to lead them to their end, which was not known to all the members.

With this view it was, that under colour of thanking the Scots for their promised assistance to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, and of treating with them about it, they engaged the House to send to the committee in Scotland new instructions very mortifying to the King.

This was properly a preparative to the remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, which was to be brought into the House the first opportunity, and which was indeed read the 22d of November. It met with such strong opposition, that the debates lasted from three in the afternoon till three in the morning.† Many thought it needless to reproach the King with grievances, to the redress whereof he had without solicitation given a full consent, and that besides the uselessness of the remonstrance, it would serve only to open old wounds, to which a cure had been applied, and infallibly make the breach wider between the King and Parliament. But this very reason was precisely that which excited the others to cause the Remonstrance to be approved, because they wanted a dissention between the King and Parliament, in order to obtain the consent of both Houses to the diminution of the regal power.

This resolution was no sooner taken but Mr. Hampden, who was of the victorious party, moved for the immediate printing of the remonstrance, not thinking it necessary to communicate it to the Lords, since it ran only in the name of the Commons. His design was, that it should be dispersed among the people to excite them against the King, which was also the intention of his whole party. This motion, which was contrary to custom, since the remonstrance should have been at least presented to the King, before the publication was deliberated, produced a violent debate in the House, every one plainly perceiving the consequence. But at last, the same party that prevailed in the first, prevailed likewise in the second question, and the remonstrance was ordered to be printed. Some of the opposers offered to enter a protestation against it, but as it was not the custom of the House to admit of protestations, Mr. Palmer, who first cried, I do protest, was sent to the Tower, but was released within a few days, and took his place again in the House.

Three days after, namely, the 25th of November, the King being returned from Scotland, passed through the city of London, and dined at Guild-Hall. He was received in his capital with the same demonstrations of joy, respect, and submission as were given on the like occasions to his most popular predecessors; and had all reason to be pleased with the manner wherein every one strove to do him honour.‡ But the satisfaction he received from these public demonstrations of the affection of the Londoners, lasted not long.

As soon as the King came to Whitehall, the Earl of Essex surrendered his commission of Captain-General of the south part of the kingdom into his hands; and the next day the King dismissed the guards given by the Earl to both Houses at their request. The Commons appeared displeased at it, and desired the Lords to concur with them in petitioning the King, that the guards might be continued till they had satisfied his Majesty of the reasons, why a guard was necessary. The Lords consented to it, and the Earl of Warwick, and the Lord Digby, were ordered to move his Majesty accordingly, but they could not prevail. The King answered, he saw no reason to continue the guard; but however, he would command the Earl of Dorset, to appoint some of the train-bands, only for a few days, to wait on both Houses, and if in that time he should be satisfied there was just reason, he would continue them. Upon this answer, the Commons presented a memorial to the King, containing the reasons why they desired a guard, adding, they would not have it under the command of any person not chosen by themselves.

The Commons insisted no farther on this subject, but within a few days, sent a committee, to present to the King, then at Hampton-Court, the remonstrance, with a petition.§ This was, as it were, the alarm of the discord Protestants cruelly murdered in cold blood, destroyed some other way, or expelled out of their habitations. It seems Cardinal Richelieu was deeply concerned in this massacre.

* Sir Phelim O'Neale, having found a royal patent in Lord Caufield's house, whom he had murdered, tore off the seal, and affixed it to a commission which he had forged for himself.

† Oliver Cromwell told the Lord Falkland, "That if the Remonstrance had been rejected, he would have sold all he had the next morning, and never have seen England more."

‡ Sir Richard Gournay, the Lord Mayor, a man of moderation and authority, promoted these favourable dispositions, and engaged the populace to give these marks of dutiful attachment to the King.

§ This Remonstrance was not addressed to the King; but was openly declared to be an appeal to the people. The harshness of the matter.

discord between the King and the Parliament, as his enemies had plainly foreseen.

No sooner had the Remonstrance of the Commons been published, than the King dispersed an answer to it. In this contest he lay under great disadvantage. Not only the ears of the people were extremely prejudiced against him; but the last topics, upon which he could justify, at least apologize for his former conduct were such as it was not safe or prudent for him at this to employ. So high was the national idolatry towards Parliament, that to blame the past conduct of these assemblies, would have been very ill received by the generality matter, it has been justly observed, was equalled by the severity of the language. It consists of many gross falsehoods, intermingled with some evident truths; malignant insinuations adjoined to open invectives; loud complaints of the past accompanied with jealous prognostications of the future. Whatever unfortunate, whatever invidious, whatever suspicious measure had been embraced by the King, from the commencement of his reign, is insisted on and agravated with merciless rhetoric; the unsuccesful expeditions to Cadiz, and the Isle of Rhé, are mentioned; the sending of ships to France for the suppression of the Hugunots; the forced loans; the illegal confinement of men for not obeying illegal commands; the violent dissolution of four Parliaments; the arbitrary government which always succeeded; the questioning, fining, and imprisoning members for their conduct in the House; the levying of taxes without consent of the Commons; the introducing of superstitious innovations into the church, without authority of law; in short, every thing which, either with or without reason, had given offence, during the course of fifteen years, from the accession of the King to the calling of the present Parliament. And though all these grievances had been already redressed, and even laws enacted for future security against their return; the praise of these advantages was ascribed not to the King, but to the Parliament who had extorted his consent to such salutary statutes. Their own merits too, they asserted, towards the King, were no less eminent than towards the people. Though they had seized his whole revenue, rendered it totally precarious, and made even their own temporary supplies be paid to their own commissioners, who were independent of him; they pretended they had liberally supported him in his necessities. By an insult still more egregious, the very giving of money to the Scots, for levying war against their sovereign, they represented as an instance of their duty towards him. And all their grievances, they said, which amounted to no less than a total subversion of the constitution, proceeded entirely from the form and combination of a Popish faction, who had ever swayed the King's counsels, who had endeavoured by an uninterrupted effort, to introduce their superstition into England and Scotland, and who had now, at last, excited an open rebellion in Ireland. This very important document is here given at length.

Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, presented to the King from the House of Commons, the 1st of December, 1641.

"The Commons in this present Parliament assembled, having with much earnestness and faithfulness of affection and zeal to the public good of this kingdom, and his Majesty's honour and service, for the space of twelve months, wrestled with great dangers and fears, the pressing miseries and calamities, the various distempers and disorders which had not only assaulted, but even overwhelmed and extinguished the liberty, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom, the comfort and hope of all his Majesty's good subjects, and exceedingly weakened and undermined the foundation and strength of his own royal throne.

"Do yet find an abounding malignity and opposition in those parties and factions who have been the cause of those evils, and do still labour to cast aspersions upon that which hath been done, and to raise many difficulties for the hindrance of that which remains yet undone, and to foment jealousies betwixt the King and Parliament, that so they may deprive him and his people of the fruit of his own gracious intentions, and their humble desires of procuring the public peace, safety, and happiness of this realm; for the preventing of those miserable effects, which such malicious endeavours may produce, we have thought good to declare:

"The root and growth of these mischievous designs.

"The maturity and ripeness to which they have attained before the beginning of the Parliament.

"The effectual means which have been used for the extirpation of those dangerous evils, and the progress which hath therein been made by his Majesty's goodness, and the wisdom of the Parliament.

"The ways of obstruction and opposition, by which that progress hath been interrupted.

"The courses to be taken for the removing those obstacles, and for the accomplishing of our most dutiful and faithful intention and endeavours of restoring and establishing the ancient honour, greatness, and security of this crown and nation.

"The root of all this mischief we find to be a malignant and pernicious design of subverting the fundamental laws and principles of government, upon which the religion and justice of this kingdom are firmly established. The actors and promoters hereof have been,

"I. The jesuited papists, who hate the laws as they are the obstacles of that change and subversion of religion, which they so much long for.

"II. The Bishops, and the corrupt part of the clergy, who cherish formality and superstition, as the natural effects, and more probable supports of their own ecclesiastical tyranny and usurpation.

"III. Such counsellors and courtiers, as, for private ends, have engaged themselves to further the interests of some foreign Princes, or States, to the prejudice of his Majesty, and the State at home.

"The common principles by which they moulded and governed all their particular counsels and actions were these.

"First, to maintain continual differences and discontents betwixt the King and the people, upon questions of prerogative and liberty, that so they might have the advantage of siding with him, and under the notions of men addicted to his service, gain to themselves and their parties the places of the greatest trust and power in the kingdom.

"A second, to suppress the purity and power of religion, and such persons as were best affected to it, as being contrary to their own ends, and the greatest impediment to that change which they thought to introduce.

"A third, to conjoin those parties of the kingdom which were most propitious to their own ends, and to divide those who were most opposite, which consisted in many particular observations.

"To cherish the Arminian party in those points, wherein they agree with the papists to multiply and enlarge the difference between the common protestants, and those whom they call puritans, to introduce and countenance such opinions and ceremonies as are fittest for accommodation with popery, to increase and maintain ignorance, looseness, and prophaneness in the people. That of those three parties, Papists, Arminians, and Libertines, they might compose a body fit to act such counsels and resolutions, as were most conducible to their own ends.

"A fourth, to disaffect the King to Parliaments by slanders and false imputations, and by putting them upon other ways of supply, which in shew and appearance were fuller of advantage than the ordinary course of subsidies, though in truth they brought more loss than gain both to the King and people, and have caused the great distractions under which we both suffer.

"As in all compounded bodies the operations are qualified according to the predominant element, so in this mixt party, the jesuited counsels being most active and prevailing, may easily be discovered to have had the greatest sway in all their determinations, and if they be not prevented, are likely to devour the rest, or to turn them into their own nature.

"In the beginning of his Majesty's reign, the party began to revive and flourish again, having been somewhat damped by the breach with Spain in the last year of King James, and by his Majesty's marriage with France; the interests and counsels of that State being not so contrary to the good of religion, and the prosperity of this kingdom, as those of Spain; and the Papists of England having been ever more addicted to Spain than France, yet they still retained a purpose and resolution to weaken the Protestant parties in all parts, and even in France, whereby to make way for the change of religion, which they intended at home.

"I. The first effect and evidence of their recovery and strength, was the dissolution of the Parliament at Oxford, after there had been given two subsidies to his Majesty, and before they received relief in any one grievance, many other more miserable effects followed.

"II. The loss of the Rochelle fleet, by the help of our shipping, set forth and delivered over to the French, in opposition to the advice of Parliament, which left that town without defence by sea, and made way, not only to the loss of that important place, but likewise to the loss of all the strength and security of the Protestant religion in France.

"III. The diverting his Majesty's course of wars from the West-Indies, which was the most facile and hopeful way for this kingdom to prevail against the Spaniards, to an expenceful and unsuccessful attempt upon Calais, which was so ordered as if it had rather been intended to make us weary of war, than to prosper it.

"IV. The precipitate breach with France, by taking their ships to a great value, without making recompence to the English, whose goods were thereupon imbarred, and confiscate in that kingdom.

"V. The peace with Spain, without consent of Parliament, contrary to the promise of King James to both Houses, whereby the Palatine's cause was deserted and left to chargeable and hopeless treaties, which, for the most part, were managed by those, who might justly be suspected to be no friends to that cause.

"VI. The charging of the kingdom with billeted soldiers in all parts of it, and that concomitant design of German horse, that the land might either submit with fear, or be enforced with rigour to such arbitrary contributions as should be required of them.

"VII. The dissolving of the Parliament in the second year of his Majesty's reign, after a declaration of their intent to grant five subsidies.

"VIII. The exacting of the like proportion of five subsidies after the Parliament was dissolved, by commission of loan; and divers gentlemen and others imprisoned for not yielding to pay that loan, whereby many of them contracted such sicknesses as cost them their lives.

"IX. Great sums of money required and raised by privy seals.

"X. An unjust and pernicious attempt to extort great payments from the subject by way of excise, and a commission issued under the seal for that purpose.

"XI. The Petition of Right, which was granted in full Parliament, blasted, with an illegal declaration to make it destructive to itself, to the power of Parliament, to the liberty of the subject, and to that purpose printed with it; and the petition made of no use but to shew the bold and presumptuous injustice of such ministers as durst break the laws, and suppress the liberties of the kingdom, after they had been so solemnly and evidently declared.

"XII. Another Parliament dissolved 4. Car. the privilege of Parliament broken, by imprisoning divers members of the House, detaining them close prisoners for many months together, without the liberty of using books, pen, ink, or paper, denying them all the lity of the people. So loud were the complaints against regal usurpations, that, had the King asserted the prerogative of supplying, by his own authority, the deficiencies of government, arising from the obstinacy of the Commons, he would have encreased the clamours with which the whole nation already resounded. Charles, therefore, contented himself with observing in general, that even during that period so much complained of, the people enjoyed a great measure of happiness, not only comparatively, in respect of their neighbours, but even in respect of those times which were justly accounted the most fortunate. He made warm protestations comforts of life, all means of preservation of health, not permitting their wives to come to them, even in time of their sickness.

" XIII. And for the compleating that cruelty, after many years spent in such miserable durance, depriving them of the necessary means of spiritual consolation; not suffering them to go abroad to enjoy God's ordinances in God's house, or God's ministers to come to them to minister comfort to them in their private chambers.

" XIV. And to keep them still in this oppressed condition, not admitting them to be bailed according to law, yet vexing them with informations in inferior courts, sentencing and fining some of them for matters done in Parliament; and extorting the payments of those fines from them, enforcing others to put in security of good behaviour before they could be released.

" XV. The imprisonment of the rest, which refused to be bound, still continued, which might have been perpetual, if necessity had not the last year brought another Parliament to relieve them, of whom one (a) died, by the cruelty and harshness of his imprisonment, which would admit of no relaxation, notwithstanding the imminent danger of his life did sufficiently appear by the declaration of his physician. And his release, or at least his refreshment, was sought by many humble petitions. And his blood still cries either for vengeance or repentance, of those ministers of state who have at once obstructed the course both of his Majesty's justice and mercy.

" XVI. Upon the dissolution of both these Parliaments, untrue and scandalous declarations were published to asperse their proceedings, and some of their members, unjustly; to make them odious, and colour the violence which was used against them. Proclamations set out to the same purpose; and to the great dejecting the hearts of the people, forbidding them even to speak of Parliaments.

" XVII. After the breach of the Parliament in the fourth of his Majesty, injustice, oppression and violence, broke in upon us, without any restraint or moderation, and yet the first project was the great sums exacted through the whole kingdom, for default of knighthood, which seemed to have some colour and shadow of a law, yet if it be rightly examined by that obsolete law which was pretended for it, it will be found to be against all the rules of justice, both in respect of the persons charged, the proportion of the fines demanded, and the absurd and unreasonable manner of their proceedings.

" XVIII. Tonnage and poundage have been received without colour or pretence of law: many other heavy impositions continued against law; and some so unreasonable, that the sum of the charge exceeds the value of the goods.

" XIX. The book of rates lately inhanced to a high portion; and such merchants that would not submit to their illegal and unreasonable payments, were vexed and oppressed above measure; and the ordinary course of justice, the common birth-right of the subjects of England, wholly obstructed and taken from them.

" XX. And although this was taken on pretence of guarding the seas, yet a new and unheard of tax of ship money was devised, and upon the same pretence. By both which there was charged upon the subject near 700,000*l.* some years; and yet the merchants have been left so naked to the violence of the Turkish pirates, that many great ships of value, and thousands of his Majesty's subjects, have been taken by them, and do still remain in miserable slavery.

" XXI. The enlargement of forests, contrary to Charta de Foresta, and the composition thereupon.

" XXII. The exactions of coat and conduct money, and divers other military charges.

" XXIII. The taking away the arms of the trained bands of divers counties.

" XXIV. The desperate design of engrossing all the gun powder into one hand, keeping it in the Tower of London, and setting so high a rate upon it, that the poorer sort were not able to buy it; nor could any have it without license; thereby to leave the several parts of the kingdom destitute of their necessary defence; and by selling so dear that which was sold, to make an unlawful advantage of it, to the great charge and detriment of the subject.

" XXV. The general destruction of the King's timber, especially that in the forest of Dean, sold to Papists, which was the best storehouse of this kingdom for the maintenance of our shipping.

" XXVI. The taking away of men's right under colour of the King's title to land, between high and low water marks.

" XXVII. The monopolies of soap, salt, wine, leather, sea-coal, and in a manner, of all things of most common and necessary use.

" XXVIII. The restraint of the liberties of the subjects in their habitations, trades, and other interests.

" XXIX. Their vexation and oppression by purveyors, clerks of the market, and salt-petre men.

" XXX. The sale of pretended nuisances, buildings in and about London.

" XXXI. Conversion of arable into pasture, continuance of pasture, under the name of depopulation, have driven many millions out of the subjects' purses, without any considerable profit to his Majesty.

" XXXII. Large quantities of common and several grounds have been taken from the subject, by colour of the statute of improvement, and by abuse of the commission of sewers, without their consent, and against it.

" XXXIII. And not only private interest, but also public faith hath been broken, in seizing of the money and bullion in the mint, and the whole kingdom like to be robbed at once, in that abominable project of brass money.

" XXXIV. Great numbers of his Majesty's subjects, for refusing those unlawful charges, have been vexed with long and expensive suits; some fined and censured, others committed to long and hard imprisonments and confinements, to the loss of health in many, of life in some; and others have had their houses broken up, their goods seized, some have been restrained from their lawful callings.

" XXXV. Ships have been interrupted in their voyages, surprised at sea in hostile manner by projectors, as by a common enemy.

" XXXVI. Merchants prohibited to unlade their goods in such ports as were for their own advantage, and forced to bring them to those places which were much for the advantage of the monopolizers and projectors.

" XXXVII. The court of Star Chamber hath abounded in extravagant censures, not only for the maintenance and improvement of monopolies, and other unlawful taxes, but for divers other causes, where there hath been no offence, or very small; whereby his Majesty's subjects have been oppressed by grievous fines, imprisonments, stigmatizing, mutilations, whippings, pillories, gags, confinements, and banishments; after so rigid a manner, as hath not only deprived men of the society of their friends, exercise of their professions, comfort of books, use of paper and ink, but even violated that near union which God hath established between men and their wives, by forced and constrained separation, whereby they have been bereaved of the comfort and conversation one of another for many years together, without hope of relief, if God had not, by his over-ruling providence, given some interruption to the prevailing power and counsel of those, who were the authors and promoters of such peremptory and heady courses.

" XXXVIII. Judges have been put out of their places for refusing to do against their oath and consciences: others have been so awed that they durst not do their duties, and the better to hold a rod over them, the clause, Quam diu se bene gesserit, was left out of their patents, and a new clause, Durante bene placito, inserted.

" XXXIX. Lawyers have been checked for being faithful to their clients: solicitors and attorneys have been threatened, and some punished for following lawful suits. And by this means all the approaches to justice were interrupted and forecluded.

" XL. New oaths have been forced upon the subject against law.

" XLI. New judicatories erected without law. The council table have by their orders offered to bind the subjects in their freeholds, estates, suits, and actions.

" XLII. The pretended court of the Earl Marshal was arbitrary and illegal in its being and proceedings.

" XLIII. The chancery, exchequer chamber, court of wards, and other English courts, have been grievous in exceeding their jurisdiction.

" XLIV. The estate of many families weakened, and some ruined by excessive fines, exacted from them for compositions of wardships.

" XLV. All leases of above one hundred years made to draw on wardship contrary to law.

" XLVI. Undue proceedings used in the finding of offices, to make the jury find for the King.

" XLVII. The common law courts, seeing all men more inclined to seek justice there, where it may be fitted to their own desires, are known frequently to forsake the rules of the common law, and straying beyond their bounds, under pretence of equity, to do injustice.

" XLVIII. Titles of honour, judicial places, serjeantships at law, and other offices have been sold for great sums of money; whereby the common justice of the kingdom hath been much endangered, not only by opening a way of employment, in places of great trust and advantage to men of weak parts, but also by giving occasion to bribery, extortion, and partiality; it seldom happening that places ill-gotten are well used.

" XLIX. Commissions have been granted for examining the excess of fees: and when great exactions have been discovered, compositions have been made with delinquents, not only for the time past, but likewise for immunity, and security in offending for the time to come, which under colour of remedy, hath but confirmed and increased the grievance to the subject.

" L. The usual course of pricking sheriffs, not observed, but many times sheriffs made in an extraordinary way, sometimes as a punishment and charge unto them, sometimes such were pricked out as would be instruments to execute whatsoever they would have to be done.

" LI. The Bishops and the rest of the clergy, did triumph in the suspensions, excommunications, deprivations, and degradations of divers painful, learned, and pious ministers, in the vexation and grievous oppressions of great numbers of his Majesty's good subjects.

" LII. The high commission grew to such excess of sharpness and severity, as was not much less than the Romish inquisition, and yet in many cases, by the Archbishop's power, was made much more heavy,

tations of sincerity on the Reformed religion; he promised indulgence to tender consciences, with regard to the ceremonies of the church; he mentioned his great concessions to national liberty; he blamed the infamous libels every where dispersed against his person and the national religion; he complained of the general reproaches thrown out in the Remonstrance, with regard to ill councils, though he had protected no minister from Parliamentary justice, retained no unpopular servant, and conferred offices on no one who enjoyed not a high character and estimation in the public. "If, notwithstanding this" he adds, "any malignant party shall take heavy, being assisted and strengthened by authority of the council-table.

"LIII. The Bishops and their courts were as eager in the country; although their jurisdiction could not reach so high in rigour and extremity of punishment, yet were they no less grievous in respect of the generality and multiplicity of vexations, which lighting upon the meaner sort of tradesmen and artificers, did impoverish many thousands;

"LIV. And so afflict and trouble others, that great numbers, to avoid their miseries, departed out of the kingdom; some into New England, and other parts of America, others into Holland:

"LV. Whither they have transported their manufactures of cloth; which is not only a loss by diminishing the present stock of the kingdom, but a great mischief by impairing and endangering the loss of that peculiar trade of clothing, which hath been a plentiful fountain of wealth and honour to this nation.

"LVI. Those were fittest for ecclesiastical preferments, and soonest obtained it, who were most officious in promoting superstition, most virulent in railing against godliness and honesty.

"LVII. The most public and solemn sermons before his Majesty, were, either to advance prerogative above law, and decry the property of the subject, or full of such kind of invective;

"LVIII. Whereby they might make those odious who sought to maintain the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom; and such men were sure to be weeded out of the commission of the peace, and out of all other employments of power in the government of the country.

"LIX. Many noble persons were counsellors in name, but the power and authority remained in a few of such as were most addicted to this party: whose resolutions and determinations were brought to the table for countenance and execution, and not for debate and deliberation; and no man could offer to oppose them without disgrace and hazard to himself.

"LX. Nay, all those that did not wholly concur, and actively contribute to the furtherance of their designs, though, otherwise, persons of never so great honour and abilities, were so far from being employed in any place of trust and power, that they were neglected, discountenanced, and upon all occasions injured and oppressed.

"LXI. This faction was grown to that height and entireness of power, that now they began to think of finishing of their work, which consisted of these three parts.

"LXII. 1. The government must be set free from all restraint of laws concerning our persons and estates.

"LXIII. 2. There must be a conjunction between Papists and Protestants in doctrine, discipline, and ceremonies, only it must not yet be called Popery.

"LXIV. 3. The Puritans, under which name they include all those that desire to preserve the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and to maintain religion in the power of it, must be either rooted out of the kingdom with force, or driven out with fear.

"LXV. For the effecting of this, it was thought necessary to reduce Scotland to such Popish superstitions and innovations, as might make them apt to join with England in that great change which was intended.

"LXVI. Whereupon new canons and a new liturgy were prest upon them; and when they refused to admit of them, an army was raised to force them to it, towards which the Clergy and the Papists were very forward in their contribution.

"LXVII. The Scots likewise raised an army for their defence.

"LXVIII. And when both armies were come together, and ready for a bloody encounter, his Majesty's own gracious disposition, and the counsel of the English nobility, and dutiful submission of the Scots, did so far prevail against the evil counsel of others, that a pacification was made, and his Majesty returned with peace and much honour to London.

"LXIX. The unexpected reconciliation was most acceptable to all the kingdom except to the malignant party; whereof the Archbishop and the Earl of Strafford being heads, they and their faction began to inveigh against the peace, and to aggravate the proceedings of the states, which so incensed his Majesty, that he forthwith prepared again for war.

"LXX. And such was their confidence, that having corrupted and distempered the whole frame and government of the kingdom, they did now hope to corrupt that which was the only means to restore all to a right frame and temper again.

"LXXI. To which end they persuaded his Majesty to call a Parliament, not to seek counsel and advice of them, but to draw countenance and supply from them, and to engage the whole kingdom in their quarrel.

"LXXII. And in the mean time, continued all their unjust levies of money, resolving either to make the Parliament pliant to their will, and to establish mischief by a law, or else to break it, and with more colour to go on by violence, to take what they could not obtain by consent. The ground alledged for the justification of this war was this:

"LXXIII. That the undutiful demands of the Parliaments in Scotland was a sufficient reason for his Majesty to take arms against them, without hearing the reason of those demands, and thereupon a new army was prepared against them; their ships were seized in all parts both of England and Ireland, and at sea; their petitions rejected, their commissioners refused audience.

"LXXIV. This whole kingdom most miserably distempered with levies of men and money; and imprisonments of those who denied to submit to those levies.

"LXXV. The Earl of Strafford passed into Ireland, caused the Parliament there to declare against the Scots, to give four subsidies towards that war; and to engage themselves, their lives and fortunes for the prosecution of it; and gave directions for an army of eight thousand foot, and one thousand horse, to be levied there, which were for the most part papists.

"LXXVI. The Parliament met upon the 13th of April 1640. The Earl of Strafford, and Archbishop of Canterbury, with their party, so prevailed with his Majesty, that the House of Commons was pressed to yield a supply for maintenance of the war with Scotland, before they had provided any relief for the great and pressing grievances of the people; which being against the fundamental privilege and proceeding of Parliament, was yet in humble respect to his Majesty so far admitted, as that they agreed to take the matter of supply into consideration, and two several days it was debated.

"LXXVII. Twelve subsidies were demanded for the release of ship-money alone: a third day was appointed for conclusion, when the heads of that party began to fear, the people might close with the King, in satisfying his desires of money: but that withal, they were like to blast their malicious designs against Scotland, finding them very much indisposed to give any countenance to that war.

"LXXVIII. Thereupon they wickedly advised the King to break off the Parliament, and to return to the ways of confusion, in which their own evil intentions were most like to prosper and succeed.

"LXXIX. After the Parliament ended, the 5th of May 1640, this party grew so bold, as to counsel the King to supply himself out of his subjects' estates, by his own power, at his own will, without their consent.

"LXXX. The very next day, some members of both Houses had their studies and cabinets, yea their pockets searched: another of them not long after was committed close prisoner, for not delivering some petitions which he received by authority of that House.

"LXXXI. And if harsher courses were intended (as was reported) it is very probable, that the sickness of the Earl of Strafford, and the tumultuous rising in Southwark and about Lambeth, were the causes that such violent intentions were not brought to execution.

"LXXXII. A false and scandalous declaration against the House of Commons was published in his Majesty's name, which yet wrought little effect with the people, but only to manifest the imprudence of those who were authors of it.

"LXXXIII. A forced loan of money was attempted in the city of London.

"LXXXIV. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen in their several wards, enjoined to bring in a list of the names of such persons as they judged fit to lend, and of the sum they should lend, and such Aldermen as refused so to do were committed to prison.

"LXXXV. The Archbishop, and the other Bishops and clergy continued the convocation, and by a new commission turned it into a provincial synod, in which, by an unheard-of presumption, they made canons that contain in them many matters, contrary to the King's prerogative; to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm; to the right of Parliaments; to the property and liberty of the subject; and matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence; thereby establishing their own usurpations, justifying their altar-worship, and those other superstitious innovations, which they formerly introduced without warrant of law.

"LXXXVI. They imposed a new oath upon divers of his Majesty's subjects both ecclesiastical and lay, for maintenance of their own tyranny, and laid a great tax upon the clergy for supply of his Majesty, and generally they shewed themselves very affectionate to the war with Scotland, which was by some of them stiled Bellum Episcopale, and a prayer composed, and enjoined to be read in churches, calling the Scots rebels, to put the two nations in blood, and make them irreconcileable.

"LXXXVII. All those pretended canons and constitutions were armed with the several censures of suspension, excommunication, deprivation, by which they would have thrust out all the good ministers, and most of the well-affected people of the kingdom, and left an easy passage to their own design of reconciliation with Rome.

"LXXXVIII. The popish party enjoyed such exemptions from penal laws, as amounted to a toleration, besides many other encouragements and court-favours.

"LXXXIX. They had a Secretary of State, Sir Francis Windebank, a powerful agent for speeding all their desires.

"XC. A Pope's nuncio residing here, to act and govern them according to such influences as he received from Rome, and to intercede for them with the most powerful concurrence of the foreign Princes of that religion.

"XCI. By his authority the papists of all sorts, Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy were convocated after the manner of a Parliament.

"XCII. New jurisdictions were erected of Romish Archbishops, taxes levied, another state moulded within this state, independent in government, contrary in interest and affection, secretly corrupting the ignorant or negligent professors of our religion, and closely uniting and combining themselves against such as were found in this posture, waiting for an opportunity by force to destroy those whom they could not hope to seduce.

"XCIII. For the effecting whereof, they were strengthened with arms take heart, and be unwilling to sacrifice the peace and happiness of their country to their own sinister ends and ambition, under whatever pretence of religion and conscience; if they shall not endeavour to lesson my reputation and interest, and to weaken my lawful power and authority; if they shall attempt, by discountenancing the present laws, to lessen the bands of government, that all disorder and confusion may break in upon us; I doubt not but God, in his good time, will discover them to me, and that the wisdom and energy of my high court of Parliament will join with me in their suppression and punishment."

arms and munition, encouraged by superstitious prayers, enjoined by the nuncio, to be weekly made for the prosperity of some great design.

" XCIV. And such power had they at court, that secretly a commission was issued out, or intended to be issued to some great man of that profession, for the levying of soldiers, and to command and employ them according to private instructions, which we doubt were framed for the advantage of those who were the contrivers of them.

" XCV. His Majesty's treasure was consumed, his revenue anticipated.

" XCVI. His servants and officers compelled to lend great sums of money.

" XCVII. Multitudes were called to the council-table, who were tired with long attendances there for refusing illegal payments.

" XCVIII. The prisons were filled with their commitments: many of the sheriffs summoned into the Star-Chamber; and some imprisoned for not being quick enough in levying the ship-money; the people languished under grief and fear; no visible hope being left but in desperation.

" XCIX. The nobility began to be weary of their silence and patience, and sensible of the duty and trust which belongs to them; and thereupon some of the most ancient of them did petition his Majesty at such a time, when evil counsellors were so strong, that they had occasion to expect more hazard to themselves, than redress of those public evils for which they interceded.

" C. Whilst the kingdom was in this agitation and distemper, the Scots restrained in their trades, impoverished by the loss of many of their ships, bereaved of all possibility of satisfying his Majesty by any naked supplications, entered with a powerful army into the kingdom, and without any hostile act or spoil in the country they passed, more than forcing a passage over the Tyne at Newburne near Newcastle, possessed themselves of Newcastle; and had a fair opportunity to press on further upon the King's army.

" CI. But duty and reverence to his Majesty, and brotherly love to the English nation, made them stay there, whereby the King had leisure to entertain better counsels.

" CII. Wherein God so blessed and directed him, that he summoned the great council of Peers to meet at York upon the 24th of September, and there declared a Parliament, to begin the 3d of November then following.

" CIII. The Scots, the first day of the great council, presented an humble petition to his Majesty, whereupon the treaty was appointed at Rippon.

" CIV. A present cessation of arms agreed upon, and the full conclusion of all differences referred to the wisdom and care of the Parliament.

" CV. At our first meeting, all oppositions seemed to vanish, the mischiefs were so evident, which those evil counsellors produced, that no man durst stand up to defend them, yet the work itself afforded difficulty enough.

" CVI. The multiplied evils and corruptions of sixteen years, strengthened by custom and authority, and the concurrent interest of many powerful delinquents, were now to be brought to judgment and reformation.

" CVII. The King's household was to be provided for; they had brought him to that want, that he could not supply his ordinary and necessary expences without the assistance of his people.

" CVIII. Two armies were to be paid, which amounted very near to eighty thousand pounds a month.

" CIX. The people were to be tenderly charged, having been formerly exhausted with many burthensome projects.

" CX. The difficulties seemed to be insuperable, which by the divine providence we have overcome. The contrarieties incompatible, which yet in a great measure we have reconciled.

" CXI. Six subsidies have been granted, and a bill of poll-money, (a) which if it be duly levied, may equal six subsidies more, in all six hundred thousand pounds.

" CXII. Besides, we have contracted a debt to the Scots of two hundred and twenty thousand pounds; yet God hath so blessed the endeavours of this Parliament, that the kingdom is a great gainer by all these charges.

" CXIII. The ship-money is abolished, which cost the kingdom above two hundred thousand pounds a year.

" CXIV. The coat and conduct-money, and other military charges are taken away, which in many counties amounted to little less than the ship-money.

" CXV. The monopolies are all suppressed, whereof some few did prejudice the subject above a million yearly.

" CXVI. The soap an hundred thousand pounds.

" CXVII. The wine, three hundred thousand pounds.

" CXVIII. The leather must needs exceed both, and salt could be no less than that.

" CXIX. Besides the inferior monopolies, which if they could be exactly computed, would make up a great sum.

" CXX. That which is more beneficial than all this, is; that the root of these evils is taken away, which was the arbitrary power pretended to be in his Majesty, of taxing the subject, or charging their estates without consent in Parliament, which is now declared to be against law, by the judgment of both Houses, and likewise by an act of Parliament.

" CXXI. Another step of great advantage is this, the living grievances, the evil counsellors and actors of these mischiefs have been so quelled;

" CXXII. By the justice done upon the Earl of Strafford, the flight of the Lord Finch, and Secretary Windebank;

" CXXIII. The accusation and imprisonment of the Archbishop of Canterbury, of Judge Berkley; And,

" CXXIV. The impeachment of divers other Bishops and Judges, that is like not only to be an ease to the present times, but a preservation to the future.

" The discontinuance of Parliaments is prevented by the bill for a Triennial Parliament, and the abrupt dissolution of this Parliament by another bill, by which it is provided, it shall not be dissolved or adjourned without the consent of both Houses.

" CXXVI. Which two laws well considered, may be thought more advantageous than all the former, because they secure a full operation of the present remedy, and afford a perpetual spring of remedies for the future.

" CXXVII. The Star-Chamber;

" CXXVIII. The High-Commission;

" CXXIX. The courts of the president and council in the north, were so many forges of misery, and oppression, and violence, are all taken away, whereby men are more secured in their persons, liberties, and estates, than they could by any law or example, for the regulation of those courts of terror of the judges.

" CXXX. The immoderate power of the council-table, and the excessive abuse of that power is so ordered and restrained, that we may well hope, that no such things as were frequently done by them, to the prejudice of the public liberty, will appear in future times but only in stories, to give us and our posterity more occasion to praise God for his Majesty's goodness, and the faithful endeavours of this Parliament.

" CXXXI. The canons and power of canon-making are blasted by the votes of both Houses.

" CXXXII. The exorbitant power of the Bishops and their courts are much abated, by some provisions in the bill against the high-commission courts, the authors of the many innovations in doctrine and ceremonies.

" CXXXIII. The ministers that have been scandalous in their lives, have been so terrified by just complaints and accusation, that we may well hope they will be more modest for the time to come; either inwardly convicted by the sight of their own folly, or outwardly restrained by the fear of punishment.

" CXXXIV. The forests are by a good law reduced to their right bounds.

" CXXXV. The encroachments and oppressions of the Stannary court, (b) the extortions of the clerk of the market;

" CXXXVI. And the compulsion of the subject, to receive the Order of Knighthood against his will, paying of fines for not receiving it; and the vexatious proceedings thereupon for levying of those fines, are by other beneficial laws reformed and prevented.

" CXXXVII. Many excellent laws and provisions are in preparation for removing the inordinate power, vexation, and usurpations of Bishops; for reforming the pride and idleness of many of the clergy; for easing the people of unnecessary ceremonies in religion; for censuring and removing unworthy and unprofitable ministers, and for maintaining godly and diligent preachers through the kingdom.

" CXXXVIII. Other things of main importance for the good of this kingdom are in proposition, though little could hitherto be done in regard of the many other more pressing businesses, which yet before the end of this session we hope may receive some progress and perfection.

" CXXXIX. The establishing and ordering the King's revenue, that so the abuse of officers, and superfluity of expences may be cut off, and the necessary disbursements for his Majesty's honour, the defence and government of the kingdom, may more certainly be provided for.

" CXL. The regulating of courts of justice, and abridging both the delays and charges of law suits.

" CXLI. The settling of some good courses for preventing the exportation of gold and silver, and the inequality of exchanges between us and other nations, for the advancing of native commodities, increase of our manufactories, and well ballancing of trade, whereby the stock of the kingdom may be increased, or at least kept from impairing, as through neglect hereof it hath done for many years last past:

" CXLII. Improving the herring fishing upon our own coasts, which will be of mighty use in the employment of the poor, and a plentiful nursery of mariners, for enabling the kingdom in any great action.

" CXLIII. The oppositions, obstructions, and other difficulties

---

(b) Courts, wherein affairs relating to the tinners, and tin-mines, are decided. So called from the Latin word, Stannum.

Next day, the second of December, the King coming to the Parliament, the Speaker presented to him the bill for tunnage and poundage for some months only, wherein the King expressly owned, he had till then levied these duties without a legal power. He made on this occasion, a fine speech, full of his Majesty's praises for his goodness and affection to his people. After the Speaker had concluded, his Majesty addressed both Houses; particularly recommended the state of Ireland to the consideration of Parliament; and explicitly declared, that he sought his people's happiness; for their flourishing was his greatest glory, and their affections were his greatest strength.

It was not without great reason that the King resolved to wherewith we have been encountered, and which still lie in our way with some strength, and much obstinacy, are these; the malignant party, whom we have formerly described to be the actors and promoters of all our misery, they have taken heart again:

" CXLIV. They have been able to prefer some of their own factors and agents to degrees of honour, to places of trust and employment, even during the Parliament:

" CXLV. They have endeavoured to work in his Majesty ill impressions and opinions of our proceedings, as if we had altogether done our own work, and not his: and had obtained from him many things very prejudicial to the crown, both in respect of prerogative and profit.

" CXLVI. To wipe out this slander, we think good only to say thus much; that all that we have done is for his Majesty, his greatness, honour, and support, when we yield to give twenty-five thousand pounds a month for the relief of the northern counties; this was given to the King, for he was bound to protect his subjects.

" CXLVII. They were his Majesty's evil counsellors, and their ill instruments, that were actors in those grievances which brought in the Scots.

" CXLVIII. And if his Majesty please to force those who were the authors of this war, to make satisfaction, as he might justly and easily do, it seems very reasonable, that the people might well be excused from taking upon them this burden, being altogether innocent, and free from being any cause of it.

" CXLIX. When we undertook the charge of the army, which cost above 50,000*l.* a month, was not this given to the King? Was it not his Majesty's army? Were not all the commanders under contract with his Majesty at higher rates, and greater wages than ordinary.

" CL. And have not we taken upon us to discharge all the brotherly assistance of three hundred thousand pounds, which we gave the Scots? Was it not toward repair of those damages and losses which they received from the King's ships, and from his ministers?

" CLI. These three particulars amount to above eleven hundred thousand pounds.

" CLII. Besides his Majesty hath received, by impositions upon merchandise, at least four hundred thousand pounds.

" CLIII. So that his Majesty hath had out of the subjects' purse, since the Parliament began, one million and a half; and yet these men can be so impudent, as to tell his Majesty, that we have done nothing for him.

" CLIV. As to the second branch of this slander, we acknowledge with much thankfulness, that his Majesty hath passed more good bills to the advantage of the subjects, than have been in many ages.

" CLV. But withal, we cannot forget that those venomous counsels did manifest themselves in some endeavours to hinder these good acts.

" CLVI. And for both Houses of Parliament we may with truth and modesty say thus much: that we have ever been careful not to desire any thing that should weaken the crown, either in just profit or useful power.

" CLVII. The triennial Parliament, for the matter of it, doth not extend to so much, as by law we ought to have required, there being two statutes still in force for a Parliament to be once a year, and for the manner of it, it is in the King's power, that it shall never take effect, if he, by a timely summons, shall prevent any other way of assembling.

" CLVIII. In the bill for continuance of this present Parliament, there seems to be some restraint of the royal power in dissolving of Parliaments, not to take it out of the crown, but to suspend the execution of it for this time and occasion only; which was so necessary for the King's own security, and the public peace, that without it we could not have undertaken any of these great charges, but must have left both the armies to disorder, and confusion, and the whole kingdom to blood and rapine.

" CLIX. The Star Chamber was much more fruitful in oppression than in profit, the great fines being for the most part given away, and the rest stalled at long times.

" CLX. The fines of the high commission were in themselves unjust, and seldom or never came into the King's purse. These four bills are particularly and more specially instanced.

" CLXI. In the rest there will not be found so much as a shadow of prejudice to the crown.

" CLXII. They have sought to diminish our reputation with the people, and to bring them out of love with Parliaments.

" CLXIII. The aspersions which they have attempted this way have been such as these;

" CLXIV. That we have spent much time and done little, especially in those grievances which concern religion;

" CLXV. That the Parliament is a burthen to the kingdom, by the abundance of protections which hinder justice and trade, and by many subsidies granted, much more heavy than any formerly endured.

" CLXVI. To which there is a ready answer, if the time spent in this Parliament be considered in relation backward to long growth and deep root of those grievances which we have removed, to the powerful supports of those delinquents, which we have pursued, to the great necessities and other charges of the common-wealth, for which we have provided.

" CLXVII. Or if it be considered in relation forward to many advantages, which not only the present, but future ages are like to reap by the good laws, and other proceedings in this Parliament; we doubt not but it will be thought by all indifferent judgments, that our time hath been much better employed, than in a far greater proportion of time in many former Parliaments put together, and the charges which have been laid upon the subject, and the other inconveniences which they have borne, will seem very light in respect of the benefit they have and may receive.

" CLXVIII. And for the matter of protection, the Parliament is so sensible of it, that therein they intended to give them whatsoever ease may stand with honour and justice, and are in a way of passing a bill to give them satisfaction.

" CLXIX. They have sought by many subtle practices to cause jealousies and divisions between us and our brethren of Scotland, by slandering their proceedings and intentions towards us, and by secret endeavours to instigate and incense them and us one against another.

" CLXX. They have had such a party of Bishops and Popish Lords in the House of Peers, as hath caused much opposition and delay in the prosecution of delinquents, hindered the proceedings of divers good bills passed in the Commons House, concerning the reformations of sundry great abuses and corruptions both in church and state.

" CLXXI. They have laboured to seduce and corrupt some of the Commons House, to draw them into conspiracies and combinations against the liberty of the Parliament.

" CLXXII. And by their instruments and agents, they have attempted to disaffect and discontent his Majesty's army; and to engage it for the maintainance of their wicked and traitorous designs; the keeping up of Bishops in votes and functions, and by force to compel the Parliament to order, limit, and dispose their proceedings, in such manner, as might best concur with the intentions of this dangerous and potent faction.

" CLXXIII. And when one mischievous design and attempt of theirs, to bring on the army against the Parliament, and the city of London hath been discovered and prevented;

" CLXXIV. They presently undertook another of the same damnable nature, with this addition to it, to endeavour to make the Scottish army neutral, whilst the English army, which they had laboured to corrupt and invenom against us, by their false and slanderous suggestions, should execute their malice to the subversion of our religion, and the dissolution of our government.

" CLXXV. Thus they have been continually practising to disturb the peace, and plotting the destruction even of all the King's dominions; and have employed their emissaries, and agents in them, all for the promoting their devilish designs, which the vigilancy of those who were well affected, hath still discovered and defeated, before they were ripe for execution in England and Scotland.

" CLXXVI. Only in Ireland, which was farther off, they have had time and opportunity to mould and prepare their work, and had brought it to that perfection, that they had possessed themselves of that whole kingdom, totally subverted the government of it, rooted out religion, and destroyed all the Protestants whom the conscience of their duty to God, their King and country, would not have permitted to join with them, if by God's wonderful providence their main enterprise upon the city and castle of Dublin had not been detected and prevented upon the very eve before it should have been executed.

" CLXXVII. Notwithstanding they have, in other parts of that kingdom, broken out into open rebellion, surprising towns and castles, committed murders, and rapes, and other villainies, and shaken off all bonds of obedience to his Majesty and the laws of the realm.

" CLXXVIII. And in general have kindled such a fire, as nothing but God's infinite blessing upon the wisdom and endeavours of this state will be able to quench.

" CLXXIX. And certainly had not God, in his great mercy unto this land, discovered and confounded their former designs, we had been the prologue to this tragedy in Ireland, and had by this been made the lamentable spectacle of misery and confusion.

" CLXXX. And now what hope have we but in God, whereas the only means of subsistence and power of reformation is under him in the Parliament?

" CLXXXI. But what can we the Commons, without the conjunction of the House of Lords; and what conjunction can we expect there, when the Bishops and recusant Lords are so numerous, and prevalent, that they are able to cross, and interrupt our best endeavours for reformation, and by that means give advantage to this malignant party, to traduce our proceedings?

" CLXXXII. They infuse into the people, that we mean to abolish all church government, and leave every man to his own fancy, for the service and worship of God, absolving him of that obedience which he owes under God unto his Majesty; whom we know to be intrusted with the ecclesiastical law, as well as with the temporal, to regulate all the members of the church of England, 'By such rule of order and discipline, as are established by Parliament; which is his great council, in all affairs both in church and state.'

" CLXXXIII. We confess our intention is, and our endeavours have been to reduce within bounds that exorbitant power, which the prelates have assumed unto themselves, so contrary both to the word to testify an extreme zeal for the public good, since the remonstrance of the Commons plainly taught him, that endeavours were using to make him forfeit the love of the people. But herein he had one great disadvantage, in that, for his future behaviour, he could give no other security than his word, which, his enemies pretended to demonstrate, was not to be relied on. They chiefly urged, that though the King had solemnly given his assent to the Petition of Right, he had never executed what he promised. The inference they drew from this non-performance was so much the stronger, as the King had nothing to oppose to it but bare promises, which were of no more force than those he had made with regard to that petition.

As the King had earnestly recommended to the Parliament, the consideration of the affairs of Ireland, both Houses immediately appointed a committee to treat with the Scots about succours.* The Commons in particular passionately desired to negotiate with Scotland. In their present belief, that the King was willing to engage them to send an army into Ireland, in order to be more at ease in England, they could not find a more effectual way to break his measures, than to employ Scotish troops in the relief of that kingdom. As they had already taken the resolution, though secretly, of divesting the King of great part of his power, they easily foresaw, that a breach would infallibly follow, and then they should want the troops which the King had a mind to engage them to send into Ireland.

After the remonstrance, every thing manifestly tended to a rupture between the King and the Parliament, and the Commons lost no opportunity to infuse suspicions into the people against the King. To this end, Daniel O'Neal, who was concerned in the plot to seduce the army, was voted guilty of a second attempt, in June, or July last, to persuade the chief officers of the army to declare for the King, against the Parliament.

On the other hand, the rebels of Ireland having by the Lord Costelough, presented to the Lords Justices of that kingdom, a letter in the nature of a remonstrance, wherein they demanded the free exercise of their religion, and a repeal of all laws to the contrary, the Commons made a great noise about it. They knew the Lord Costelough, with the Lord Taaff, were on their way to England, with propositions to be offered to the King concerning means for procuring the peace of Ireland. So, fearing, or pretending to fear, the King would grant liberty of conscience to the Irish papists, they desired a conference with the Lords. After which, it was solemnly declared by both Houses, that they would never consent to any toleration of the popish religion in Ireland, or in any other of his Majesty's dominions.†

of God, and to the laws of the land; to which end we passed the bill for the removing them from their temporal power and employments; that so the better they might with meekness apply themselves to the discharge of their functions; which bill themselves opposed, and were the principal instruments of crossing it.

" CLXXXIV. And we do here declare, that it is far from our purpose or desire, to let loose the golden reins of discipline and government in the church, leave private persons, or particular congregations, to take up what form of divine service they please; for we hold it requisite, that there should be throughout the whole realm a conformity to that order which the laws enjoin according to the word of God. And we desire to unburthen the consciences of men of needless and superstitious ceremonies, suppress innovations, and take away the monuments of idolatry.

" CLXXXV. And the better to effect the intended reformation, we desire there may be a general synod of the most grave, pious, learned, and judicious divines of this island; assisted with some from foreign parts, professing the same religion with us; who may consider of all things necessary for the peace and good government of the church, and represent the results of their consultations unto the Parliament, to be there allowed of and confirmed, and receive the stamp of authority, thereby to find passage and obedience throughout the kingdom.

" CLXXXVI. They have maliciously charged us, that we intend to destroy and discourage learning; whereas it is our chiefest care and desire to advance it, and to provide a competent maintainance for conscionable and preaching ministers throughout the kingdom, which will be a great encouragement to scholars, and a certain means, whereby the want, meanness, and ignorance, to which a great part of the clergy is now subject, will be prevented.

" CLXXXVII. And we intend likewise to reform, and purge the fountains of learning, the two universities, that the streams flowing from thence may be clear and pure, and an honour and comfort to the whole land.

" CLXXXVIII. They have strained to blast our proceedings in Parliament, by wresting the interpretations of our orders from their genuine intention.

" CLXXXIX. They tell the people, that our meddling with the power of episcopacy, hath caused sectaries and conventicles, when idolatry and Popish ceremonies introduced into the church by the command of the Bishops, have not only debarred the people from thence, but expelled them from the kingdom.

" CXC. Thus with Eliab, we are called by this malignant party the troublers of the state, and still while we endeavour to reform their abuses, they make us the authors of those mischiefs we study to prevent.

" CXCI. For the perfecting of the work begun, and removing all future impediments, we conceive these courses will be very effectual, seeing the religion of the Papists hath such principles as do certainly tend to the destruction and extirpation of all Protestants, when they shall have opportunity to effect it.

" CXCII. It is necessary in the first place to keep them in such condition, as that they may not be able to do us any hurt, and for avoiding of such connivance and favour as hath heretofore been shewed unto them.

" CXCIII. That his Majesty be pleased to grant a standing commission to some choice men named in Parliament, who may take notice of their increase, their counsels and proceedings, and use all due means by execution of the laws, to prevent all mischievous designs against the peace and safety of this kingdom.

" CXCIV. That some good course to be taken discover the counterfeit and false conformity of Papists to the church, by colour whereof persons very much disaffected to the true religion, have been admitted into places of greatest authority and trust in the kingdom.

" CXCV. For the better preservation of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, that all the illegal grievances and exaction be presented and punished at the sessions and assizes.

" CXCVI. And that judges and justices be very careful to give this in charge to the grand juries, and both the sheriff and justices to be sworn to the due execution of the Petition of Right, and other laws.

" CXCVII. That his Majesty be humbly petitioned by both Houses to employ such counsellors, ambassadors, and other ministers in managing his business at home and abroad, as the Parliament may have cause to confide in, without which we cannot give his Majesty such supplies for support of his own estate, nor such assistance to the Protestant party beyond the sea as is desired.

" CXCVIII. It may often fall out, that the Commons may have just cause to take exceptions at some men for being counsellors, and yet not charge those men with crimes, for there be grounds of diffidence which lie not in proof.

" CXCIX. There are others, which though they may be proved, yet are not legally criminal.

" CC. To be a known favourer of Papists, or to have been very forward in defending or countenancing some great offenders questioned in Parliament; or to speak contemptuously of either Houses of Parliament, or Parliamentary proceedings.

" CCI. Or such as are factors or agents for any foreign Prince of another religion; such as are justly suspected to get counsellors' places, or any other of trust, concerning public employment for money; for all these and divers others, we may have great reason to be earnest with his Majesty, not to put his great affairs into such hands, though we may be unwilling to proceed against them in any legal way of charge or impeachment.

" CCII. That all counsellors of state may be sworn to observe those laws which concern the subject in his liberty, that they may likewise take an oath not to receive, or give reward or pension from any foreign Prince, but such as they shall within some reasonable time discover to the Lords of his Majesty's council.

" CCIII. And although they should wickedly forswear themselves, yet it may herein do good to make them known to be false and perjured to those who employed them, and thereby bring them into as little credit with them as with us.

" CCIV. That his Majesty may have cause to be in love with good counsel and good men, by shewing him, in an humble and dutiful manner, how full of advantage it would be to himself, to see his own estate settled in a plentiful condition to support his honour; to see his people united in ways of duty to him, and endeavours of the public good; to see happiness, wealth, peace and safety derived to his own kingdom, and procured to his allies by the influence of his own power and government."

* That is, with some Scottish commisioners, who were come from Scotland to treat with the Parliament, about succours for Ireland.

† The Commons, at this time, descended to the meanest trifles, to cherish the people's fears, and excite their suspicions. Upon information, that amongst some barrels of soap, sent by a merchant of London to Dorchester, there was found a barrel of gun-powder, the House appointed a committee to make a strict inquisition, as into a thing of the greatest consequence. About the same time, another affair happened, which gave some advantage against the King. The 8th of December, he sent to acquaint both Houses, that seven or eight priests, having been condemned that week, the French ambassador had desired him to change the sentence of death, into that of banishment, upon which he desired to have their advice. Some days after, the Commons voted, that the priests should be executed, and the Lords concurring with this vote, both Houses petitioned the King to order the execution. The King replied, he would banish the priests, if both Houses would give their consent. As they did not think proper to answer, the King suspended the execution. Two months after, the King communicated a letter to them, which Secretary Nicholas had received from Venice, wherein he was told, that

At this time, (December 1641,) two affairs successively employed the House of Commons, namely, the succours for Ireland, and the accusation presented to the Lords against the Bishops.

The King and Parliament equally granted the necessity of relieving Ireland, and all the advices from thence were a demonstration of it. The Irish army was at the gates of Dublin, and had cut in pieces a body of troops sent to Drogheda. So, in all likelihood, the Lords Justices, with their few troops, could not long resist the rebels. The Scotch commissioners that were come to London to treat with the Parliament, had offered an aid of five thousand men, who could easily be sent from Scotland into the North of Ireland, to make a diversion, and the Commons had prevailed with them to treat for ten thousand. The design of the Commons was to employ only Scotch troops in the reduction of Ireland, that England might not be unprovided. The King did not refuse the assistance of Scotland, but would have England send into Ireland the like number of English forces, on pretence, that there was danger of the Scots seizing upon Ireland when the Irish should be subdued. He had found means to gain the Peers, so that when the motion was made to the Lords, for sending ten thousand Scots into Ireland, they consented to it, provided the same number of English were also sent thither.

The Scotch commissioners complaining, by a memorial, that in a fortnight they had no positive answer to their offers, the Commons pressed the Lords to dispatch the affair, declaring, if they neglected it, the whole blame would fall upon them. They farther declared, that unless the bill for pressing of soldiers passed, it was impossible for England to raise troops for this service. Whereupon the Lords debated the three following questions, which were all resolved in the negative.

I. Whether this House shall consent to send ten thousand Scots into Ireland, before it can be ascertained that ten thousand English will be sent thither also?

II. Whether this House shall consent to send ten thousand Scots before the bill for pressing be passed?

III. Whether this House shall join with the Commons, in sending now ten thousand Scots into Ireland?

The Commons replied to these votes in a conference, that for a certainty their Lordships' desire of sending ten thousand English into Ireland, the Commons were not used to be capitulated with: that their actions are free, as well without conditions as capitulations, and desire it may be so no more: that they had already given sufficient certainty by a vote communicated to their Lordships, and see no necessity of voting it again: that they desire their Lordships would vote the sending ten thousand Scots, without any relation to the ten thousand English, and that speedily, the preservation of Ireland depending upon it: that they have the more reason to desire this, as the English troops cannot go, unless the bill for pressing passes. But this was not capable of making the Lords depart from their former resolutions.

Meantime, the Commons, who had already committed to prison the Lords Costelough and Taaff, (sent to the King with propositions about procuring the peace of Ireland) caused all their papers to be examined, in their distrust of the King, and no doubt in expectation of finding something which might do him a prejudice.*

At the same time, the King acquainted the Lords, that he would engage to raise ten thousand men for Ireland, if the Commons would promise to pay them. But they were far from accepting this proposition, knowing the King meant to grant the commissions, and would give them to such officers only as should be at his devotion. So the Commons chose rather to hazard the entire loss of Ireland, than send thither ten thousand English in such a juncture; and the Lords chose rather to run the risk of seeing all the English driven out of the kingdom, then of seeing the Scots in condition to seize it. The King perfectly knew the motive of the Commons' proceedings, whilst they were not ignorant, that the Lords acted wholly by the King's direction.

Meantime, the assistance for Ireland being still retarded by these quarrels, the Commons appointed a committee to examine, whence came the obstacles that occurred in this affair. It was really difficult for those who were not acquainted with the secret motives of the King and Commons, to know where the blame lay, that Ireland was not relieved, since they seemed equally desirous that speedy aid should be sent thither. The King's friends said, his Majesty's offer to raise ten thousand men, provided the Commons would engage to pay them, was a clear evidence, that the obstructions did not proceed from him. His enemies, on the contrary, affirmed, that the refusal of the Lords, or rather of the King who directed them, to accept of the aid of ten thousand Scots, on a frivolous pretence, plainly shewed, that the difficulties did not come from the House of Commons, since they were very ready to promise to pay these auxiliaries. Both King and Commons probably thought less seriously of assisting Ireland, than of drawing from the Irish rebellion private advantages, with regard to their differences. The King wished the Parliament would send a strong army into Ireland, that they might find it more difficult to raise forces in case of a breach with him, of which there was but too much appearance. The Commons, on their part had prevailed with the Scots to offer ten thousand men, in the belief, that if they were accepted, they should be freed from the trouble and danger of sending an English army into Ireland, and if they were refused, the delay of relief would be imputed to the King.

However this be, the House, upon the report of the committee, found that one great obstruction of relief to Ireland, was, that the Irish had been declared rebels by proclamation. Wherefore, on the 1st of January 1641-2, the King published a proclamation, wherein the Irish were expressly called traitors and rebels.†

The Commons did not take the least step, but what tended to their end of filling the people with fears and jealousies; whereas the King having yet formed no project, managed according to the present emergencies, without proposing to himself a fixed and certain end. Shortly after his return from Scotland, upon notice that there was to be a tumultuous concourse of people at Westminster, he sent a writ to the sheriff to set a guard near the Parliament. The Commons took offence at it, and after some inquiry, to show it was done by the King's order, dismissed the guard.

Two days after, the King published a proclamation, strictly commanding, that Divine service should be performed in all the churches of England and Wales, according to the law and statutes of the realm. This proclamation, which indeed contained nothing contrary to law, was however unseasonable, when the Commons the Pope threatened to send an army into Ireland, if the priests were executed. Upon this menace, both Houses prayed the King once more to execute the said priests. But he thought not proper to grant their desire. His alledged reason was, the fear of reprisals, and that this rigour might be extremely prejudicial to the English Protestants in Ireland, who should fall into the hands of the rebels; but it was generally thought to be owing to the solicitations of the Queen. Be this as it will, the priests were not executed, for though, afterwards, the King left it to both Houses to save or put them to death, they did not think fit either to pardon or execute.

* The Lord Dillon of Costelough was pitched upon by the Irish Lords to carry over their desires to his Majesty concerning the means of quenching the flames of the rebellion. Accordingly he embarked, in company with the Lord Taaff, and at Ware their papers were seized by directions from the Parliament, and their persons committed; but afterwards they found means to escape, and waited upon his Majesty.

† There were only forty copies printed, which were all sent to Secretary Nicholas, according to an order received by the printer, to this effect:

"It is his Majesty's pleasure, that you forthwith print on very good paper, and send unto me, for his Majesty's service, forty copies of the proclamation inclosed, leaving convenient space for his Majesty to sign above, and to affix the privy signet underneath. And his Majesty's express command is, that you print not above the said number of forty copies, and forbear to make any further publication of them till his pleasure be further signified.

"For his Majesty's

publicly showed, that in the law concerning Divine service, there were things offensive to the consciences of many people. But the King had the misfortune to forget sometimes the situation of his affairs, and remember only his former state, when his proclamations met with a ready compliance.

The Commons had voted, as we observed, that a body of troops should be sent into Ireland. But as they were extremely jealous of the King, they sought an expedient to hinder him from being concerned in the raising of these forces. They were apprehensive, if these levies were made in the usual manner, that is, by inlisting volunteers, these troops would be too much at the King's devotion. This expedient was to levy soldiers by pressing, and to pass an act for that purpose. A bill was accordingly brought in, and sent up to the Lords. The preamble of this bill was contrary to the prerogative royal, and went to hinder the King from being concerned in levying these troops.* The King having notice of it, came to the Parliament, and in a speech to both Houses, offered to pass the bill without the preamble; by which means he said, that ill-timed question with regard to the prerogative would for the present be avoided, and the pretensions of each party be left entire.

Though it clearly appeared, that in this speech the King had no intention to violate the privilege of Parliament, but only to remove the obstacles which occurred on account of this bill, both Houses were equally offended. They appointed a joint committee to examine the King's speech, and upon their report, they unanimously voted: That the privileges of Parliament were broken by his Majesty's taking notice of the bill for pressing of soldiers, being in agitation in both Houses, and not agreed on; and that his Majesty, in propounding a limitation and provisional clause to be added to the bill, before it was presented unto him by the consent of both Houses, was a breach of the privilege of Parliament.

Pursuant to a declaration, founded on this vote, both Houses presented to the King an extensive petition, which the King within a few days answered in writing; to the effect, that he had no intention to infringe the privilege of Parliament, and meant only to hasten the relief of Ireland. Both Houses were satisfied, and the affair was carried no farther.

Six or seven days after, the King gave fresh occasion of complaint by removing Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower, from his place, with whom he had no reason to be pleased, on account of his evidence concerning the design of promoting the Earl of Strafford's escape. Every one saw, this was the sole cause of Balfour's disgrace. But perhaps his removal would not have been of so ill consequence to the King, had he not trusted that important place to Colonel Lunsford, known to be a man of profligate manners, and fit for any purpose. This change made the Commons believe, the King designed to secure the Tower, in order to awe the city and Parliament. As their jealousy of him was very great, and as, besides, it is certain, they sought occasions to persuade the people, the King had ill designs, they failed not to improve the present. The same day that Lunsford was put in possession of the Tower, a great number of the Londoners, some of whom were Common-council-men, presented a petition to the Lower House, representing, "That the whole state is deeply interested in the safe-conduct of the Tower, but more especially the city of London: that Colonel Lunsford is a man out-lawed, and most notorious for outrages, and therefore fit for any dangerous attempt. For which reason the petitioners, and many more who have intelligence of his having the office of Lieutenant bestowed on him, are put into such a height of fear and jealousy, as makes them restless till they have represented the same to the House of Commons, humbly desiring them to take this affair into such consideration, as may secure both the city and kingdom."

The Commons having taken into consideration the petition presented to them, desired a conference with the Lords, where they represented, "That Colonel Lunsford is an unfit person for so great a trust, as the Lieutenancy of the Tower. But if his Majesty think cause that there should be a Lieutenant of the Tower, the same being already under the command of the Earl of Newport, who is constable thereof by his Majesty's appointment, then that Sir John Conyers may be recommended to his Majesty for that place." The Lords answered, they could not concur with the Commons in an address to the King to remove Colonel Lunsford, because they conceived the same would be an intrenchment upon his Majesty's prerogative.

The Commons, vexed at the refusal of the Lords, unanimously voted, "That Colonel Lunsford was unfit to be Lieutenant of the Tower, as being a person the Commons could not confide in." At the same time they made a declaration, showing their reasons of fear and distrust, as the conspiracy to seduce the army, a former plot of possessing the Tower, the Irish rebellion, and the continual delays and interruptions they received in the House of Peers, by reason of the great number of Bishops and Popish Lords; and therefore they held themselves bound in conscience to protest, that they were innocent of the blood which was likely to be spilt, and the confusions which might overwhelm the state, if Lunsford were continued in his charge. Moreover, they hoped, that such of the Lords as had the same apprehensions, would take some course to make the same known to his Majesty. This declaration being communicated to the Lords, it was resolved by the majority of votes, that the debate thereof should be adjourned till the next Monday. But two-and-twenty Lords entered their protest against that vote.

The same day the Commons sent and desired the Earl of Newport, to reside within the Tower as constable, and to take the custody of that place.

Besides the inhabitants of London, whose petition had occasioned the Commons' declaration, the apprentices flocked together in great numbers, and presented a petition to the King, praying him to concur with the Commons in rooting out papists, innovators, bishops, as having all combined to subvert the government, and introduce popery.

On the morrow, the 26th of December, being Sunday, the Lord Mayor, Sir Richard Gurney, seeing the apprentices begin to re-assemble, and knowing they intended to go the next day to Whitehall, for an answer to their petition, waited upon the King to inform him of it. He represented withal, that great mischiefs might ensue if Lunsford was not removed, adding, the people of London were resolved to attempt the Tower, to put him out. Whereupon the King that same evening took the keys from Lunsford, but at the same time discharged the Earl of Newport of the constableship of the Tower.†

Hitherto the Commons had endeavoured in vain to exclude

* In the preamble of the bill it was declared, "that the King had in no case, but the invasion from a foreign power, authority to press the free-born subject, which could not consist with the freedom and liberty of his person."

† The reason, or perhaps the pretence of that Earl's disgrace was, that the King had been told, that at a meeting at Kensington, whilst he was in Scotland, the Earl of Newport, upon discourse of some plots in that kingdom, should say, "if there be such a plot, yet there are his wife and children." But the Earl hearing such a rumour had reached the Queen, waited upon her Majesty, and with many protestations assured her, that never any such words were spoken, not the least thought conceived of any such thing, with which the Queen seemed to rest satisfied. Nevertheless, several months after, and the same day Sir William Balfour was removed from the Lieutenancy of the Tower, the King asked him, whether he had heard any debate at "Kensington, about seizing upon the Queen and her children?" The Earl strongly denied it; to which the King replied, "That he was sorry for his Lordship's memory." This is what the Earl of Newport possitively affirmed himself in the House of Peers.—The Lords being convinced, that the King, upon a false rumour, had entertained suspicions of the Earl of Newport, espoused his cause, and presented a petition to the King, praying him to declare the reporter of those words. The Earl of Bath, the 30th of December, reported his Majesty's answer as follows:

"It is true, that I have heard rumours of some proposition that should have been made at Kensington, for the seizing of the persons exclude the Bishops from the Upper-House, and there was no likelihood that their solicitations would produce any greater effect for the future. They were therefore, either to relinquish their project, or take more effectual methods to obtain by force what would never have been obtained by fair means.

On Monday the 27th of this month, there was a great concourse of people at Westminster, where they who had presented the petition of the Londoners, the apprentices, and an infinite number of others, flocked, on pretence of waiting for the King's and the Parliament's answer. Among these multitudes, many were heard to cry aloud, No Bishops! No Bishops! This corresponded with the petition of the apprentices. The Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, lately nominated to the see of York, coming with the Earl of Dover to the House of Peers, and observing a youth to cry out louder than the rest against Bishops, stepped to him and seized him, in order to have him committed to prison. But the people rescued the youth, and gathering about the Bishop, hemmed him in, that he could not stir, so that he was likely to be pressed to death. But at last, they let him go, still crying out as loud as they could, No Bishops!

At the same time, three or four officers, who had served in the late army against the Scots, walking near Westminster-Hall, one of them, Captain David Hide, drew his sword, saying, he would cut the throats of those round-headed cropped-eared dogs that bawled against the Bishops.* But the other officers refusing to second him, he was apprehended by the citizens, and brought before the House of Commons and sent to prison.

The same day Colonel Lunsford, with thirty or forty officers coming through Westminster-Hall, and meeting the multitudes, drew their swords and wounded some twenty apprentices and citizens. The news being carried into the city, great numbers of apprentices and others, ran to Westminster with swords and staves, which caused a dreadful uproar both in London and Westminster. The Lord Mayor, to prevent any farther disorders, commanded the city gates to be shut, and put the trained-bands in arms, whilst on the other hand, the King ordered some of the militia of Middlesex and Westminster to come by turns and guard his person.

The Lords seeing so great a tumult, ordered the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, to command the people to depart to their homes. But the people answered they could not, because Lunsford, with other swordsmen, lay in wait for them in Westminster-Hall, and had already wounded several. Whereupon the Lords appointed a committee to examine, what warrant Lunsford and the other officers had to come to Westminster, and likewise what notice had been given to any others to come in multitudes about the Parliament-House. They tried once more to send away the people, but not succeeding, desired the Commons to join with them in publishing a declaration against tumults, and in petitioning the King for a guard. The Commons answered, it was now so late, that they had not time to take this request into consideration. Meanwhile, upon information that some of the people were sent to prison, they appointed a committee to examine, by whose authority they were imprisoned, with power to release them, if it was thought proper. A clear evidence that this tumult was not disagreeable to the Commons.†

On the morrow, the 28th, the tumult continued in the same manner as the day before, and the Commons made no more haste to appease it. On the contrary, they adjourned the debate of the Lords' request till next day. At last, on the 29th, the populace being again assembled they acquainted the Lords, that they were ready to join in all lawful ways and means to appease the tumults, but for printing a declaration, it was a matter that would require some farther deliberation.

It is very evident, the Commons did not desire these tumults should be so soon ended, especially if what is said of Mr. Pym, one of the leading members, be true. For it is affirmed, he answered to one that persuaded him to endeavour to prevent these tumultuous assemblies, "God forbid the people should be hindered from expressing their just desires."

The tumults still continuing about the Parliament House, and the Commons not appearing very urgent to appease them, twelve Bishops met at the Archbishop of York's, to consult together upon what was to be done. Here, by the advice of the Archbishop, they resolved to go no more to the House of Peers, but present to the King and the Lords a protestation; in which they set forth, that though they had an undoubted right to sit and vote in Parliament, yet in coming thither, they had been menaced, assaulted, affronted, by the unruly multitude, and could no longer with safety attend their duty in the House. For this reason, they protested against all laws, votes, and resolutions, as null and invalid, which should pass during the time of their constrained absence.

It must be observed, that among these twelve Bishops there were nine of the thirteen accused by the Commons, on account of the canons of the late convocation.

This protestation tended to dissolve the Parliament, without the King's interposing. For if, according to the protestation, the House of Peers could do nothing but what in itself was null, without the concurrence of the Bishops, it was no less certain, that the House of Commons could do nothing valid without the concurrence of the Peers; whence it followed, that the Parliament was become useless, or suspended, in the intention of the Bishops by this protestation. It appears also, that the King had the same thought, by his haste to communicate the protestation to the Lords, probably, before his council had examined it. Very likely, he imagined, the Lords would espouse the cause of the Bishops, as making, according to his notion, a third estate of Parliament, and that this affair might occasion the dissolution of the Parliament. But he found that this House of Peers, hitherto so favourable to him, was no longer in the same disposition, since the Bishops and Popish Lords were frightened away by the tumults. The majority of voices not being now for the King, the House looked upon this protestation with a very different eye from what the King expected. They desired a conference with the Commons, where the Lord Keeper told them in the name of all the Peers, "That this protestation containing matters of dangerous consequence, extending to the deep intrenching upon the fundamental privileges and being of Parliaments, the Lords had thought fit to communicate it to the Commons, as a thing of great and general concernment."

The Commons had no sooner received the report of this conference, but they resolved to accuse the twelve Bishops of high treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and the very being of Parliaments. They took care not to lose so fair an opportunity, of freeing themselves from the obstacles they continually met with from the Bishops in the Upper House, and besides, the Lords seemed disposed to come into their measures. So, that very moment, Mr. Glyn was sent to the House of Peers, to accuse in form the twelve of my wife and children; and in things of so high a nature, it may be fit for any Prince to inquire, even where he hath no belief nor persuasion of the things; so I have asked Newport some questions concerning that business, but far from that way of expressing a belief of the thing, which Newport hath had the boldness and confidence to affirm; which I could easily make appear, but that I think it beneath me, to contest with any particular person. But let this suffice, that I assure you, I neither did nor do give credit to any such rumour. As for telling the name of him who informed me, I do stick to the answer which I gave to your last petition upon the like particular."

* The apprentices it seems wore the hair of their heads cut round; and the Queen observing out of a window, Samuel Barnardiston among them, cried out: see what a handsome young roundhead is there: and the name came from thence, and perhaps was first publicly used by Captain Hide.

Bishops

Bishops of high treason, and to desire they might be put into safe custody.* Whereupon, the Lords ordered the Black Rod to bring the twelve Bishops to the bar of their House, which was done by eight o'clock at night, and ten of them were committed to the Tower; Moreton, Bishop of Durham; and Wright, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, in regard of their age, remaining with the Black Rod.

On the morrow, the 31st of December, the Commons sent and desired the Lords to take into consideration the bill sent up some months since for taking away the Bishops' votes, to which the Lords answered, they would take the same into consideration in convenient time.

The same day the Commons sent a committee to the King, to represent to him, "That the House was under great apprehensions, by reason of a malignant party, who were continually forming pernicious designs: nay, that some of them had imbrued their hands in the blood of his subjects, at the gates of his palace, and in the face, and at the doors of the Parliament. That therefore they humbly besought his Majesty, that they might have a guard out of the city commanded by the Earl of Essex, of whose fidelity there could be no suspicion."

As the populace of London were dispersed, and the officers still kept about Westminster, the House was under some apprehension of insults from these reformadoes, and particularly Lunsford, who was a desperate man. So, the King desiring to have this message in writing, which had been delivered by word of mouth only, and not returning an answer the same day, the Commons ordered, that thirty or forty halberts should be brought into the House, for their better security.

Their fear was farther increased, upon notice, that the young gentlemen of the inns of court were assembled, and gone to Whitehall, to offer their service to the King, who had received them very graciously, and ordered them to be handsomely entertained at tables provided for them.

The King, on his part, was not without uneasiness. He was afraid, the tumultuous concourse of the people would be renewed on New-year's day; and therefore sent orders to the common council of London, to take good measures for prevention of the like disorders, as had happened on the foregoing days, in which he was punctually obeyed.

The Parliament having adjourned from Friday till Monday, because the morrow was New-year's day, and the next day, Sunday, it was the 3d of January before the King returned an answer to the Commons' message concerning a guard, which was to this effect:

"That it was with great grief of heart, that he found the Commons, instead of reaping the fruits of his grace and affection to his people, should suffer jealousies, distrusts and fears, to be so prevalent among them, as to induce them to declare them unto him in so high a measure as they had done: that he was wholly ignorant of the grounds of their apprehensions; but if he had any knowledge or belief of the least design in any, of violence against them, he would pursue them with the same severity and detestation, as he would do the greatest attempt upon his crown. And he engaged solemnly, on the word of a King, that the security of all and every of them, from violence, was, and should ever be, as much his care, as the preservation of himself and his children. And if this general assurance should not suffice to remove their apprehensions, he would command such a guard to wait upon them, as he would be responsible for to him, who had charged him with the safety and protection of his subjects."

There were many members who wavered between their distrust of the King, and their fear of involving the kingdom in troubles, on a doubtful foundation. These however were easily persuaded to join in proceedings, which were represented to them as necessary precautions, without being told their real design; as for instance, to consent to the bill for excluding the Bishops.

Before the Bishops and Popish Lords had absented themselves from the House of Peers, the party just mentioned met with insuperable obstacles in that House. There were still many Lords, who, though opposite to the King, and extremely jealous of him, could not resolve to do any thing that struck at the government of the church and state, or at least that tended to alter the constitution. So, ever since the re-assembling of the Parliament, the Presbyterians had been only struggling, with the rest of the opposite party to the King, to induce them by degrees to concur in humbling the regal power. They had caused to be passed the remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, spread suspicions of the King concerning the rebellion of Ireland, and hindered the sending of an English army thither. Their intrigues had bred great distrust, concerning the Popish party countenanced and protected by the King; and produced mortifying addresses to the King upon the breach of the privileges of Parliament, and the lieutenancy of the Tower; tumultuous assemblies of the people at Westminster; the petition for a guard, as if the House of Commons was in great danger from the King's party. In a word, the Bishops, their principal enemies, were in the Tower. In all this Presbyterianism hardly appeared, and if some suspected it to be the chief cause of the troubles, at least, it was not easy to prove it.

Notwithstanding all these advantages, the Presbyterians still saw themselves very far from their end. They had sufficient credit to cause to pass in the House of Commons votes agreeable to the general design of the whole party: but were themselves very sensible, they durst not yet venture openly to discover their particular end, the destruction of the church of England, and the establishment of Presbyterianism. It was necessary before all things to disable the King to oppose it. For that purpose, the members of both Houses were to be gained, who still wavered between their distrust of the King, and the fear of involving the kingdom in great troubles, if the constitution should be attacked. These members were numerous enough to raise invincible obstacles to this project, by joining with the King's party.

Things being in this situation, the King, by the Lord Digby's advice, who was then his chief counsellor, took a step the most imprudent and most fatal to his affairs that he could possibly take in such a juncture. The 3d of January 1641-2, Sir Edward Herbert, Attorney General, coming to the House of Peers, acquainted them that the King had commanded him to accuse of high treason the Lord Kimbolton, and five commoners, namely, Denzil Hollis, Sir Arthur Haslerig, John Pym, John Hampden, and William Stroud. At the same time he delivered the general articles of impeachment, given him by the King with his own hand, viz.

I. That they had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England, to deprive the King of his royal power, and to place in subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and estates of his Majesty's liege people.

II. That they had traitorously endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his Majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his Majesty odious unto them.

III. That they had endeavoured to draw his Majesty's late army to disobedience to his Majesty's command, and to side with them in their traitorous designs.

IV. That they had traitorously invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his Majesty's kingdom of England.

* The Lord Clarendon says, the Bishops' friends took so great offence at this indiscreet protestation, that though they desired to preserve their function, they had no compassion or regard for their persons, or what became of them; insomuch as in the whole debate, there was only one gentleman who spoke in their behalf, and said, "He did not believe they were guilty of high-treason; but that they were stark mad, and therefore desired they might be sent to Bedlam."

V. That they had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the rights, and the very being of Parliaments.

VI. That for the compleating of their traiterous designs, they had endeavoured, so far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the Parliament to join with them in their traitorous designs; and to that end had actually raised and countenanced tumults against the King and Parliament.

VII. That they had traitorously conspired to levy, and actually had levied, war against the King.

Then Mr. Attorney said, that he was further charged to desire on his Majesty's behalf:

I. That a select committee, under a command of secresy, may be appointed to take the examination of such witnesses as the King will produce in this business, as formerly hath been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this House.

II. Liberty to add and alter, if there should be cause.

III. That their Lordships would take care for the securing of the persons as in justice there should be cause.

It is hard to conceive what the King's aim could be in this extraordinary accusation, and what he could expect from it, considering the numberless difficulties which presented themselves.

After the reading of the articles of accusation, the Lord Kimbolton stood up and prayed, that as he had had a public charge, he might have a public clearing. But the Peers proceeded not so hastily as the King expected. The first thing they did, was to appoint a committee to examine the regularity of this accusation, and to search the records, whether there ever had been any such proceeding before, and whether an accusation against a Peer might be brought into their House by the attorney general. As to the accusation against the five commoners, they did not so much as take it into consideration, whether they should receive it, but contented themselves with acquainting that House, that some of their members were accused of high treason by the attorney general.

At the same time the Commons were informed, that several persons were at Mr. Hollis's and Mr. Pym's, sealing up their trunks, doors, and papers. The same thing was done in the houses of the three other parties accused. Whereupon the Commons ordered their serjeant to break open the seals, and apprehend those that put them on. Moreover they passed an order, "That if any persons whatever should come to the lodgings of any member of the House, and there offer to seal the doors, trunks, or papers, that then such member should require the assistance of the constable to keep such persons in safe custody, till the House should give further order. That if any person should offer to arrest or detain any member, without first acquainting the House therewith, it was lawful for such member to stand upon his guard of defence, and for any person to assist him, according to the protestation taken to defend the privileges of Parliament."

Presently after, the Commons represented to the Lords, in a conference, that the King had ordered the trunks, chambers, and studies of several of their members to be sealed up, and had set a guard in a warlike manner at Whitehall. And therefore they desired, that such a guard might be placed about the Parliament also as should be approved by both Houses, or else to join with them to adjourn to a place of safety. During this conference, a serjeant at arms came to the House of Commons from the King, and required the five members, accused by his Majesty. The serjeant being ordered to withdraw, the Commons appointed some of their members to wait upon the King, and acquaint him, "That his message was a matter of great consequence, that it concerns the privilege of Parliament, and of all the Commons of England: that they will take it into consideration, and attend his Majesty with an answer, with as much speed as the greatness of the business will permit: and in the mean time the five members shall be ready to answer any legal charge made against them." Then they dismissed the serjeant who had brought the message. At the same time they enjoined the five members to give their daily attendance on the House.

Meanwhile, the Peers had made an order, to open the doors and trunks of the members of both Houses which were sealed, and resolved to join with the Commons in a petition to the King, for such a guard as both Houses should approve. They had ordered moreover, that two of their body, with some members of the Commons, should go and represent to the King, that the privileges of Parliament had been violated.

The next morning, January the 4th, the Lord Falkland reported the King's answer to the message of the Commons concerning the breach of privilege. He said, the King asked him, whether the House did expect an answer? and before the Lord Falkland replied, told him, he would send an answer to-morrow as soon as the House was set. In the meantime he bade him acquaint the House, that the serjeant had done nothing but what he had directions from himself to do.

Presently after this report, the Commons sent and desired a conference with the Lords, to acquaint them, that there was a scandalous paper published, containing articles of high treason against the Lord Kimbolton, &c. and to desire that they would concur in punishing the authors and publishers thereof.

Then the gentlemen of the inns of court, who offered themselves to be a guard to his Majesty, were sent to and examined, upon a rumour that they were ordered to be ready the 4th of January. Those of Lincoln's-Inn answered, "That last week they went to Whitehall to offer their service to the King, upon hearing that his person was in danger. That yester-night, they had received a message from his Majesty by Sir William Killigrew and Sir William Flemming, that they should keep within to morrow, and be ready at an hour's warning if the King should have occasion to use them. That they brought to them likewise a paper of articles of accusation against the Lord Kimbolton and five members of the House of Commons. That they had only an intent to defend the King's person, and would do their utmost also to defend the Parliament; being not able to make any distinction between the King and his Parliament." The gentlemen of the other inns answered to the same effect.

In the afternoon the five accused members came into the House according as they were enjoined. They were no sooner in their places, but one Captain Langrish informed the House, that the King was coming with a guard of military men, commanders and soldiers.* As there was room to believe, the King intended to seize the five members, they were immediately ordered to depart the House. They were hardly gone out when the King appeared, and going up to the chair he said, "By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your chair a little." When he was in the chair he looked round to see if he could discern any of the five members, and then made the following speech to the House, his guard waiting at the door:—

"GENTLEMEN,

"I am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you: yesterday I sent a serjeant at arms upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some that by my command were accused of high treason; whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message. And I must declare unto you here, that albeit no King that ever was in England, shall be more careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the uttermost of his power, than I shall be; yet you must know, that in cases of treason, no person hath a privilege. And therefore I am come to know if any of these persons that were accused are here: for I must tell you, gentlemen, that so long as these persons that I have accused (for no slight crime, but for treason) are here, I cannot expect that this House will be in the right way that I do heartily wish it: therefore I am come to tell you, that I must have them wheresoever I find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you, that you shall send them unto me, as soon as they return hither.* But I assure you, on the word of a King, I never did intend any force, but I shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other.

* A certain member had also private intimations from the Countess of Carlisle, that endeavours would be used this day to apprehend the five members. The Lord Clarendon says, it was generally believed, that the King's purpose of going to the House, was communicated to William Murray, of the bed-chamber, by the Lord Digby, and that it was discovered by the said Murray.——According to Whitelock, it was supposed, that the Papists, by the means and influence of the Queen, persuaded the King to this rash action.

"And now since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, that whatsoever I have done in favour, and to the good of my subjects, I do mean to maintain it.

"I will trouble you no more, but tell you I do expect as soon as they come to the House, you will send them to me; otherwise I must take my own course to find them."

The King was no sooner gone, but many members cried out aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege! Privilege! and forthwith the House adjourned till the next day at one o'clock.

The Commons assembling on the morrow, the 5th of January, at the appointed hour, immediately voted, that the King had violated the privileges of the House, and that they could not sit any longer there, without a full vindication of so high a breach, and a guard for the safety of their persons. Then it was resolved to adjourn till the 11th of the same month, and a committee of twenty-four was appointed, during the adjournment, to sit at Guildhall, and to consider of all things concerning the good and safety of the city and kingdom, and particularly how their privileges might be vindicated, and their persons secured.† The committee for the Irish affairs was ordered likewise to sit at the same place during the adjournment. That done, a message was sent to the Lords, to acquaint them with what had passed the day before, with their adjournment and committee appointed to sit at Guildhall.

The same day the King, having ordered the Lord Mayor to assemble the common council, came to Guildhall. As he passed along the streets, he had the mortification to hear people cry, "Privileges of Parliament! Privileges of Parliament!" One Henry Walker, an ironmonger and pamphleteer, was even so insolent as to throw into his coach a paper, wherein was written, "To your tents, O Israel."‡ His Majesty being come to Guildhall, made the following speech to the common council.

"GENTLEMEN,

"I am come to demand such persons as I have already accused of high treason, and do believe are shrowded in the city. I hope no good man will keep them from me; their offences are treason, and misdemeanors of a high nature. I desire your loving assistance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial.

"And whereas there are divers suspicions raised, that I am a favourer of the Popish religion; I do profess, in the name of a King, that I did and ever will, and that to the utmost of my power, be a prosecutor of all such as shall any ways oppose the laws and statutes of this kingdom, either Papists or Separatists; and not only so, but I will maintain and defend that true Protestant religion which my father did profess, and I will continue in it during my life."

This speech made very little impression. Meanwhile, the committee which sat at Guildhall, were diligently taking informations of what passed on the 4th of January, and preparing matters for their report to the House against their meeting. The committee was informed, that Sir John Byron, who was made Lieutenant of the Tower, in the room of Lunsford, had sent to Whitehall one hundred stand of arms, and two barrels of powder.

On the 7th, the city of London presented a petition to the King, which plainly showed they were more inclined to the Parliament than to him. "They represented their great fears and distractions, by reason of the progress of the rebels in Ireland, fomented by the Papists in England, and their adherents: the want of aid to suppress them, and the intimations received from abroad and at home, of a design to extirpate the Protestants: the putting out persons of honour and trust from being constable and lieutenant of the Tower: the preparations there lately made: the fortifying of Whitehall in an unusual manner: the endeavours used to the inns of court: the calling divers cannoneers into the Tower: the discovery of divers fireworks in the hands of a Papist: the misunderstanding between his Majesty and Parliament, by reason of misinformation: his Majesty's late going to the House of Commons, attended with a great multitude of armed men, besides his ordinary guard, for the apprehending of divers members, contrary to the privileges of Parliament."

This petition was very capable to show the King, how much he was mistaken in his opinion, that the city of London was well disposed in his favour. He returned however a very mild answer to each of the articles.

On the morrow, the 8th of January, the King published a proclamation, commanding all magistrates and officers of justice, to apprehend the accused members, and carry them to the Tower.

Whilst the committee was assembled at Guildhall, they took the information of two witnesses, who deposed, that they heard Captain Hide say things, which showed, he had some ill design against the House of Commons.

Then it was resolved, that the sheriffs of London and Middlesex should raise the Posse Comitatus for their safe coming to Westminster, the day the Parliament should meet. Whereupon the watermen came and tendered their service, to guard the committee by water to the Parliament house, which was accepted; but the offer of the apprentices to accompany them by land was refused.

Meanwhile, the committee having appointed a subcommittee to examine the affairs in question, they made their report, January the 10th, of what resolutions had been taken; namely,

That the publishing several articles of high treason against the Lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the House of Commons, was a high breach of the privileges of Parliament, a seditious act, tending to the subversion of the peace of the kingdom.

That the privileges of Parliament, so violated and broken, could not be fully and sufficiently vindicated, unless his Majesty would be pleased to discover the names of those persons who advised him to seal the chambers and studies of the accused members; to send a serjeant at arms to the House of Commons to demand them; to issue warrants under his own hand to apprehend them; to come in person to the House; to publish the articles of accusation in the form of a proclamation, to the end such pernicious counsellors might receive condign punishment.

The committee resolving to return on the morrow to the Parliament with a numerous guard, the King thought not proper to be exposed to the danger of receiving some affront from the populace; and therefore chose to withdraw to Hampton court, and two days after to Windsor.

January the 11th, the Commons being assembled at Westminster, the committee of twenty-four came thither by water, conducted by great numbers of sea-

* When the King was looking around for the accused members, he asked the Speaker, who stood below, whether any of these persons were in the House? The Speaker falling on his knee, prudently replied, "I have Sir, neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place, but as the House please to direct me, whose servant I am. And I humbly ask pardon, that I cannot give any other answer to what your Majesty is pleased to demand of me."

† Besides the twenty-four, all that would come were to have voices at this committee.

‡ The words employed by the mutinous Israelites, when they abandoned Rehoboham, their rash and ill-counselled sovereign.

men and others, whilst the trained bands of London marched through the city in arms, to guard them also by land.

Then it was that the King found he had taken wrong measures, and that his imprudent proceedings could not but grieve him, and ruin his affairs. He repented of what he had done, and wished he could appease the disorder raised by himself. To this end, the next day, January the 12th, he sent the following message to both Houses.

"His Majesty taking notice, that some conceive it disputable, whether his proceedings against the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, be legal and agreeable to the privileges of Parliament: and being very desirous to give satisfaction to all men, in all matters that may seem to have relation to privilege, is pleased to wave his former proceedings, and all doubts by this means being settled, when the minds of men are composed, his Majesty will proceed thereupon in an unquestionable way, and assures his Parliament, that upon all occasions he will be as careful of their privileges, as of his life or his crown."

Had there not been a settled design against the King, this message would have been capable to pacify all, since he plainly showed, he repented of what he had done, and in some measure confessed his fault. But he had given his enemies too great an advantage, for them to neglect to improve it.

From this time, the question was not to know, whether it was necessary to limit the regal power, but to know within what bounds it should be confined; they who had hitherto been most moderate, having entirely lost their doubts concerning the King's sincerity. So, the party which was most opposite to him, being grown very superior in both Houses, and meeting with little opposition, they who wished to do the King service, thought it safest, either to absent themselves from the Parliament, or to keep silence, in the expectation of an opportunity to serve him effectually, if affairs should take a new turn; and thereby the opposite party became still more powerful.

In the present disposition of the Parliament, the King's last message was not a sufficient means to oblige his enemies to alter their measures. Especially, as by this message he did not desist from the accusation, but only from the manner of proceeding, though it was easy to perceive, he took this method only to come off with the less dishonour. Accordingly, the Commons did not much regard it. The 17th of January, they came to the like resolutions with those taken by the committee in London, and digested them into a declaration. They only added, the depositions of some witnesses concerning the number of armed men, who attended the King when he came to the House, and who, according to these depositions, were about five hundred; concerning the insolent behaviour of some of the officers who accompanied his Majesty; and the words they used at the door of the House, which seemed to denote, that they waited only for a signal to fall upon the members. There is no question, all these things were highly aggravated: but these aggravations were subservient to the end proposed by the Commons. They declared, however, "That they meant not to screen their members, when accused of treason or misdemeanors, and prosecuted according to law and the privileges of Parliament: on the contrary, they should be always ready to bring them to a speedy and due trial; being sensible, that it equally imported them, as well to see justice done against criminals, as to defend the just rights and liberties of the subjects and Parliament of England."

Before this declaration was published, the King had sent another conciliatory message to both Houses; but he was not capable of satisfying the Commons. On the contrary, the next day they caused Sir Edward Herbert the Attorney General to be examined at the bar of the House of Lords. His answers being sent to the Commons, they ordered him to be accused of several high crimes and misdemeanors, that is to say, of having violated the privileges of Parliament, in exhibiting to the House of Lords the articles he received from the King's own hand with an express command to exhibit them.

Two days after, both Houses petitioned his Majesty, that they might be informed what proof there was against the six members, to the end they might speedily be proceeded against in a Parliamentary way. The King answered, "He thought it unusual or unfit to discover what proof was against them, before he was certain of the way he was to proceed, lest a new mistake should breed more delays. That it should therefore be resolved, whether his Majesty was bound in respect of privilege, to proceed against them by impeachment in Parliament; or whether he was at liberty to prefer an indictment at common law, in the usual way, or have his choice of either."

This answer could not but embarrass the two Houses, since the King was willing to follow their directions in the prosecution of the six members. Accordingly they thought not proper to resolve upon either of the ways proposed by the King. They contented themselves with replying in a second petition, "That finding there was still no legal and Parliamentary proceedings against the accused members, they thought it their duty, once more to beseech his Majesty, to inform the Parliament what proof there was against them, that they might be called to a legal trial, it being the undoubted right and privilege of Parliament, that no member can be proceeded against without the consent of Parliament."

The King plainly perceiving, there would be no end, and that new difficulties would be perpetually started, endeavoured to terminate the affair at once by the following answer:

"That as he once conceived that he had ground enough to accuse them, so now his Majesty finds as good cause wholly to desert any prosecution of them. And for a further testimony of his Majesty's real intention towards all his loving subjects, (some of whom haply may be involved in some unknowing and unwilling errors) for the better composing and settling of all fears and jealousies of what kind soever, his Majesty is ready to grant as free and general a pardon for the full contentment of all his loving subjects, as shall by the approbation of both Houses of Parliament be thought convenient for that purpose."

It was not difficult to perceive, the King offered this general pardon only to have it said, that the six members were exempted from the rigour of the law by virtue of the pardon. But the Parliament not being satisfied with the King's offer, addressed a third petition to him, desiring, that according to two acts of the 37th and 38th years of the reign of Edward III.* his Majesty would be pleased to send the persons that had made suggestion or information to him of the crimes of the six members to the Parliament, that so the rights and privileges of Parliament might be vindicated, which of justice ought not to be denied.

The King returning no answer to this petition, the affair rested here, except that in April following, the House of Peers gave sentence against the Attorney-General, declaring him incapable of all offices, but that of Attorney General, and committing him to the prison of the Fleet during the pleasure of the House.

Though this affair seemed to be ended, the King was upbraided with it afterwards a thousand times. Though the Commons made a great noise about the breach of their privileges, that was not the thing which most incensed them. Their great grievance was, that the King had chosen, to accuse of high treason, five members of the House, who were the chief leaders and directors.

* By these acts it was enacted, that, "If any person whatsoever make suggestion to the King himself of any crime committed by another, the same person ought to be sent with the suggestion before the Chancellor or Keeper of the Great-Seal, the Treasurer, or the Great Council, there to find surety to pursue his suggestion, which if he cannot prove, he is to be imprisoned till he hath satisfied the party accused of his damages and slander, and made fine and ransom to the King."

Whilst

Whilst the affair of the accused members was in hand, the Commons continued to express an extreme distrust of the King. This distrust daily increased, till at last it produced an entire rupture.

January the 12th, the Commons sent an order to Sir John Byron, Lieutenant of the Tower, to come and answer to such questions as should be put to him, concerning the arms and ammunition sent to Whitehall, the day the King came to the House of Commons. But he excused himself, as having the King's express warrant not to go out of the Tower.

The King had answered the petition of both Houses concerning a guard, that he would appoint one or two hundred men out of the trained bands of the city (such as the Lord Mayor should be answerable for to him) under the command of the Earl of Lindsey. But the Commons refused this offer, and ordered, that two companies of the trained bands should every day attend upon the House as a guard, under the command of Serjeant Major Skippon.

The Parliament's distrust of the King was daily inflamed by successive accidents, which the King's enemies knew how to improve. Whilst things were in this state, the Parliament received information, that the Lord Digby, Colonel Lunsford, and other disbanded officers, were at Kingston-upon-Thames, with about two hundred horse. Whereupon it was ordered by both Houses, that the sheriffs, calling to their assistance the trained bands of the several counties of England and Wales, should suppress all unlawful assemblies gathered together to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom. They were afraid, the King intended to secure Portsmouth, and perhaps, their fears were not groundless. However that be, they sent an order to Colonel Goring, Governor of Portsmouth, requiring him not to deliver up the town, nor receive any forces into it, but by his Majesty's authority signified by both Houses of Parliament. At the same time the Lords sent an express order to the Lord Digby, to give his attendance in the House. But he thought fit to withdraw out of the kingdom.* There had now been information, that he was the person who advised the King to accuse the six members of Parliament. Besides, the Commons were exasperated against him, on account of his speech against the bill of attainder of the Earl of Strafford, whilst he was member of that House.

The Commons made much noise about the Kingston affair, to persuade the people, his Majesty intended to secure Portsmouth. They even caused several witnesses to be examined, but this affair was carried no farther. They were contented with sending for Admiral Pennington, who reported that the Lord Digby had shown him a warrant under the King's own hand, to convey him safely into France or Holland, and that he durst not disobey the order.

The Parliament's fears about Portsmouth made them think of Hull, a very important place in the county of York. The Commons, instead of concealing, affected rather to discover their fears. Wherefore they sent a message to the Lords, that there was at Hull a magazine of arms for sixteen thousand men, and ammunition proportionable. That the town being weakly garrisoned and the adjacent country full of Papists and disaffected persons they desired their concurrence in an order that some of the trained bands of Yorkshire should be put into Hull, under the command of Sir John Hotham, member of the House of Commons, with orders not to deliver up the place, or magazine, without the King's authority signified by both Houses. To this the Lords readily consenting, young Hotham, son to Sir John, was sent immediately to Hull to execute this order, till his father should be ready to take the government of that place.†

Since the accusation of the six members, scarcely a day had passed but the Parliament expressed their suspicions of the King, so that every thing manifestly tended to a rupture. The better to persuade the people that both Houses were apprehensive of some violence from the King, and not safe at Westminster, a bill was passed to enable them to adjourn to any place they pleased.

They ordered likewise the Earl of Newport, master of the ordnance, and the Lieutenant of the Tower, not to suffer any cannon or ammunition to be carried from thence. And for the better safe-guard of the Tower, the sheriffs of London and Middlesex were ordered to set a sufficient guard both by land and water about it. The same day the Commons caused some great saddles to be seized, that were to be sent to Kingston.

Moreover, Mr. Bagshaw of Windsor, member of the House of Commons, informed them, that the preceding night, as he was going to Windsor (where the King then was) he saw divers troops of horse, and that there came thither a waggon loaded with ammunition, and another waggon loaded with the same, was sent from thence to Portsmouth. Adding, there were at Windsor four hundred horse, with about forty officers. Whereupon Skippon was ordered to detach some horsemen towards Windsor for intelligence. But in all appearance there was no great discovery made, since nothing more was said of it.

After that, the Commons desired the Lords to join with them in a petition to the King, for the removal of Sir John Byron from the Lieutenancy of the Tower, and offered their reasons. But the Lords thought fit to decline it.

Meanwhile, the Lords being informed by the Earl of Essex, that the King had laid his commands upon him and the Earl of Holland, to attend his Majesty at Hampton-court as Lord Chamberlain, and groom of the stole, they would not dispense with their absence, alledging that their attendance in Parliament about the high affairs of the realm, was truer service to his Majesty, than any they could do him at court. The King soon after removed both these Lords from their places.

During these differences between the King and the Parliament, Ireland remained unassisted. The Commons would not pay ten thousand men, who should be levied by the King's commissions. They pretended, these troops should be raised by way of pressing, in order to chuse such for soldiers as should be least attached to the King, and that the King should not be concerned in the levies. The bill for pressing had been sent up to the Lords, who had not yet passed it, of which the Commons very much complained. At last, the Scotch commissioners seeing that the differences between the King and the Parliament retarded the conclusion of the treaty for which they were sent, bethought themselves of offering their mediation to the King and both Houses, to procure an agreement. But the King was offended at their offer, because they had not first communicated their intentions to him in private. The two Houses on the contrary, thanked them for this mark of their affection.

Meanwhile, the committee from the Irish affairs finding, that that kingdom wanted a speedy assistance, and that the treaty for the ten thousand Scots was not likely to be concluded soon enough, made a proposal to the Scotch commissioners, that the Scots should send into Ireland two thousand five hundred men, who were ready, till the treaty for the ten thousand should be ended; to which the commissioners of Scotland agreed. To that purpose, they propounded certain conditions, which were approved by both Houses. But the King objected to one of the conditions, which was, that Carrick-Fergus, a sea-port in the north of Ireland, should be delivered to the Scots. He said, it was too great a trust for auxiliary forces. Nevertheless, seeing the Parliament willing to confide in the Scots, he thought he should not refuse his confidence to his native subjects. Necessity obliged the King and both Houses to accept at length of the two thousand five hundred Scots, who were sent into the north of Ireland, where they did good service.

† A committee was also appointed to draw up a letter, or other declaration, to be presented to the Lords, and by both Houses to be published in print, and sent into all parts of the kingdom, advising them with all expedition to be in readiness, and good posture of defence, upon all occasions, to defend their several counties from invasion by the papists, or other ill-affected persons.

The Commons ceased not to show openly their distrust of the King. This they did in a solemn manner, by means of a speech delivered by Mr. Pym at a conference with the Lords. The Commons were so pleased with Mr. Pym's speech, that Mr. Speaker was ordered to give him thanks for it, and desire him to print it, that it might be dispersed among the people.* But the King took great offence at it, particularly, at what Mr. Pym said concerning passes granted for Ireland, "That since the stop upon the ports against all Irish Papists, by both Houses, many of the chief commanders, now in the head of the rebels, have been suffered to pass by his Majesty's immediate warrant." The King said, it was a black calumny, and demanded by a message, that the House should make him a solemn reparation, and disavow what Pym had asserted; but the Commons, who were not then disposed to oblige the King, answered, that what Mr. Pym had said was agreeable to the sense of the House.

But this dispute between the King and the Parliament was of little importance, in comparison of another at the same time, concerning the militia and command of the forts.

In January 1641-2, when the affair of the members accused, and the breach of privileges, was warmly debating, the King, not knowing how it might end, had formed the design of securing Hull. This place was very considerable, as well by its situation, as a large magazine of arms and ammunition, which could procure a great advantage to him, that should have it in his power, in case of a rupture. To this end, the Earl of Newcastle, by the King's order, came to Hull under a counterfeit name, to consult with some of the King's friends, and amongst others with Captain Legg, how to oblige the Mayor to deliver to him the town and magazine, or to obtain it by force, if the Mayor would not give his consent. The secret being discovered, the Peers ordered the Earl of Newcastle to attend the service of the House, which he did, after receiving the King's pleasure, without being asked at his return, where he had been. But some days after, the Commons, as we have said, moved that Sir John Hotham might be sent to Hull, to which the Lords agreed the more readily, as they were not ignorant upon what design the Earl of Newcastle had been dispatched thither. The order was therefore given to Hotham by both Houses, to command in Hull, without the King's being acquainted with it.

Shortly after, the affair of the militia being commenced, the King formed once more the design of securing Hull and Portsmouth. To that purpose, Colonel Goring, Governor of Portsmouth, whom the King had secretly gained, was to receive the Queen into Portsmouth, after which, he had orders to go and take the command of Hull. Probably, there was some course taken for the surrender of that place to him. This design was discovered, though it was communicated but to three persons, and the King thought not proper to pursue it, for fear of a disappointment.

Eight days after young Hotham's departure for Hull, where his father Sir John came within a few weeks, the King sent a message to both Houses, with the following proposal:

"That they will with all speed fall into serious consideration of all those particulars, which they should hold necessary, as well for the upholding and maintaining of his Majesty's just and regal authority, and for the settling of his revenue, as for the present and future establishment of their privileges; the free and quiet enjoying of their estates and fortunes; the liberties of their persons; the security of the true religion now professed in the church of England, and the settling of ceremonies in such a manner, as may take away all just offence; which, when they shall have digested, and composed one entire body, that so his Majesty and themselves may be able to make the more clear judgement of them, it shall then appear by what his Majesty shall do, how far he hath been from intending, or designing any of those things, which the too great fears and jealousies of some persons seem to apprehend, and how ready he will be to exceed the greatest examples of the most indulgent Princes in their acts of grace and favour to their people."

It is evident that the King had three views in making this proposition. The first, to find the House employment, and procure himself time to prepare, the second, to know at once how far the designs of his enemies reached, which could not but be advantageous to him and injurious to them, with regard to the people. His third view was, to show his subjects, how willing he was to consent to whatever should be capable of procuring a perfect reconciliation between him and his Parliament.

The Commons fully perceived the snare laid for them by the King; but they perplexed him no less by their answer to his proposition. They told him, in a petition, "That they returned to his Majesty their most humble thanks, resolving to take this message into speedy and serious consideration; and, to enable them with security to discharge their duties therein, they desired the Peers to join with them, in humbly beseeching his sacred Majesty to raise up unto them a sure ground of safety and confidence, by putting the Tower and other principal forts of the kingdom, and the whole militia thereof, into the hands of such persons as the Parliament might confide in, and as should be recommended unto his Majesty by both Houses of Parliament.

By this answer, the Commons made a preliminary of the most important point, to be settled between the King and the Parliament, and which being granted, would have put it in the Parliament's power to do whatever they pleased. In the second place, they insinuated to the people, that the Parliament's distrust of the King, must have been grounded upon strong presumptions, since there was no way to labour a reconciliation, and settle the rights of the nation, so long as the King should be master of the forts and militia.

* The more to excite the people, whose dispositions were very seditious, the expedient of petitioning was revived. A petition from the county of Buckingham was presented to the House by six thousand subscribers, who promised to live and die in the defence of the privileges of Parliament. The city of London, and the counties of Essex, Hertford, Surrey, and Berks, imitated the example. A petition from the apprentices was graciously received. One, even, was encouraged from the porters, whose numbers, amounted as they said, to fifteen thousand. The address of that great body contained the same articles with all the others, the privileges of Parliament, the danger of religion, the rebellion of Ireland, the decay of trade. The porters farther desired, that justice might be done upon offenders, as the atrociousness of their crimes had deserved. And they added, "That if such remedies were any longer suspended, they should be forced to extremities not fit to be named, and make good the saying, that necessity has no law."—Another petition was presented by several poor people, or beggars, in the name of many thousands more; in which the petitioners proposed as a remedy for the public miseries, "That those noble worthies of the House of Peers, who concur with the happy votes of the Commons, may seperate themselves from the rest, and sit and vote as one entire body." The Commons gave thanks for this petition. The very women were seized with the same rage. A brewer's wife, followed by many thousands of her sex, brought a petition to the House, in which the petitioners expressed their terror of the papists and prelates, and their dread of the like massacres, rapes, and outrages, with those which had been committed upon their sex in Ireland. They had been necessitated, they said, to imitate the example of the women of Tekoah: and they claimed equal right, with the men, of declaring, by petition, their sense of the public cause; because Christ had purchased them at as dear a rate, and in the free enjoyment of Christ consists equally the happiness of both sexes. Pym came to the door of the House; and having told the female zealots, that their petition was thankfully accepted, and was presented in a seasonable time, he begged that their prayers for the success of the Commons might follow their petition. Such low arts of popularity were affected! and by such illiberal cant were the unhappy people incited to civil discord and convulsions!—In the mean time, not only all petitions, which favoured the church or monarchy, from whatever hand they came, were discouraged; and the petitioners were sent for, imprisoned and prosecuted as delinquents; and this unequal conduct was openly avowed and justified. Whoever desire a change, it was said, must express their sentiments; for how otherwise, shall they be known? but those who favour the established government, in church or state, should not petition; because they already enjoy what they wish for.

The

The King answered, concerning the Tower of London; "That having preferred a person of a known fortune, and unquestionable reputation to that trust, he did not expect he should be pressed to remove him, without a particular charge against him: that notwithstanding, if upon due examination any particular should be presented to his Majesty, whereby it might appear, that he was mistaken in his opinion of Byron, and that he was unfit for the trust committed to him, he would make no scruple of discharging him. But otherwise, he was obliged in justice to himself, to preserve his own work, lest his favour and good opinion might prove a disadvantage and misfortune to his servants, without any other accusation.

"For the forts and castles of the kingdom; he was resolved they should always be in such hands, (and only such) as the Parliament might safely confide in: but the nomination of any persons to those places (being so principal and inseparable a flower of his crown, vested in him, and derived unto him from his ancestors, by the fundamental laws of the kingdom) he would reserve to himself; and in bestowing of them, he should not be induced to express that favour so soon to any person, as to those whose good demeanor should be eminent in, or to his Parliament; and if he should at any time confer such a trust upon an undeserving person, he would always be ready to leave him to the wisdom and justice of his Parliament.

"As for the militia of the kingdom, which by the law was subject to no command, but of his Majesty, and of authority lawfully derived from him, when any particular course for the ordering the same should be considered and digested by his Parliament, and proposed to him, he would return such an answer, as should be agreeable to his honour, and the safety of his people, being resolved only to deny those things, the granting whereof would alter the fundamental law."

So general an answer was not capable of satisfying the Commons. It seemed even to intimate very clearly, that the King would not grant what was intended to be asked, and yet he removed Sir John Byron from the Lieutenancy of the Tower, and gave it to Sir John Conyers, recommended to him by the Commons. But this was a favour he readily granted, as it did not prejudice his rights. Nevertheless, a few days after, a petition was presented to him by both Houses; praying that he would be pleased forthwith to put the Tower of London, and all other forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, into the hands of such persons as should be recommended by Parliament.

The Parliament always supposed the kingdom to be in extreme danger, and the papists and disaffected party, or rather the King himself, to have ill designs; though, after all, their supposition was founded only upon conjectures, of which the King had given some occasion, by endeavouring to secure Hull, as the House had been well informed. The King's answer to the petition was as follows:

"His Majesty having well considered of this petition, and being desirous to express how willing he is to apply a remedy, not only to your dangers, but even to your doubts, and fears, he therefore returns this answer, That when he shall know the extent of power, which is intended to be established in those persons whom you desire to be commanders of the militia in the several counties, and likewise to what time it shall be limited that no power shall be executed by his Majesty alone, without the advice of the Parliament, then he will declare, That (for the securing you from all dangers or jealousies of any) his Majesty will be content to put in all the places, both of forts and militia in several counties, such persons as both the Houses of Parliament shall either approve or recommend unto him, so that you declare before unto his Majesty the names of the persons whom you approve or recommend, unless such persons shall be named, against whom he shall have just and unquestionable exception."

The King seemed, by this answer, to grant entirely the desire of both Houses, and yet the sequel showed it was neither his intention nor thought. His design was to withdraw to York and levy troops in those parts, in order to seize Hull, with the magazine there. So that, very likely, from that time he thought of war, whether defensive or offensive. And therefore he had determined to send the Queen into Holland, under colour of conducting thither the Princess Mary her daughter, who had espoused the Prince of Orange, and of going to the Spa. But withal, he had put into her hands the crown-jewels, which were afterwards used in buying arms and ammunition.* When the Parliament presented this petition to him, he was upon the point of sending away the Queen, after which he intended to retire to York. It was not therefore his interest absolutely to reject the Parliament's request in such a juncture, for fear of raising a storm too soon, which might have obstructed the execution of his two designs, and especially that relating to Hull. A few days after, he gave the Lieutenancy of the Tower to Sir John Conyers, the better to persuade both Houses, he intended to satisfy them.

The Parliament did not doubt, the King was resolved to put the militia into the hands of such as should be recommended to him. And therefore they ordered the draught of an ordinance for regulating the militia, to be prepared, with the names of the commanders in each county, on a separate paper, and presented it to his Majesty, with a petition to desire his consent.

The King answered, the Queen and the Princess being upon their departure for Holland, he had not time to consider of so important an affair, but would send an answer at his return. He was then upon the road accompanying the Queen to Dover.

Meanwhile, the Parliament believing to have reason to suspect, the King only sought to amuse them, and fearing he had formed some private design, which he intended to execute before the regulation of the militia, presented another petition to him, in terms still more importunate. They expressed their great grief on account of his Majesty's answer to their just and necessary petition. They represented, that any delay, during dangers and distractions so great and pressing, was not less unsatisfactory and destructive than an absolute denial. They insisted, that it was their duty to see put in execution a measure so necessary for public safety. And they affirmed, that the people, in many countries, had applied to them for that purpose, and in some places, were of themselves, and by their own authority, provided against those urgent dangers, with which they were threatened.

The King seeing himself thus pressed, sought other evasions to amuse the Parliament, without openly declaring however that his intention was to deny the desire of both Houses. Besides, excepting to the preamble, which threw such dishonour upon him, and protesting the innocence of his intentions when he entered the House of Commons; he only desired that the military authority, if it were defective, should first be conferred upon the crown; and he promised to bestow commissions, but such as should be revocable at pleasure, on the same persons whom the Parliament had named in the bill. By a former message he had expressed his wishes, that they would lay before him, in one view, all the concessions which they deemed requisite for the settlement of the nation. They pretended that they were exposed to perils so dreadful and imminent, that they had not leisure for such a work. The expedient proposed by the King seemed a sufficient remedy during this emergence; and yet maintained the prerogatives of the crown entire and unbroken.—But the intentions of the Commons were wide of this purpose, and their panics could be cured by one remedy alone. They instantly replied, that the dangers and distempers of the nation were such as could endure no longer delay; and unless the King speedily complied with their demands, they should be constrained, for the safety of Prince and people, to dispose of the militia by the authority of the Houses, and were resolved to do it accordingly. They asserted that those parts of the kingdom which had, from their own authority, put themselves in a posture of defence during these prevailing fears and jealousies, had acted suitably to the declarations and directions of both Houses, and conformably to the laws of the kingdom. And whilst they thus menaced the King with their power, they invited him to fix his residence at London, where they knew he would be entirely at their mercy.—"I am so much astonished at this message," said the King in his prompt reply, "that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears! Lay your hands on your hearts, and ask yourselves, whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies: and if so, I assure you that this message has nothing lessened them.—As to the militia, I thought so much of it before I gave that answer, and am so much assured that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or reason you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point.—For my residence near you, I wish it might be safe and honourable, and that I had no cause to absent myself from Whitehall: ask yourselves whether I have not.—What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask what you have done for me.—Have any of my people been disturbed with fears and apprehensions? I offer as free and general pardon as yourselves can devise. All this considered, there is a judgment of Heaven upon this nation if these distractions continue.—God so deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observance and preservation of the laws; and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation."—No sooner did the Commons despair of obtaining the King's consent to their bill, than they instantly voted, that those who advised his Majesty's answer, were enemies to the state, and mischievous projectors against the safety of the nation; that this denial, is of such dangerous consequence, that if his Majesty persist in it, it will hazard the peace and tranquillity of all his kingdom, unless some speedy remedy be applied by the wisdom and authority of both Houses; and that such of his subjects as have put themselves in a posture of defence against the common danger, have done nothing but what is justifiable, and approved by the House.

The same day it was resolved in the House of Commons, "that the kingdom be forthwith put into a posture of defence, by authority of both Houses, in such a way as is already agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament."

In pursuance of this resolution, both Houses published an ordinance for settling the militia.*

The forces from abroad, mentioned in the ordinance below, were a chimera, framed to amuse the people, and make them believe, the King would cause the kingdom to be invaded by foreigners. For though, probably, the Pope and Cardinal Richlieu countenanced the Irish rebellion, it could not be affirmed, they had formed a design to invade England in favour of the King.

March the 9th, the King being at Newmarket, both Houses presented a declaration to him, which served for a full reply to his answer.†

In the present situation of affairs, it may be observed, the

* "Whereas there hath been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the House of Commons, which we have just cause to believe to be an effect of the bloody counsels of papists, and other ill-affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland, and by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed not only to stir up the like rebellion and insurrections in this kingdom of England, but also to back them with forces from abroad.

"For the safety therefore of his Majesty's person, the Parliament and kingdom, in this time of imminent danger; it is ordained by the Lords and Commons now in Parliament assembled, That Henry Earl of Holland shall be Lieutenant of the county of Berks; Oliver, Earl of Bullingbrooke shall be Lieutenant of the county of Bedford, &c. and the said Lord Lieutenants shall severally and respectively have power to assemble and call together all and singular his Majesty's subjects, within the said several and respective counties and places, as well within liberties as without, that are meet and fit for the wars, and then to train and exercise, and put in readiness, and them, after their abilities and faculties, well and sufficiently from time to time, to cause to be arrayed and weaponed, and to take the muster of them in places fit for that purpose. And that they shall severally and respectively have power, within the several and respective counties and places aforesaid, to nominate and appoint such persons of quality, as to them shall seem meet, to be their Deputy-Lieutenants, to be approved of by both Houses of Parliament. And be it further ordained, That Sir John Gayre, Sir Jacob Garret, Knights, &c. shall have such power and authority within the city of London, as any of the Lieutenants before-named, are authorized to have by this ordinance, within the said several and respective counties, (the nomination and appointment of Deputy-Lieutenants only excepted.) And it is further ordained, that such persons as shall not obey in any of the premisses, shall answer their neglect and contempt to the Lords and Commons in a parliamentary way, and not otherwise, nor elsewhere: and that every the powers granted as aforesaid, shall continue, until it be otherwise ordered, or declared by both Houses of Parliament, and no longer."

† May it please your Majesty,

"Although the expressions in your Majesty's message, of the 2nd of this instant March, do give just cause of sorrow to us, your faithful subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament, yet it is not without some mixture of confidence and hope, considering they proceeded from the mis-apprehension of our actions and intentions, which having no ground of truth or reallity, may, by your Majesty's justice and wisdom, be removed, when your Majesty shall be fully informed, that those fears and jealousies of ours, which your Majesty thinks to be causeless, and without any just ground, do necessarily and clearly arise from those dangers and distempers, into which the mischievous and evil councils about you have brought this kingdom; and that those other fears and jealousies, by which your favour, your royal presence and confidence have been withdrawn from your Parliament, have no foundation or subsistence in any action, intention, or miscarriage of ours, but are merely grounded upon the falsehood and malice of those, who, for the supporting and fomenting their own wicked designs against the religion and peace of the kingdom, do seek to deprive your Majesty of the strength and affection of your people, them of your grace and protection, and thereby to subject both your royal person and the whole kingdom to ruin and distruction.

"To satisfy your Majesty's judgment and conscience in both these points, we desire to make a clear and free declaration of the causes of our fears and jealousies, which we offer to your Majesty in these particulars:

"I. That the design of altering religion in this, and in your other kingdoms, hath been potently carried on by those in the greatest authority about you, for divers years together, the Queen's agent at Rome, and the Pope's agent or nuncio here, are not only evidences of this design, but have been great actors in it.

"II. That the war with Scotland was procured to make way for this intent, and chiefly invited and fomented by the papists, and others popishly affected, whereof we have many evidences, especially their free and general contribution to it.

"III. That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and contrived here in England, and that the English papists should have risen about the same time, we have several testimonies and advertisements from Ireland; and that it is a common speech amongst the rebels, wherewith concur other evidences and observations of the suspicious meetings and consultations, the tumultuary and seditious carriage of those of that religion, in divers parts of this kingdom, about the time of the breaking out of the Irish rebellion; the disposition of O'Conelly; the information of Mr. Cole, minister; the letter of Tristram Whitecombe; the disposition of Thomas Grant, and many others, which we may produce, do all agree in this: the public declarations of the Lords, Gentlemen, and others of the pale, that they would join with the rebels, whom they call the Irish army, or any other, to recover unto his Majesty his royal prerogative, wrested from him by the puritan faction in the Houses of Parliament in England, and to maintain the same against all others, as also to maintain episcopal jurisdiction, and the lawfulness thereof: these two being quarrels upon which his Majesty's late army in the North should be incensed against us.

"The great cause we have to doubt, that that late design, stiled the Queen's pious intention, was for the alteration of religion in this kingdom; for success whereof, the Pope's nuncio, the Count Rosetti, enjoined fasting and praying to be observed every week by the English Papists, which appeared to us, by one of the original letters, directed by him to a priest in Lancashire.

"The boldness of the Irish rebels in affirming they do nothing but by authority from the King; that they call themselves the Queen's army; that the prey or booty which they take from the English they mark with the Queen's mark; that their purpose was to come to England after they had done in Ireland, and sundry other things of this kind, proved by O'Conelly, and divers others, especially in the fore-mentioned letters from Tristram Whitecombe, the Mayor of Kingsale, to his brother Benjamin Whitecombe, wherein there is this passage, 'That many other strange speeches they utter about religion and our court of England, which he dares not commit to paper.'

"The manifold attempts to provoke your Majesty's late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise a faction in the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom; that those who have been actors in those businesses, have had their dependance, their countenance and encouragement from the court; witness the treason whereof Mr. Jermin and others stand accused, who was transported beyond sea, the King and the Parliament had but too much cause to mistrust one another, and that each laboured to procure such advantages as might enable them to attack or defend. As for the declarations, messages, answers, replies, these were only for the people, it being the interest of each to gain and amuse them. But herein the Parliament had a great advantage, by reason of the people's prejudice against the King, to which he opposed only general promises, whereof he could give no assurance. This was very advantageous to the Parliament, who pretended, that in order to trust in such promises, it was necessary the King should begin with divesting himself of what enabled him to break them.

When the committee of both Houses presented the declaration to the King, and after it was read in his presence, he returned an extempore general answer; similar, in substance, to the one preceeding; and, on the morrow, the King gave it to the committee in writing.

After that, the Earl of Pembroke, one of the committee, asking him, whether he would grant the militia, as by warrant under your Majesty's hand, after your Majesty had given assurance to your Parliament, that your Majesty had laid a strict command upon all your servants, that none of them should depart from court; and that dangerous petition delivered to Captain Legge by your Majesty's own hand, accompanied with a direction signed with C. R.

"The false and scandalous accusation against the Lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the House of Commons, tendered to the Parliament by your Majesty's own command, endeavoured to be justified in the city by your own presence and persuasion, and to be put in execution upon their persons by your Majesty's demand of them in the House of Commons, in so terrible and violent a manner, as far exceeded all former breaches of privileges of Parliament acted by your Majesty or any of your predecessors; and whatsoever your intentions were, divers bloody and desperate persons which attended your Majesty, discovered their affections and resolution to have massacred and destroyed the members of that House, if the absence of those persons accused, had not, by God's providence, stopped the giving of that word which they expected, for the setting them upon that barbarous and bloody act; the listing of so many officers and soldiers and others, putting them into pay, and under command of Colonels; feasting and caressing them in an unusual manner at Whitehall, thereby maintaining them in the violent assaults and other injuries which they offered to divers of your subjects, coming that way in a lawful and peaceable manner; the carrying them out of town, after which they were told by the Lord Digby, that the King removed on purpose that they might not be trampled in the dirt; and keeping them so long in pay, endeavouring to engage the gentlemen of the inns of court in the same course; the plotting and designing of a perpetual guard about your Majesty; the labouring to infuse into your Majesty's subjects an evil opinion of the Parliament through the whole kingdom, and other symptoms of a disposition of raising arms, and dividing your people by a civil war; in which combustion Ireland must needs be lost, and this kingdom miserably wasted and consumed, if not wholly ruined and destroyed.

"That after a vote had passed in the House of Commons, declaring, that the Lord Digby had appeared in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames, to the terror and fright of your Majesty's good subjects, and disturbance of the public peace of the kingdom; and that therefore the Lords should be moved to require his attendance, he should nevertheless be of that credit with your Majesty, as to be sent away by your own warrant to Sir John Pennington, to land him beyond the sea, from whence he vented his own traiterous conceptions, that your Majesty should declare yourself, and retire to a place of strength in this kingdom, as if your Majesty could not be safe among your people; and withal took that transcendent boldness to write to the Queen, offering to entertain correspondence with her Majesty by cyphers, intimating some service which he might do in those parts, for which he desired your Majesty's instructions, whereby in probability he intended the procuring of some foreign force to strengthen your Majesty in that condition, into which he would have brought you; which false and malicious counsel and advice, we have great cause to doubt, made too deep an impression in your Majesty, considering the course you are pleased to take of absenting yourself from your Parliament, and carrying the Prince with you, which seems to express a purpose in your Majesty, to keep yourself in a readiness for the acting of it.

"The manifold advertisements which we have had from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, that they still expect, that your Majesty has some great design in hand, for the altering of religion, the breaking the neck of your Parliament, that you will yet find means to compass that design; that the Pope's nuncio hath solicited the Kings of France, and Spain, to lend your Majesty four thousand men a-piece, to help to maintain your royalty against the Parliament: and this foreign force, as it is the most pernicious and malignant design of all the rest, so we hope it is, and shall always be farthest from your Majesty's thoughts, because no man can believe, you will give up your people and kingdom, to be spoiled by strangers, if you did not likewise intend to change both your own profession in religion, and the public profession of the kingdom, that so you might still be more assured of those foreign states of the Popish religion, for your future support and defence.

"These are some of the grounds of our fears and jealousies, which make us so earnestly to implore your royal authority and protection for our defence and security, in all the ways of humility and submission, which being denied by your Majesty, seduced by evil counsel, we do with sorrow, for the great and unavoidable misery and danger, which thereby is like to fall upon your own person, and your kingdoms, apply ourselves to the use of that power, for the security and defence of both, which by the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom resides in us; yet still resolving to keep ourselves within the bounds of faithfulness and allegiance to your sacred person, and your crown; so as to the second sort of jealousies and fears of us expressed by your Majesty, we shall give a shorter, but as true and as faithful an answer.

"Whereas your Majesty is pleased to say, that for your residence near the Parliament, you wish it may be so safe and honourable, that you had no cause to absent yourself from Whitehall; this we take as the greatest breach of privilege of Parliament that can be offered, as the heaviest misery to yourself, and imputation upon us, that can be imagined, and the most mischievous effects of evil counsels: it roots up the strongest foundation of the safety and honour which your crown affords; it seems as much as may be to cast upon the Parliament such a charge, as is inconsistent with the nature of that great council, being the body, whereof your Majesty is the head; it strikes at the very being both of King and Parliament, depriving your Majesty, in your own apprehensions, of their fidelity, and them of your protection, which are the mutual bands and supports of government and subjection.

"We have, according to your Majesty's desire, laid our hands upon our hearts; we have asked ourselves in the strictest examination of our consciences; we have searched our affections, our thoughts; considered our actions, and we find none that can give your Majesty any just occasion to absent yourself from Whitehall, and the Parliament; but that you may with more honour and safety, continue there than in any other place.

"Your Majesty lays a general tax upon us; if you will be graciously pleased to let us know the particulars, we shall give a clear and satisfactory answer; but what hope can we have of ever giving your Majesty satisfaction, when those particulars which you have been made to believe were true, yet being produced, and made known to us, appeared to be false, and your Majesty notwithstanding will neither punish, nor produce the authors, but go on to contract new jealousies and fears upon general and uncertain grounds, affording us no means or possibility of particular answer, to the clearing of ourselves? For proof whereof, we beseech your Majesty to consider these instances:

"The speeches alledged to be spoken in a meeting of divers members of both houses at Kensington, concerning a purpose of restraining the Queen and Prince, which after it was denied and disavowed, yet your Majesty refused to name the authors, though humbly desired by both Houses.

"The report of articles framed against the Queen's Majesty, given out by some of near relation to the court; but when it was publicly and constantly disclaimed, the credit seemed to be withdrawn from it; but the authors being kept safe, will always be ready for exploits of the same kind, wherewith your Majesty and the Queen will be often troubled, if this course be taken to cherish and secure them in such wicked and malicious slanders.

"The heavy charge and accusation of the Lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the House of Commons, who refused no trial or examination, which might stand with the privilege of Parliament; yet no authors, no witnesses produced, against whom they may have reparation, for the great injury and infamy cast upon them; notwithstanding three several petitions of both Houses, and the authority of two acts of Parliament, vouched in the last of those petitions.

"We beseech your Majesty to consider in what state you are, how easy and fair a way you have to happiness, honour, greatness, plenty, and security; if you will join with the Parliament, and your faithful subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the kingdom. This is all we expect from you, and for this we shall return to you our lives, fortunes, and uttermost endeavours to support your Majesty, your just sovereignty and power over us; but it is not words that can secure us in these our humble desires: we cannot but too well, and sorrowfully remember, what gracious messages we had from you this summer, when with your privity, the bringing up the army was in agitation; we cannot but with the like affections recall to our minds, how, not two days before you gave directions for the abovementioned accusation, and your own coming to the Commons House; that House received from your Majesty a gracious message, that you would always have a care of their privileges, as of your own prerogative, of the safety of their persons, as of your own children. That which we expect, which will give us assurance that you have no thought but of peace and justice to your people, must be some real effect of your goodness to them, in granting those things, which the present necessity of the kingdom doth enforce us to desire: and in the first place, that your Majesty will be graciously pleased to put from you those wicked and mischievous counsellors, which have caused all these dangers and distractions, and to continue your own residence, and the Prince's, near London, and the Parliament, which we hope will be a happy beginning of contentment and confidence between your Majesty and your people, and be followed with many succeeding blessings of honour and greatness to your Majesty, and of security and prosperity to them.

"The Lords and Commons have commanded us to present unto your Majesty, this farther addition to their former declaration.

"That your Majesty's return and continuance near the Parliament, is a matter in their apprehension of so great necessity and importance, toward the preservation of your royal person and your kingdoms, that they cannot think they have discharged their duties, in the single expression as was desired by the Parliament, for a time? No, answered the King, by God, not for an hour.* This answer did him great injury. His principal concern was to satisfy the people, that his word might be relied upon, and yet he showed, he had no intention to keep his promise to the Parliament, to grant the militia, when he should know for how long a term, since he refused to grant it even for an hour.

If the Parliament had hitherto placed but little confidence in the King's promises, this did not help to increase it. On the other hand, the harsh and disrespectful treatment of the King by both Houses, in their declaration, very much incensed him, and rendered a rupture unavoidable.

March the 15th, the King being at Huntingdon, sent a message to both Houses, to inform them, that he intended to reside at York for some time. He recommended to them withal the affairs of Ireland. As to the militia, he told them, "That as he had always been so tender of the privileges of Parliament, that he had been ready and forward to retract any act of his own, which he had been informed had trenched upon their privileges; so he expected an equal tenderness in them, of his known and unquestionable privileges; amongst which, he was assured it is a fundamental one, "that his subjects cannot be obliged to obey any act, order, or injunction, to which his Majesty hath not given his consent:" that therefore, he expected and required obedience from all his subjects, to the laws established, being resolved to keep the laws himself, and to require obedience to them from all his subjects."

Next day, the Commons passed the following votes, which were approved by the Lords.

"That the House should insist upon their former votes concerning the militia.

"That the King's absence, so far remote from his Parliament, was not only an obstruction, but might be a destruction to the affairs of Ireland.

"That when the Parliament, which is the supreme court of Judicature in the kingdom, shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted; and a command, that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of Parliament.

"That a committee shall be appointed by the House to join with a committee of the Lords, to enquire where this message was framed.

"That those persons, that did advise his Majesty to absent himself from the Parliament, are enemies to the peace of this kingdom, and justly suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland, as are also those that advised his Majesty to this message."

It was at the same time unanimously resolved upon the question by the Lords in Parliament.

"That the ordinance of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, for the safety and defence of the kingdom of England and dominions of Wales, is not any way against the oath of allegiance.

"That the several commissions granted under the Great-Seal to the Lieutenants of the several counties, are illegal and void.

"That whosoever shall execute any power over the militia of this kingdom and dominion of Wales, by colour of any commission of Lieutenancy, without consent of both Houses of Parliament, shall be accounted a disturber of the peace of this kingdom.

"Moreover, both Houses voted with one common consent, that the kingdom hath been of late, and still is in so evident and imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a popish party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his Majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his Majesty and his people.

"That the Lords and Commons fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty, to provide a suitable prevention, have in several petitions addressed themselves to his Majesty, for the ordering and disposing of the militia of the kingdom, in such way, as was agreed upon by the wisdom of both Houses to be most effectual and proper for the present exigencies of the kingdom; yet could not obtain it, but his Majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereunto.

"That in this case of extreme danger, and of his Majesty's refusal, the ordinance agreed on by both Houses for the militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.

"That such persons as shall be nominated Deputy-Lieutenants, and approved of by both Houses, shall receive the commands of both Houses to take upon them to execute their offices."

These resolutions were taken with great precipitation, for the two Houses had not received the King's answer in full to their declaration of the 9th of March. But as by his last message the King had sufficiently shown, he intended not to depart from his right concerning the militia, they thought needless to wait for a more particular notification.

After receiving his Majesty's answer, both Houses sent a message to the King, at York, to inform him that the Lord Admiral's indisposition disabling him for commanding the fleet in his own person, they had recommended to his Lordship the Earl of Warwick to supply his place. But understanding since that his Majesty had appointed for that employment Sir John Pennington, they besought him not to prefer this last to the Earl of Warwick.

The King was very angry at this message, which was not by way of petition or declaration, and sent the Lord Keeper word, that his resolution was not to alter the person whom he had appointed. But he was not master: for, by the connivance of the Earl of Northumberland, who was Lord Admiral, the Earl of Warwick was acknowledged commander of the fleet, against the King's will.

About the same time a paper was dispersed, wherein the author examined, "How laws are to be understood, and obedience yielded? A question necessary for the present state of things touching the militia. His Majesty (says he) is intrusted by law with the militia; but it is good for the preservation of the people, and not against them. So that when there is a well-grounded suspicion that the King intends to employ the militia against the people, he is not to be obeyed, for it is not likely that the intent of the law is to invest the King with a power to be used against his subjects." The King having perused this paper, sent a message to the Lords to require them to find out the author of so pernicious a doctrine, and punish him according to his deserts.

Whilst the affair of the militia was in agitation, the King came to the gates of Hull with some troops: but Sir John Hotham denied him admittance. This proceeding of the King's served not to remove the Parliament's fears and suspicions, and the rather as having passed a bill for settling the militia, as the King desired, this bill had been rejected. The affair of Hull happening shortly after, the Parliament thought there was no more ceremony to be used, imagining the King expression of their desire, unless they add some farther reasons to back it with.

"I. Your Majesty's absence will cause men to believe, that it is out of design to discourage the undertakers, and hinder the other provisions for raising money for defence of Ireland.

"II. It will very much hearten the rebels there, and disaffected persons in this kingdom, as being an evidence and effect of the jealousies and divisions between your Majesty and your people.

"III. That it will much weaken and withdraw the affection of the subjects from your Majesty, without which a Prince is deprived of his chiefest strength and lustre, and left naked to the greatest dangers and miseries, that can be imagined.

"IV. That it will invite and encourage the enemies of our religion, and the states in foreign parts, to the attempting and acting their evil designs and intentions towards us.

"V. That it causeth a great interruption in the proceedings of Parliament.

"These considerations threaten so great danger to your Majesty's person, and to all your dominions, that, as your Majesty's great council, they hold it necessary to represent to you this their faithful advice, that so whatsoever followeth, they may be excused before God and man."

* Adding, "You have asked that of me in this, was never asked of any King, and with which I will not trust my wife and children."

sought only to amuse them, and make them lose time. Meanwhile the King, five or six days after his disappointment at Hull, sent a message to the Parliament, dated April the 28th, containing his reasons for not consenting to the militia-bill, which was replied to by the Parliament.

It was time however for the declarations, answers, and replies concerning the militia, to end, since there was nothing new to be said on that subject. Besides, the Parliament's ordinance was now executing in all places, where the people were willing to obey it.* At last, May the 27th, the King published a proclamation, forbidding to carry into execution the ordinance of the Parliament, on pain to offenders, of being declared disturbers of the public peace. The Parliament, on their part, published a declaration, forbidding all persons to obey the King's proclamation, as being contrary to the laws.†

We have related without interruption the affair of the militia, which lasted however several months, that we might not be obliged to break the thread of the narration; this affair being of the utmost importance, since it was the most immediate cause of the civil wars which quickly ensued: but it was not the only affair during that time. Wherefore, it will be necessary to go back to the time when we began to speak of the militia, to see other affairs, no less material, and whereof some contributed no less to the rupture.

The King having passed in February the two acts, so earnestly desired by the Commons, namely, for the exclusion of the Bishops,‡ and for pressing of soldiers, sent the following message to both Houses:

"That his having passed these two bills, being of so great importance, and so earnestly desired by both Houses, will serve to assure his Parliament, that he desires nothing more than the satisfaction of his kingdom; yet, that he may further manifest to both Houses how impatient he is, till he find out a full remedy to compose the present distempers, he is pleased to signify:

"That he will by proclamation require, that all statutes made concerning recusants, be with all care, diligence, and severity, put in execution.

"That his Majesty is resolved, that the condemned priests shall be immediately banished, if his Parliament shall consent thereunto: and he will give present order, that a proclamation issue to require all Romish priests within twenty days to depart the kingdom; and if any shall be apprehended after that time, his Majesty assures both Houses, on the word of a King, that he will grant no pardon to any such, without consent of his Parliament.

"And because great and different troubles are observed to arise, concerning the government and liturgy of the church, his Majesty declares, that he will refer the whole consideration to his Parliament: but desires not to be pressed to any single act on his part till the whole be so digested and settled by both Houses, that his Majesty may clearly see what is fit to be left, as well as what is fit to be taken away.

"For Ireland, he will not refuse to venture his own person in that war, if his Parliament shall think it convenient, for the reduction of that kingdom.

"That he will most readily concur in any resolution their wisdoms shall find out, which may conduce to promote the trade of the kingdom."

The two Houses contented themselves with thanking his Majesty for passing the two bills, without returning any answer upon the other points.

The Queen being misinformed that there was a design to accuse her of high-treason, the Parliament had notice of it, and sent the Earl of Newport and the Lord Seymour to vindicate themselves from this aspersion.

Some letters of the Lord Digby, directed to the Queen, to Sir Lewis Dives his brother-in-law, and to Secretary Nicholas, being intercepted, the Parliament caused them to be opened. It was found, that the Lord Digby, who was then at Middleburgh in Zealand, advised the King to betake himself to a safe place, and desired the Queen to send him a cypher, that he might hold a correspondence with her. There were also in the letters some sharp expressions against the Parliament. The two Houses sent copies of these letters to their Majesties, assuring them, that they were far from reflecting any thing upon the Queen, only they besought her not to correspond with the Lord Digby. Some days after, it was resolved by the Commons, that the Lord Digby should be accused of high-treason.

February the 24th, a message was sent from both Houses to his Majesty, to acquaint him with the reasons why they desired, that the Prince of Wales should reside at Hampton-court. The chief was, that the Prince's removal might be a cause to promote jealousies and fears in the minds of his subjects. For the Parliament lost no opportunity to let the people see, there was occasion to be alarmed. The King intimated to them by this answer that he did not think himself accountable for his conduct, with regard to the Prince his son; and concluded with saying, "He could not imagine from what grounds these fears and jealousies proceeded; but if any information had been given to that purpose, he desired the same might be examined to the bottom; and then hoped their fears would be hereafter continued only with reference to his rights and honour."

About the same time, proposals were made to the Parliament, for the speedy raising of money for the reduction of Ireland. These proposals were, that to such persons as should be willing to advance money for that service, should be allotted, according to a certain proportion, the rebels' lands that should be confiscated, which was approved of by both Houses, and an act

* The Parliament did not deny, that in the ordinary course of the government, the right of settling the militia, and appointing those who were to command it under him, was solely in the King. But they affirmed, that in the present extraordinary case, it was incumbent on them to take care the kingdom perished not by the King's fault. The case they supposed was this, the King, for the space of fifteen years, had endeavoured to establish an absolute government, and had actually established it on divers occasions: he had pretended, that he might govern without Parliaments, and accordingly, had called none for twelve years together; during which interval, he had violated sundry laws, and ruled after an arbitrary manner. Being forced by the necessity of his affairs to call this present Parliament, he had seemed to acknowledge the injustice of his former conduct, by giving his consent to the good acts made for the redress of past, and the prevention of future, grievances. But at the very time that he expressed so great condescension for his subjects, and an outward repentance for his faults, he ceased not to devise means to become absolute as before. The Parliament inferred from this his conduct, that the King's condescension was only apparent; that at the first opportunity, he would revoke the acts he had consented to, and which he affected to term always, acts of grace, though they were really acts of injustice. Consequently, it was necessary to put it out of his power to recede from what he had done, if he should desire it. The only way to hinder such a design, was to put the militia of the kingdom into safe hands, who should not depend upon the King, and prevent him from having any power over the militia, for fear this power, either in him alone, or jointly with the two Houses, might enable him to break all the measures which should be taken, to hinder the execution of his designs.

† "The question is not, (said they) whether it belong to the King or no, to restrain the levying of the militia; but if the King shall refuse to discharge that duty and trust, whether there be not a power in the two Houses to provide for the safety of the Parliament, and peace of the kingdom? that though the law affirms that power to be in the King, it does not exclude those in whom the law hath placed a power for that purpose, as in the courts of justice; yet can it not be restrained by his Majesty's command, by his Great Seal, or otherwise; much less can the power of Parliament be concluded by his Majesty's command.—That though the King is the fountain of justice and protection, yet the acts of justice and protection are not exercised in his own person, but by his courts and his ministers; who must do their duty therein, though the King, in his own person, should forbid them; and therefore, if judgments should be given by them against the King's will, and personal command, yet are they the King's judgments. Thus also, the High-Court of Parliament declares the King's pleasure in those things that are requisite thereunto, and what they do herein hath the stamp of royal authority, although his Majesty do in his own person oppose or interrupt the same: for the King's supreme and royal pleasure is exercised and declared in this high-court of law and council, in a more eminent and obligatory manner, than it can be by any personal act or resolution of his own.—That by the constitution and policy of this kingdom, the King by his proclamation cannot declare the law, contrary to the judgment and resolution of any of the inferior courts of justice, much less against the high-court of Parliament; for if it were admitted, that the King by his proclamation may declare a law, thereby his proclamations will in effect become laws, which would turn to the subverting of the law of the land, and the rights and liberties of the subject."

‡ The bills were passed by commission. The King signed the commission for passing the first, at Canterbury, as he was on his way to Dover, whither he accompanied the Queen.

was passed accordingly, to which the King gave the royal assent.

The Queen departed for Holland about the end of February.

March the 16th, the King being at Strafford in his way to York, issued a proclamation, for strictly executing the laws against papists. This proclamation served only to show, that hitherto these laws had been ill executed. But the King had a mind thereby to repel the imputation of his protecting and countenancing the Catholics, so much insisted upon by his enemies among the people, as if this protection was a proof of his design to introduce popery.

The King, as was said, intended to secure Hull, with the magazine there; but his intention was yet a secret, and means were devising to put it in practice. To this end, very probably, he sent a message to the Parliament, to acquaint them, that he had firmly resolved to go into Ireland, and head the English troops. That therefore he intended to raise by his commissions, in the counties near West-Chester, a guard for his own person, (when he should come to Ireland) consisting of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, to be armed from his magazine of Hull, the charge of paying whereof he desired them to take upon them. The King hoped to reap some advantage, either from the approbation, or the denial. If the Parliament consented to it, the King found he should be able to employ this pretended guard of two thousand two hundred men, to render himself master of Hull. If his proposition was rejected, he flattered himself, at least, that he should thereby convince the people of his sincere desire to reduce Ireland, and dispel the rumours that were spread on that head, which would afford him opportunity to throw all the blame on the Parliament. Accordingly this was the only use he afterwards made of this offer, which was but a stratagem, as the Earl of Clarendon owns in his history. But whether both Houses considered this proposition of the King, as a snare, or as a real and sincere offer, they thought not fit to consent to it. Indeed, as things then stood, it was by no means proper to set the King at the head of an army in Ireland, and still less, that he should raise in England, a guard of two thousand two hundred men, when they were labouring with all their power to take from him the command of the militia, upon the foundation of the jealousies conceived of him. For though hitherto they had been contented to accuse only his counsellors, and a malignant party, of contriving plots against the state, it was but an artifice to accuse him himself. So, as they neither could nor would approve of the King's proposition, they presented a petition to him; and, after a reply from the King, and a rejoinder from the Parliament, the affair rested.

Notwithstanding the King's ill success in his secret undertaking, he persisted in his design to free himself, by force, from the slavery to which it was intended to reduce him, perceiving, it would be impossible for him to succeed any other way. To this end, doubtless, he sent the Queen to Holland, and having but little money to give her, put into her hands the crown jewels, which were used in buying arms and ammunition.

When the Parliament sent Sir John Hotham down to Hull, the King complained not of it, whether he was apprehensive of being reproached with attempting to secure that place, or to amuse the Parliament, and hinder them from taking greater precautions. Meanwhile, both Houses finding the King at a distance from London, and fearing for Hull, on account of the magazine there, petitioned him, to order the magazine to be removed to the Tower of London. The King answered, "He rather expected, that both Houses would have given him an account, why a governor and garrison had been placed in Hull without his knowledge, than to be moved to consent for the removal to the Tower of a magazine (which were his own proper goods) upon such general reasons, as gave no satisfaction to his judgment: that in short, he would not agree to the removal of these arms, till he knew for what service they were intended: and if any attempt should be made in this matter without his approbation, he should esteem it as the greatest violation of his right." A little after, some gentlemen of the county of York petitioned the King, that the magazine might not be removed, by reason they conceived the kingdom, and particularly the north, to be in danger. This petition was probably begged, since affairs were not yet in such a situation, that private persons should dare to present an address to the King, directly contrary to that of the Parliament, had they not been encouraged thereto. At last, finding the King would not consent to it, the Parliament ordered most of the magazine to be brought to the Tower without asking his approbation any more.

The King's design to make himself master of Hull, broke out the 23d of April, when the affair of the militia was agitated with great heat on both sides. The day before, he had sent to Hull the Duke of York his second son, with the young Elector Palatine his nephew, under colour of seeing the place, and very likely these two Princes had a pretty numerous retinue. Hotham and the Mayor received them with all the respect due to their rank. The Princes were entertained the first day by the Mayor, and invited to dine with the governor on the morrow, being St. George's day. But the entertainment was disturbed by an officer, Sir Lewis Dives, who came a little before dinner, and told the governor, that his Majesty intended to dine with him, being then within four miles of the town, with a train of above three hundred horse.* Hotham, surprised at this message, consulted with some of his friends, and it was resolved among them, that a messenger should be dispatched to the King, humbly to beseech him to forbear to come, forasmuch as he could not, without betraying the trust committed to him, set open the gates to so great a guard as he came attended withal. The messenger returning with a doubtful answer, and certifying of the King's advance to the town, Hotham drew up the bridge, shut the gates, and commanded the soldiers to stand to their arms round the walls. The King being come to Beverly-gate, called for the governor, who appearing on the walls, he commanded him to open the gate. The governor answered, "He was intrusted by the Parliament for the securing of the town, for his Majesty's honour, and the kingdom's use, which he intended by God's help to do; proffering, however, that if his Majesty would be pleased to come in with twelve more, he should be welcome, otherwise he could not, without betraying his trust to the state, admit entrance to so great a guard." But the King, refusing to enter on these terms, repeated several times his command to open the gate, and still received the same answer. Presently after, the Duke of York, and the Prince Elector, went out of the town, and came to the King, who was pleased to give the governor one hour more to consider what he did. But Hotham persisting in his resolution, the King offered at last to enter with thirty horse only, which was refused. In short, about five in the evening, the King returning to the gate, commanded Hotham once more to open it, and upon his refusal, caused him to be proclaimed traitor by two heralds he had brought with him. This done, he retired to Beverly, where he passed the night. The next morning, he sent a herald to Hotham, to summon him once more to open the gates of Hull, with promise of pardon for what was past but could not prevail; so that he was forced to return to York.

The King was extremely troubled at this disappointment, and seeing no other way to palliate his proceedings, he resolved expressly to deny, he had ever intended to become master of Hull. By this supposition, he meant to represent Sir John Hotham's action as a manifest treason, and accordingly demanded an authentic reparation of the Parliament. He cited the laws and statutes which placed in the King the care of defending the realm, and the command of the forts and magazines. But he constantly supposed the kingdom to be in a state of tranquillity, as it was when these laws were made, which was by no means the present case. He pretended, the forts and magazines were his own proper goods; and particularly, that of Hull, being purchased with his own money, could not be withheld from him, without rendering his condition worse than that of his meanest subject.

But the Parliament did not grant these suppositions. They pretended, that the forts and magazines were committed to the King, as a trust to be employed for the preservation, and not for the destruction of the people, and that the King's claim to the property of the forts and magazines was groundless. It is no wonder, that upon such different principles, the papers should abound on both sides, without producing any great effects. The King, however, had this advantage, that the Parliament could not evidently prove their assertions against him, and that the authority assumed by both Houses was founded only on bare suspicions of the King's ill designs, which would have rendered it plausible, had they been averred.

The Parliament openly supported Sir John Hotham; so that after many messages, declarations, answers, and replies, the King had no way left to become master of Hull, but by surprise or force. The last of these ways was not very practicable, because he could depend but on a very small number of troops, and had no artillery, arms, or ammunition. He therefore attempted to take Hull by correspondence. In the execution of this design, he made use of Mr. Beckwith, a gentleman of Beverly, who had a son-in-law, officer in Hull. But this officer discovered the plot to the governor, who sent the King word, he might save himself the trouble of carrying on the contrivance, and at the same time sent an express to the Parliament. Beckwith retiring to the King at York, the Parliament dispatched a messenger to seize and bring him to London: but the messenger was not permitted to execute his orders.

From that time, the King and the Parliament prepared for war. But as each stood in need of the people to bear the expence, so each used all possible endeavours to gain them, by demonstrating the justice of the contrary party, and by striving to convince them, that their good was only intended.

The Queen was now busy in Holland in procuring artillery, arms, ammunition, and several officers of the English troops in the Dutch service. Most of the Yorkshire gentlemen, the largest county in England, were for him, and he did not question, but by their means he should engage the whole county to declare in his favour. With this assistance, he hoped to prevent the Parliament, and raise a sufficient number of forces to take Hull, before the Parliament should be able to oppose it. He expected also, that when he was master of Hull and Portsmouth, and had received arms from Holland, many, who were still restrained by the fear of wanting protection, would openly take his part. Moreover, he gave private notice to all his friends, that it was time to repair to York, and ordered letters to be sent in his name to such members as adhered to him, to absent themselves from the Parliament, and retire to York, or to other places where they could be serviceable to him.

All these measures could not be taken so privately but the Parliament had some information, and therefore the King endeavoured to give them some colour, to hinder his designs from being discovered. After his disappointment at Hull, he summoned all the Yorkshire tenants in chief, to appear at York the 12th of May.

Shortly after, both Houses sent a committee to York, under pretence of bringing the King a message about Hull and the militia, but, in reality, to be spies upon his actions. This message was the more disagreeable to him, as after having returned an answer, and dismissed the committee, they told him they had orders to stay at York.

The 12th of May, his Majesty made a speech to the gentry of the county of York, wherein he protested, "That the enjoying of quiet was the chief cause of his coming among them in the north, and not to make that part of the kingdom a seat of war, as malice would make them believe." He added, "that both Houses of Parliament did, by their messengers, brave him even in York; and that, as his magazine of Hull was going, directly against his will, to be taken from him, and the militia to be put in execution against law and his consent; and lastly, as Sir John Hotham's treason was countenanced, none could blame him for apprehending danger. Therefore he was resolved to have a guard, in which he desired their concurrence and assistance."

The Yorkshire gentry being variously disposed, it was not possible for the hearers of the King's speech, to agree in the same answer. It is even said, some violence was used by the court, to exclude from the debate such as were known to be opposite to the King, and that these were forced to assemble elsewhere. For this reason the King received four different answers to his proposition, two whereof were favourable, and the other two besought him to hearken to the advice of his Parliament. The guard however was raised, and the command thereof given to the Prince of Wales.

The King would have also removed the courts of justice from Westminster to York, and even sent a proclamation to the Lord Keeper Littleton for that purpose, with orders to publish it. But the Parliament having notice of it, forbade him to execute the orders.

Serjeant Major General Skippon being an excellent officer, and the King knowing the Parliament designed to employ him, sent for him to attend him at York. But the Parliament gave him orders to the contrary, which Skippon obeyed. This doubtless was foreseen by the King, but he was very glad to show that the Parliament desired a war, since they so haughtily contradicted his orders,

The Earl of Bristol, though he had no great reason to be pleased with the King, made his last effort to procure an accommodation, by a speech in the House of Peers. He represented, that the thing was not impossible, if it was sincerely endeavoured. After having enumerated all the mischiefs of a civil war, and the calamities it is usually attended with, he moved to appoint a select committee of both Houses, truly to state all the differences between the King and the Parliament, with the most probable ways of reconciling them; what the King ought to do to satisfy the people, and what security he should give. He added several other things, which plainly showed, he inclined to the King's side; and because, withal, he mentioned religion but very slightly and in general terms, his speech had no great effect.

The same, or the next day, the Commons voted:

"I. That it appeared, that the King, seduced by wicked counsels, intended to make war against the Parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, had proposed no other end unto themselves, but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person.

"II. That whensoever the King made war upon the Parliament, it would be a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of the government.

"III. That whosoever should serve or assist him in such wars, would be traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom; and had been so adjudged by two acts of Parliament, and ought to suffer as traitors, 11 Rich. II. 1 Hen. IV."

May the 22d, the Lord Keeper Littleton delivered the great seal to be carried to the King, and followed it himself the next morning, before the Parliament had any knowledge of it.

The 23d, both Houses sent a petition to the King, to desire him to disband the horse and foot raised under colour of a guard for his person. They told him, if he did not dismiss these forces, they should be obliged to preserve the peace of the kingdom by the most proper per means. The King returned a very sharp answer to this petition, reproaching both Houses, that they had raised a guard for themselves, and ordered the sheriffs to oppose with the power of the counties, such as should be drawn together by the King's command.*

The Earl of Bristol, in his speech to the Lords, the 20th of May, observed, that it was not impossible to propound and settle the differences between the King and the Parliament; but that the great difficulty consisted in finding such security, as might stand with the King's honour, and the people's satisfaction. He chiefly insisted upon this, that the King offering to give reasonable security, they were not to reject the offer, and charge themselves with the events of a war. As this offer, though made in very general terms, appeared plausible, the Parliament was apprehensive, it would make some impression on the people. And therefore, they judged it necessary, to show that the King, by this general offer, did however offer only his word for security, which could not be a firm foundation of a good agreement. To this end, they sent him, the 2d of June, nineteen propositions, which they considered as proper to establish a good peace, and strict union between the King and the Parliament. They required, that no man should remain in the council, who was not agreeable to Parliament; that no deed of the King's should have validity, unless it passed the council, and was attested under their hand; that all the officers of state and principal judges should be chosen with consent of Parliament, and enjoy their offices for life; that none of the royal family should marry without consent of Parliament or council; that the laws should be executed against Catholics; that the votes of Popish Lords should be excluded; that the reformation of the liturgy and church government should have place, according to advice of Parliament; that the ordinance, with regard to the militia, be submitted to; that the justice of Parliament pass upon all delinquents; that a general pardon be granted, with such exceptions as should be advised by Parliament; that the forts and castles be disposed of by consent of Parliament; and that no Peer be made but with consent of both Houses.—— "Should I grant these demands," said the King in reply, "I may be waited on bareheaded; I may have my hand kissed; the title of Majesty may be continued to me; and the King's authority, signified by both Houses, may still be the style of your commands; I may have swords and maces carried before me, and please myself with the sight of a crown and sceptre (though even these twigs would not long flourish, when the stock upon which they grew was dead:) but as to true and real power, I should remain but the outside, but the picture, but the sign of a King."

It is easy to see, that neither the Parliament propositions, nor the King's answer, were proper to beget an accommodation. Accordingly, it may be affirmed, that neither side thought of any such thing. When the King published his answer, he had received some arms, ammunition, and pieces of ordnance from Holland, and besides that, was preparing to besiege Hull. Though great part of the arms were now removed to London, he hoped still to find there sufficient for his most urgent occasions. Moreover, this place, which was one of the strongest in the kingdom, could be of great service to him, to keep the adjacent country in his interest.

On the other hand, the Presbyterian party, who then prevailed in the Parliament, had almost attained their desire, that is, had brought things to a rupture, which gave them room to hope, they should quickly have opportunity to accomplish the rest of their project. Indeed, this rupture between the King and the Parliament being supposed, it was manifest, the kingdom was to be governed by the Parliament and the King, separately, and not jointly, as before, that is, they would each govern those of their party; in which case, the Parliament would have no more occasion for the King's consent, who would be looked upon as an enemy, and consequently, they might ordain whatever they pleased, without any opposition. This was precisely the point to which all the proceedings of the Presbyterian party had tended, without their discovering themselves however, any more than was necessary to support the expectations of their adherents.

The Parliament having received advice from Holland, that the Queen had pawned or sold some of the crown jewels at Amsterdam, published the 2d of June, an order, declaring, that whosoever was concerned in the selling or pawning these jewels, or in the bringing any money to the King, by way of bill of exchange, or otherwise, should be accounted an enemy to the state. But the Queen had already laid out the money in purchasing arms and ammunition, which she had conveyed to the King, in a small ship called the Providence, which, the very day the Parliament published this order, safely arrived in Burlington bay, after having been warmly pursued by part of the Parliament's fleet, commanded by the Earl of Warwick.†

Some time before, the King, finding a war unavoidable, had ordered his friends in both Houses, to absent themselves from the Parliament. He hoped, by lessening so considerably the number of the members, to lessen the credit of the Parliament. But this policy turned not to his advantage. It is true, both Houses were considerably lessened in number. But withal, the King's party there grew so weak, that they could no longer oppose the resolutions taken against the King. Though the two Houses were not sorry to be rid of these spies, they believed it was necessary to take some measures, either to hinder a greater desertion, or to convince the people, it was not their fault if the Parliament was not so numerous as hitherto. The Commons therefore ordered all the sheriffs of the kingdom, to give notice to the representatives to attend the House by the 16th of June, on the forfeiture of one hundred pounds, to be employed in the wars in Ireland, and on pain of undergoing such farther punishment as the House should think fit.

But the Lords went still farther, for they ordered nine of their members,‡ who had repaired to the King at York, to appear at the bar the 8th of June as delinquents. These nine Lords having sent their excuse by a letter, the Commons forthwith prepared an impeachment against them, and sent it up to the Lords. The 20th of July the Peers pronounced sentence against the nine Lords, declaring, they should not sit or vote in the House during the present Parliament, and should stand committed to the Tower during the pleasure of the House.

On the 10th of June, both Houses gave a more evident proof of their design; for upon receiving advice, that the King was actually giving out commissions to levy forces, they published proposals for the bringing in of money or plate, at eight per cent, for the defence of the kingdom.

The King having notice of what the Parliament had done for the speedy raising of money, wrote to the Lord Mayor of London, commanding him to publish his letter, wherein he forbade the citizens to lend any money to both Houses. This letter occasioned their publishing a declaration, the aim whereof was to show the people, that the Parliament was under an absolute necessity of preparing for their defence. They said, his Majesty having so often threatened them about Hull and the militia, they could not but consider his preparations as a design to levy war against his Parliament.

The King made to this declaration a long answer, full of reproaches of the illegal proceedings of both Houses against

* This order was dated May 17, and was repeated again May 28, together with an order to all high sheriffs, justices of peace, and other officers, within one hundred and fifty miles of York, to stay all arms and ammunition going to that city.

† The Providence ran ashore upon Holderness coast in Kenningham Creek. There were on board of her, sixteen pieces of ordnance, and great store of arms and ammunition. Two or three thousand arms, and two hundred barrels of gun-powder, says Lord Clarendon.

against him. He did not deny, that he intended to have justice in the cases of Hull and the militia, or lose his life in acquiring it; and affirmed, that this was no proof of a design to make war against the Parliament, but only of his intention to defend himself against their attacks. The Parliament said the same thing on their part, and each endeavoured to cast the blame of the war on the opposite party. In short, the Parliament, weary of these paper skirmishes, prohibited, by a printed order, the publishing any declarations or papers in the King's name, that should be contrary to the ordinances of the Parliament.*

The King, before he came to an open declaration, had a mind to execute two designs he had formed. The first was, to become master of the fleet; the second, to besiege Hull. The project of the fleet was solely founded in the expectation, that the captains of the ships would declare for him as soon as commanded. In this belief, he wrote to each captain in particular, requiring him, without delay, and without demanding the orders of his superiors, to bring away his ship to Burlington Bay, and yield no further obedience to the Earl of Warwick. He sent withal a letter to the Earl of Warwick, to discharge him from the command of the fleet. The letters to the captains were to be delivered, as indeed they were, before that directed to the Earl of Warwick. The King dispatched at the same time a messenger to London, to carry to the Earl of Northumberland a revocation of his commission of Admiral, under the Great Seal. The Earl of Warwick, who was then on shore, having notice of what passed in the fleet, went immediately on board his ship, and summoned all the captains to attend him at a council of war. All obeyed, notwithstanding the King's orders, except five, who united together to make their defence, in case they should be attacked. The rest protested to their Admiral, they would obey his commands. As soon as he had secured these last, he caused them to come to an anchor round the five others, to force them to submit. But three of them thought fit to come in upon a summons. The two that still remained obstinate, suffered themselves to be shamefully taken by unarmed boats, and were sent to London. Thus the King was disappointed of his aim, for which, though of great importance, he had not doubtless taken very proper measures.†

After this fruitless attempt, the King believed it in vain to dissemble any longer, and that he must at last begin the war. To that end, he ordered the Earls of Newcastle to secure the town of Newcastle; which was performed, though with some difficulty, and then he caused also Tinmouth castle to be seized. At the same time, he sent many Lords and Gentlemen into their respective shires to levy forces, and by a patent under the Great Seal, appointed the Earl of Hertford, his Lieutenant-General of the western counties. He kept near his person the Earl of Lindsey, to be, under him, General of his army. Sir Jacob Ashley was General of the foot; and the place of General of the horse, was reserved for Prince Rupert, the King's nephew, and brother to the Elector Palatine, who was daily expected.

Though the King had pretended to raise only a guard for his person, it was found however, that in the beginning of July, he had about three thousand foot, and seven or eight hundred horse, with which he resolved to march to Hull. He stayed some days at Beverly, and published a proclamation, to signify his intention to besiege Hull, and the reasons that induced him thereto. Three days after, he sent a proclamation to the Parliament, with a message, requiring them, that the town of Hull might be forthwith delivered to him.

Before the Parliament received this message, they had resolved to present a petition to his Majesty, to pray him, in a very humble manner, to forbear all preparations for war; to remove his forces from about Hull; to dismiss his troops; to send away his garrisons from Newcastle, Tinmouth, and other places; for which they promised also, on their part, to discontinue all the preparations they had been forced to make for their defence. The King returned a long answer in writing to this petition. He made likewise some propositions to both Houses, allowing them to the 27th of July for a full and positive answer.

The Parliament having returned an unsatisfactory answer to the propositions, the King resolved to begin the siege of Hull. But this enterprise was so unsuccessful, that after having been some time before the town, without making any progress, he was obliged to raise the siege, or rather blockade, and return to York. The Earl of Clarendon says, the King undertook the siege of Hull, upon the assurance given him by Sir John Hotham, that he would surrender the town at the first

* It has been observed, that each party was now willing to throw on its antagonist the odium of commencing a civil war; but both of them prepared for an event, which they deemed inevitable. To gain the people's favour and good opinion, was the chief point on both sides. Never was there a people less corrupted by vice, and more actuated by principle than the English during that period: never were there individuals who possessed more capacity, more courage, more public spirit, more disinterested zeal. The infusion of one ingredient, in too large a proportion, had corrupted all these noble principles, and converted them into the most virulent poison. To determine his choice in the approaching contests, every man hearkened with avidity to the reasons proposed on both sides. The war of the pen preceded that of the sword, and daily sharpened the humours of the opposite parties. Besides private adventurers without number, the King and Parliament themselves carried on the controversy, by messages, remonstrances, and declarations; where the nation was really the party to whom all arguments were addressed. Charles had here a double advantage. Not only his cause was more favourable, as supporting the ancient government in church and state against the most illegal pretensions: it was also defended with more art and eloquence. Lord Falkland had accepted the office of secretary, a man who adorned the purest virtue with the richest gifts of nature, and the most valuable acquisitions of learning. By him, assisted by the King himself, were the memorials of the royal party chiefly composed. So sensible was Charles of his superiority in this particular, that he took care to disperse every where the papers of the Parliament together with his own, that the people might be the more enabled, by comparison, to form a judgment between them. The Parliament while they distributed copies of their own, were anxious to suppress all the King's compositions.—To clear up the principles of the constitution, to mark the boundaries of the powers entrusted by law to the several members, to shew what great improvements the whole political system had received from the King's late concessions, to demonstrate his entire confidence in his people, and his reliance on their affections, to point out the ungrateful returns which had been made him, and the enormous encroachments, insults, and indignities, to which he had been exposed; these were the topics, which, with so much justness of reasoning and propriety of expression, were insisted on in the King's declarations and remonstrances. In some of these declarations, at first supposed to be penned by Lord Falkland, but which Lord Clarendon subsequently ascribed to the King himself, is found the first regular definition of the constitution, according to our present idea of it, that occurs in any English composition; at least any published by authority. The three species of government, monarchical, aristocratical, and democratical, are there plainly distinguished, and the English government is expressly said to be none of them pure, but all of them mixed and tempered together. This style, though the sense of it was implied in many constitutions, no former King of England would have used, and no subject would have been permitted to use. Banks and the crown-lawyers against Hambden, in the case of ship money, insist plainly, and openly, on the King's absolute and sovereign power, and the opposite lawyers do not deny it: they only assert, that the subjects have also a fundamental property in their goods, and that no part of them can be taken but by their own consent in Parliament. But that the Parliament was instituted to check and controul the King, and share the supreme power, would, in all former times have been esteemed very blunt and indiscreet, if not illegal language. We need not be surprised that government should long continue, though the boundaries of authority, in their several branches, be implicit, confused, and undetermined. This is the case over all the world. Who can draw an exact law between the spiritual and temporal powers in Catholic states? What code ascertained the precise authority of the Roman Senate, in every occurrence? Perhaps the English is the first mixed government, where the authority of every part has been very accurately defined; and yet there still remain many very important questions between the two houses, that, by common consent, are buried in a discreet silence. The King's power is indeed more exactly limited: but this period, of which we now treat, is the time at which that accuracy commenced. It appears from Warwick and Hobbes, that many royalists blamed this philosophical precision, and thought that the veil was very imprudently drawn off the mysteries of government. It is certain, that liberty reaped mighty advantages from these controversies and inquiries; and the royal authority itself became more secure, within these provinces which were assigned to it.

† Sir John Pennington, it seems, having refused to undertake the business, each captain, as is said above, had orders to bring away his ship; but Pennington altered his mind, the dispatches were altered too, and the captains were commanded in their letters to follow Pennington's orders, who not coming time enough, the project came to nothing. Had the first letters gone, the five ships above-mentioned might have gone off.

shot, but that it was not possible for Hotham to perform his word.*

The King as before observed, had, some months since, gained Colonel Goring, Governor of Portsmouth, who, feigning to keep the place for the Parliament, held it indeed for the King. He received money from both sides, to reinforce the garrison and raise new works, the Parliament not mistrusting him, and the King relying on his word. At last, about the time the King was before Hull, Goring openly declared for him. This happened in the beginning of August, but three weeks after the Parliament had issued orders for levying an army, to be commanded by the Earl of Essex.† This army not being yet ready, both Houses, though astonished at Goring's defection, were not however discouraged. As it was of the utmost importance to recover this place, the strongest in the kingdom, before the King should be able to relieve it, they hastily dispatched a committee, whom they empowered to assemble the militia of the neighbouring counties, to block up Portsmouth by land, whilst the Earl of Warwick, by their order, blocked it up by sea. Happily for the Parliament, Goring, though he had received from them three thousand pounds, and the like sum from the King, had neglected to lay in the necessary provisions for a siege, and particularly corn and salt, so that in the very beginning of the blockade, he perceived, he could not resist long. This made him resolve to capitulate. He surrendered the place to the committee, only for liberty to retire into Holland, and for his officers to repair to the King.

During the blockade of Portsmouth, the King not doubting but Goring was in condition to defend that place, published at last a declaration that had long been prepared, wherein he summed up all the complaints he had already made against both Houses; declared both Houses guilty of high-treason, and forbade all his subjects to obey them: at the same time was also published a proclamation, requiring all men who could bear arms, to repair to him by the 25th of August, at Nottingham, where he intended to set up his royal standard, which all good subjects were obliged to attend.

Whilst the day appointed for the setting up of the standard was expected, the King endeavoured to augment the number of his forces. He gave out fresh commissions, and sent the Earl of Hertford and some other Lords and Gentlemen to manage his concerns, and raise troops, in the western parts. For himself, he departed from York, some days before the 25th of August, and in his way took Lincoln, whence he drew the arms of the trained-bands for his troops, after which he came to Nottingham, and the next day reviewed his horse.

The review was no sooner ended, but he was informed that two regiments of foot were marching to Coventry by the Earl of Essex's orders. Whereupon he hasted thither with his cavalry, consisting of seven or eight hundred horse, in hopes of preventing the Parliament's forces, and possessing himself of that city. Accordingly he arrived there the day before the two regiments: but the Mayor of the city, though without a garrison, shut the gates against him, and fired upon his men. He was very sensibly touched with this indignity; but as there was no remedy, he was forced to return to Nottingham, leaving the command of his cavalry to Commissary-General Wilmot.

The next day, his horse being upon a plain of five or six miles extent, where nothing incumbered them, had a clear view of a body of twelve hundred of the enemies' foot, guarded only by one troop of horse. Wilmot, it seemed, could not have wished for a fairer opportunity to attack with advantage this body of foot, who had nothing to secure them. But, for what reason it is not known, instead of attacking the enemies, he thought only of avoiding them, and even retreated with some precipitation. This was a bad omen to a war just commenced.

At last, on the 25th of August, the King caused his standard to be erected on a turret of Nottingham castle, having with him only some unarmed trained-bands. His proclamation had produced so little effect, that few were come to attend the royal standard. It happened, even, the very day the standard was erected, to grow so tempestuous, that it was blown down, and could not be fixed again in a day or two. This was looked upon by many as a fatal presage of the war.‡

* The Lord Digby coming privately to the King at York, from beyond sea, and not finding matters as he expected, resolved to go back to the Queen, and hasten the supply of arms, but was taken at sea by the ships that were chasing the Providence, and brought disguised like a Frenchman into Hull, where discovering himself to Sir John Hotham, he prevailed with him, according to the Lord Clarendon, to promise to surrender the town, if the King would come before it, and make but one shot. And this, he says, induced the King to march to Beverly, in order to besiege Hull, before he had any thing in readiness for such an undertaking.

† Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford; was, on July 14, appointed General of the horse.

‡ Carte, in his life of the Duke of Osmond, informs us, that when the bust of Berneni was carried to the King's house, at Chelsea, his Majesty, with a train of nobility, went to take a view of it, and that, "As they were viewing it, a hawk flew over their heads, with a partridge in his claws, which he had wounded to death. Some of the partridges blood fell on the neck of the statue, where it always remained, without being wiped off."

BOOK XX.

COMPRISING THE THIRD AND LAST PART OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES I.

THE King had imagined, that the setting up of his standard would draw great numbers of people to Nottingham, who would come and offer him their service: but he was very much disappointed. He had with him but three hundred foot, and some trained-bands drawn together by Sir John Digby, sheriff of the county. His cavalry consisted only of eight hundred horse, and his artillery was still at York, whence it was difficult to bring it, many things being yet wanted to prepare and form it for marching, and there were no foot to guard it. Nevertheless, as he had given out many commissions, and ordered his forces to repair to Nottingham, he expected them in that town, though not without danger, the Parliament having at Coventry five thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse. Thus the King was in a very melancholy state before the war was well begun. He had appointed the Earl of Lindsey for General; but had yet no army. The Princes Rupert and Maurice his nephews, brothers of the Elector Palatine, having come to offer him their service in the beginning of September, he made Prince Rupert, General of his horse, quartered at Leicester, whither the Prince went and took upon him the command.

The King, it is certain, was in extreme danger at Nottingham. The town was not in condition to make a long resistance, and the King having scarcely any forces, if the Parliament's troops, which were within twenty miles of the place, had marched directly to him, he must have been forced to retire with dishonour to York, unless he would have hazarded his being made prisoner. All those about him saw the danger; but it was not easy to avoid it, without quitting Nottingham, which could not but be very prejudicial to him. For this reason it was moved in the council, to send a message to both Houses, with some overture to incline them to a treaty. The intent of this proposition, was doubtless to intimate to the King, that his affairs were in such a situation, that peace alone could free him from the perplexity and danger he was exposed to. But the mover of this advice could hardly think, that a bare offer of peace was able to effect it, after what had passed before the rupture. Very likely, therefore, his design was that, in proposing a peace, something more should be offered, than what had been offered before. The King easily perceived the intimation, and was so offended at it, that he broke up the council, that it might be no longer urged.

However, the next day the same motion was renewed, but under a different view. As it was doubtless perceived, that what had offended the King, was the plain meaning of proposing a peace, namely, that his Majesty must depart from some of his pretensions, care was taken to remove this odious meaning, and it was advised only to send a message to both Houses, in order to gain time. The King still opposed it, alledging, to offer peace in such a juncture, would be dicovering his weakness: that his enemies would reject the offer with insolence, and nothing but dishonour would thereby reflect on himself. But it was represented to him, that such a message might do good, but could do no harm: that indeed, both Houses, very likely, would reject the offer, but they would thereby render themselves odious to the people, who were desirous of peace, and who would be the more inclined to serve his Majesty, for his endeavours to procure it: that if the overture was accepted, the King would have an opportunity of demonstrating, that the war, on his part, was purely defensive: in short, that the bare offer of peace would of course retard the preparations of the Parliament, because men's minds would be in suspense, whilst the King's levies might be continued by virtue of the commissions already sent out.*

The King yielded to these reasons, because the point was not to offer any new conditions, but only to lay a snare for the Parliament, and retard their preparations. This was the sole motive of the message, wherein the King proposed nothing new, and which, however, he represented afterwards as an evident sign of his sincere desire of peace. Some pretend, that his Majesty's message, and the Parliament's refusal, contributed much to facilitate the King's levies, and undeceive the people of their good opinion of the intentions of both Houses. If the bare overture of a treaty was capable of keeping people in suspence, and retarding the Parliament's levies, it might also have the same effect with regard to the King's.†

Be this as it will, the message was sent three days after the setting up of the standard, by the Earl of Southampton, Sir John Culpepper, and some others.‡

He propounded to both Houses, "That some persons might be by them enabled, to treat with the like number authorized by him, in such a manner, and with such freedom of debate, as might best tend to the peace of the kingdom. And he assured them, that nothing should be wanting on his part, which might advance the Protestant religion, oppose popery, secure the laws of the land, and confirm all just power and privileges of Parliament. If this proposition should be rejected, he protested, he had done his duty so amply, that God would absolve him from any of the guilt of that blood which must be spilt."

As the war was sufficiently proclaimed by the erecting of the standard, it seems, the King should have demanded a safe-conduct for his messengers. But though he had neglected to take this precaution, they pretended to go and sit in their respective places, without any previous notice. The Lords, offended at the Earl of Southampton's boldness, called upon him to withdraw, and ordered him to send his message in writing, and wait for an answer out of London. The Commons also obliged Culpepper to deliver his message at the bar, at which the King took great offence.

* The Earl of Southampton, a nobleman greatly distinguished for his talents, was the chief author of the advice.

† It is judiciously observed by Acherly, that those on whom the Parliament's representations prevailed, were generally people of the midland counties, and the traders in the southern parts of the kingdom, who had smarted most by the arbitrary acts of power, such as seizures of goods, prosecutions for ship-money, loans, tonnage and poundage, illegal imprisonment, &c. Those on whom the King's representations prevailed, were generally his subjects in the farthest parts of the nation, in Wales, Cornwall, Cumberland, &c. who were the least sensible, and had been the least afflicted with the late pressures and sufferings; after the King's departing from the known laws.

‡ The Earl of Dorset, and Sir William Uvedale, knight.

The answer of both Houses to his Majesty's message was, "That notwithstanding their endeavours to prevent the distracted estate of the kingdom, nothing had followed the proclamations and declarations against both Houses of Parliament, whereby their actions were declared treasonable, and their persons traitors. So that until those proclamotions were recalled, and the standard taken down, they could not, by the fundamental privileges of Parliament, give his Majesty any other answer to his message."

The King's messengers being returned to Nottingham with this answer, "His Majesty," says Lord Clarendon, "was contented to make so much farther use of their pride and passion, as to give them occasion, by another message, to publish more of it to the people." He said in his reply: "That he never designed to declare both Houses of Parliament traitors, or set up his standard against them, and much less to put them and the kingdom out of his protection; he utterly professed against it before God and the world. But he promised, that if a day were appointed by them for the revoking of their declarations against all persons as traitors or otherwise for assisting him, he would, with all cheerfulness, upon the same day, recal his proclamations and declarations, and take down his standard."

The two Houses answered, "That his Majesty not having taken down his standard, recalled his proclamations and declarations, whereby he had declared the actions of both Houses of Parliament to be treasonable, and their persons traitors, and having published the same since his message, they could not recede from their former answer. That if his Majesty would recall his declarations, and return to his Parliament, he should find such expressions of their fidelities and duties, that his safety, honour, and greatness could only be found in the affections of his people, and the sincere counsels of his Parliament, who deserved better of his Majesty, and could never allow themselves, representing likewise the whole kingdom, to be ballanced with those who gave evil counsels to his Majesty."

Both Houses perceiving, that the King's aim was to keep the people in suspense by an uncertain expectation of peace, published a declaration, protesting, they would never lay down their arms till his Majesty had left the delinquents to the justice of the Parliament.

The King failed not, to make use of the answers of both Houses to his two messages, in a third which he sent to them, saying, "That let all the world judge who had used most endeavours to prevent the present distractions, either he who had condescended to desire and press it, or the two Houses, who had refused to enter into a negotiation. That for the future, if they desired a treaty of him, he should remember that the blood which was to be spilt in this quarrel was that of his subjects, and therefore would return to his Parliament, as soon as the causes which had made him absent himself from it should be removed."

Both Houses finding, the King's design was to render their refusal to treat, odious to the people, returned a stronger and more particular answer to this message than they had made to the two first; which, in its turn, drew forth a more detailed rejoinder from the King.

During these paper skirmishes, both sides prepared for war. The Earl of Essex having ordered his forces to assemble at Northampton, departed from London the 9th of September to head the army; and having reviewed them, found about sixteen thousand men well armed, and well appointed with a good train of artillery. Then the King, perceiving he could no longer remain at Nottingham with safety, marched towards the borders of Wales with his troops,* which were yet so few in number, that they did not deserve the name of an army. He was unresolved in what place to expect the forces that were to come to him from several parts: but intended to secure, if possible, Shrewsbury or Chester, without knowing however, whether either of these towns would receive him, the Parliament having in all those parts very active and vigilant agents, who employed all their pains to procure them adherents. For this reason the King marched but very slowly. When he came to Wellington, about seven miles from Shrewsbury, he drew his little army together, and caused his military orders for the discipline thereof to be read before them; after which he took occasion to make a speech to his soldiers, and the better to satisfy them of his good intentions to the public, he made the following protestation.

"I do promise, in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, that I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true Reformed Protestant religion established in the church of England, and by the grace of God, in the same will live and die.

"I desire to govern by all the known laws of the land, and that the liberty and property of the subject may be by them preserved, with the same care as my own just rights. And if it please God, by a blessing upon this army, raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from this rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the just privileges and freedom of Parliament, and to govern by the known laws of the land to my utmost power, and particularly to observe inviolably the laws consented to by me in this Parliament.

"In the meanwhile, if this time of war, and the great necessity and straits I am now driven to, beget any violation of those, I hope it shall be imputed by God and man to the authority of this war, and not to me, who have so earnestly laboured for the preservation of the peace of this kingdom.

"When I willingly fail in these particulars, I will expect no aid or relief from any man, or protection from heaven: but in this resolution, I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of God's blessing."

The King was not contented with making this protestation to his army, but moreover, in all the considerable places he passed through, he assembled the inhabitants, and endeavoured to convince them of the sincerity of his intentions.

From Wellington the King marched to Shrewsbury, having received the agreeable news that the town had declared in his favour, and the inhabitants would give him a joyful reception. Here he resolved to fix his head quarters, and appoint the rendezvous of his army. This was a very convenient place to expect the troops which were levying for him in Wales, Yorkshire, and Lancashire, and to send for his ordnance, which had not been able to follow him to Nottingham, for want of horses. This had forced him to make use of a hundred draught horses sent by the Parliament to Chester, to be transported into Ireland. He desired to have the Earl of Leicester's consent, who was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and was then with him at Nottingham. But the Earl constantly refusing to give any orders about these horses, bought with the Parliament's money, the King gained one Errington, a servant of the Earl's, who took them and delivered them to the King. This the Parliament taxed the King with. As for arms, the King not having a sufficient quantity for all the troops that were to come from divers parts, had taken the arms of the militia in all the places through which he passed: but it was by way of loan, that is, he obtained the consent of the officers of the militia to take away their arms, on promise of restoring them. As soon as the King came to Shrewsbury, (September 20,) the number of his troops so considerably increased, that in a few days he had an army of ten thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with which he was entirely secured from the danger he was in, whilst his army was forming.

* He marched from Nottingham to Derby, Stafford, Leicester; and so to Shrewsbury, where he set up a mint.

he

It is something strange, that the Earl of Essex should neither molest the King while at Nottingham, nor in his march to Shrewsbury. The King made an advantage of this error, to assemble all his forces at the latter town, and provide himself with money, which he wanted extremely. His friends at London had taken care of this last article, and privately sent considerable sums to Oxford. Moreover, the University, which had always been firmly attached to the King, had engaged to deliver to him all the plate belonging to the colleges, which was very considerable. The point was only how to convey this aid safely to his Majesty. To that end, the King sent thither Sir John Byron, with a small detachment of horse, not daring to give him a stronger, for fear of raising a suspicion, that it was for some considerable affair. Byron coming to Oxford, received the money and plate, and returned towards Shrewsbury by way of Worcester, taking all possible precautions not to be attacked in his march. For this aid of money, which the King could not be without, was of the utmost importance to him. Wherefore, the better to secure it, he detached Prince Rupert with a body of horse, who marched on the other side of the Severn to Worcester to meet Byron, and guard him to Shrewsbury.

In the meantime, the Earl of Essex, after staying some days at Northampton, and securing Warwick, resolved to fix his head quarters at Worcester. To that purpose, he sent Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes before, who came to Worcester at break of day, some hours after Sir John Byron had entered with his convoy. Fiennes, at his arrival being told, that there were some of the King's horse in the town, the number whereof he did not know, hastily retreated, without making any attempt. Presently after, Prince Rupert arrived, and to secure Byron's convoy, who was resting himself in order to march on, passed through the town, and posted himself, with his horse, at some distance on the other side. As he did not believe there were any enemies in those parts, he was not very careful to hinder many of his troopers from staying in the town. When he came to the place he had chosen, he alighted with his brother Prince Maurice, and most of the officers, reposing themselves on the ground. On a sudden they perceived, within musket shot, five hundred horse of the enemy marching up a narrow lane. These were a body commanded by Colonel Sandys, whom the Earl of Essex had sent before to take possession of Worcester. Prince Rupert instantly mounting his horse, without a moment's hesitation, charged these troops, as they came out of the lane, and the charge was so vigorous, that the enemy was entirely routed, and Sandys slain, with thirty of his men. This action gained the Prince a great name, not only for the valour he shewed, but chiefly for his sudden and very seasonable resolution, in attacking his enemies when they least expected it. This action, how little important soever it was, failed not to strike great terror into the Parliament's troops, chiefly by reason of Prince Rupert's activity and courage, who afterwards gave them cause to be confirmed in their high opinion of his valour. But though he had gained some little advantage, he did not think fit to expect the enemy at Worcester. He went from thence some hours after, and safely conducted the convoy of money to Shrewsbury, where the King immediately ordered the plate to be coined. The next day, the Earl of Essex possessed himself of Worcester, and making some stay there, secured in the meanwhile, Hereford, Gloucester, and Bristol.

The King finding himself at the head of an army little inferior in number to the Earl of Essex's, and perceiving, it was not sufficient to remain in quiet at Shrewsbury, whilst the enemy was taking, without resistance, the principal towns in the heart of the kingdom, believed he ought to seek means to put a speedy conclusion to the war. There were two: one was to fight the enemies, the other, to gain some marches upon them, and appear before London, before they could arrive. The King took the latter course, in the expectation that he should raise an universal consternation in London, which might afford his friends opportunity to serve him effectually. So, on a sudden beginning to march the 12th of October, with his army, which was not much incumbered with baggage, there being not one tent, and but little artillery, he quartered that night at Bridgenorth, ten miles from Shrewsbury, next day he came to Wolverhampton, the third day to Birmingham, and the fourth to Kenelworth, where he rested one day. It was two days before the Earl of Essex had notice of his march, and began to follow him. It evidently appears by the King's route, that if he was not in quest of the enemies, at least he feared them not, since he could not be ignorant how easy it was for the Earl of Essex, either to put himself in his way, or overtake him. In all likelihood, he imagined the Earl would not dare to hazard a battle, or that being much more incumbered with baggage and artillery, his march would be considerably retarded. Be this as it will, it was not till the 22d of October, that the two armies came within six miles of one another, without having received any notice of each other's march, till that day. But what is still more surprising, is, that the King, to whom speed was so necessary, had so little advanced in five days; since, leaving Kenelworth the 17th, he was on the 22d, but four miles north of Banbury, and that the Earl of Essex, who departed the 15th from Worcester, should be only at Keinton the 22d, which is not above twenty miles. The King, who till then knew not where the Earl of Essex was, lay encamped near a village called Edgcot, where he had intelligence the 22d in the night, that the enemies were at Keinton, about six miles distant. He found then it would be very difficult to execute his design upon London, whilst he should be so closely followed by the enemies. And therefore he resolved to give them battle. To that end, he drew up his army on Edge-hill, whence might be seen all Keinton plain, where the Parliament's army stood in battle array, the 23d in the morning. The fight began not, however, till three in the afternoon.* The Earl of Essex had a strong reason not to be in haste. Not imagining himself so near a battle, he had left behind two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, with his artillery, and consequently, delay could not but be advantageous to him.

Prince Rupert, who commanded the King's right wing of horse,† marching down the hill, and advancing to charge the enemy's left wing, on a sudden, Sir Faithful Fortescue, who commanded a troop of the Parliament's horse, moving forward with his whole troop from the gross of the cavalry, and joining Prince Rupert, with his highness, charged those he had deserted.‡ This unexpected accident inspired the Parliament's horse with such a terror, each man looking upon his companion as upon an enemy, that they were entirely routed, and pursued above two miles from the field of battle. By this unadvised pursuit, the King was in danger of the same fate which his predecessor Henry III. had at the battle of Lewes. The Parliament's right wing stood their ground no better than the left. They ran away full speed, and were pursued with the same fury and imprudence. What was moreover fatal to the King, was, that his reserve of a regiment of horse, thinking the victory unquestionable, by the flight of the enemies' cavalry, with spurs and loose reins followed the chase, and could not be hindered by their commanders.

* Lord Clarendon says, though the horse were ready, the foot were quartered at such a distance, that many regiments marched seven or eight miles to the rendezvous, so that it was one o'clock before the King's forces moved.

† The left wing was commanded by Commissary-General Wilmot, assisted by Sir Arthur Aston. The Earl of Lindsey led the foot, and next to him was his son the Lord Willoughby, with the King's regiment.——On the Parliament's side: their right wing, which consisted of three regiments of horse, was commanded by Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Balfour, and the Lord Fielding. Sir John Meldrum's brigade led the van, Colonel Essex was in the middle, and Colonel Ballard, and Hollis, and the Lord Brooke, in the rear. In the left wing were twenty-four troops of horse, commanded by Sir James Ramsey.

‡ Sir Faithful Fortescue was come from Ireland to hasten supplies, and had a troop of horse raised for him for that service, but his troops had been disposed into the Parliament's army, and he was now Major to Sir William Waller.

All this while the foot of both armies were engaged without victory's inclining to either side. But at last, Sir William Balfour, to whom the Earl of Essex had given the command of the reserve, turned the scale. As soon as he saw the King's horse employed in the pursuit of the flying troops, he went and charged the foot in the flank, and put them into such disorder, that the King, with the two Princes his sons, were in danger of being made prisoners. The Earl of Lindsey, the King's general, was taken, having been shot in the thigh, of which he died the next day, and the standard, which was always near the King's person, was lost by the death of the standard bearer, Sir Edmund Verney, but it was recovered afterwards.*

The return of Prince Rupert with his horse, prevented the King's entire defeat. For Balfour, who had only a small body of reserve, seeing the cavalry returning from the chace, suddenly quitted the fight, and secured himself near the Earl of Essex's foot. Could the King and Prince Rupert have persuaded their horse to charge the Parliament's infantry, who had scarcely any cavalry to support them, probably they would have routed them, and obtained a complete victory. But the horse that were returned from the pursuit in extreme disorder, could never be brought to charge the enemies, who stood in good order, though they were in great danger. As soon as the Earl of Essex saw the enemies' cavalry returning, he had drawn off his infantry from the battle, and ranged them in the best manner he could, in order the better to support the charge of the King's horse, who, in all appearance, would come and attack them. But it was not his business to renew the fight. It was sufficient for him to keep his ground, as he did, till night, which freed him from his uneasiness.

When the battle began, there remained not above two or three hours, and as the King's horse had spent some time in the pursuit of the runaways, and after their return, could not be prevailed with to renew the fight, it was too late for the King to rally his infantry, who were in great disorder, and whereof above two thirds were missing. Both armies kept their posts all night, and in the morning neither thought themselves in condition to renew the battle. It is true, the forces left behind by the Earl of Essex, arrived in the night with his artillery. However, as he had no other cavalry than the five hundred horse that were newly come, and the small body commanded by Balfour, he did not think he ought to hazard a second battle against a body of cavalry that had been victorious the day before, and were still facing his army. The King, on his side, finding himself without infantry, and considering that his troops had suffered very much by the cold, which was extremely sharp that night, believed it sufficient to let his enemies see he feared them not. In this disposition, the two armies faced each other the whole day, without any desire to engage. At last, the Earl of Essex ordering his baggage to be drawn off, the King retired to the quarters he had taken the day before the battle, and the Earl of Essex marched towards Warwick. The number of the slain on the field of battle was about five thousand. What the Earl of Clarendon says, that two days after, the King reviewing his army, found there were not above three hundred men lost, is hardly credible, even according to his own description of this battle. But without dwelling upon the particular circumstances of the battle, which were extremely disguised or exaggerated by both parties, who equally claimed the victory, the consequences demonstrate, that they might have more justly owned, that each had been worsted.† Three or four days after the battle, the King took Banbury castle, where was a garrison of eight hundred foot, and a troop of Horse. But if the circumstances of taking this place be well considered, it will be found, that it was far from being a consequence or effect of victory. For first, the King summoned the castle, contrary to the opinion of all his generals, who believed his army little able to undertake the siege. Secondly, he alledged for reason, that he could not determine what course to take, till he was informed of the intention of the enemies, and that if they designed to attack him, he could not fight in a more advantageous place. In short, Banbury castle surrendered at the first shot, which leaves it uncertain, whether the King would have persisted in the siege in case of resistance, and whether the Earl of Essex would have suffered him to do it unmolested. The taking of Banbury determined the King to withdraw to Oxford, the only place in those parts at his devotion, by means of the university, whose members were extremely attached to his interest.

Though the Parliament also claimed the victory, they were very sensible they had no great reason to triumph. The news concerning the battle of Edge-hill or Keinton, being very various at first, the King's friends at London, industriously magnified all the circumstances which might give room to believe that the King was victorious, in order to dispose the people to peace. When both Houses had perfect information of the success of the late battle, what public demonstrations soever they made, to cause the people to believe their army victorious, they were very sensible, such victories were little capable to oblige the King to throw himself into their arms, though the people had been amused with such hopes. Then the King's adherents who were still in the House of Commons, observing the consternation expressed by most of the members, grew more bold, and scrupled not to propose a peace, as the only means to free themselves from trouble.

The day before the battle, both Houses had published a declaration; protesting, in the first place, "That no private passion or respect, no evil intention to his Majesty's person, no design to the prejudice of his just honour and authority, engaged them to raise forces, and take up arms; that his Majesty had refused to receive an humble and dutiful petition, which they had directed the Earl of Essex to deliver to him; that they were fully convinced, that the King was so engaged to the Popish party, that all hopes of peace were excluded; that great numbers of Papists had in shew conformed themselves to the Protestant religion, in order to qualify themselves for posts in the King's army; that his Majesty endeavoured at first to keep off all jealousies and suspicions, by many fearful oaths and imprecations, concerning his purpose of maintaining the Protestant religion, and the laws of the kingdom, causing some professed Papists to be discharged out of his army, and none to be received that would not come to church, receive the sacrament, and take the oaths. But that afterwards his confidence in the priests did more clearly appear: persons imprisoned for priests and jesuits having been released out of the goal of Lancaster, and commissions granted to professed Papists; that the Lord Herbert, son to the Earl of Worcester, a notorious Papist, was made general of the King's troops in all South Wales; that those who raised forces for his

* It was rescued by Captain John Smith, Lieutenant of the Lord John Steward's troops, newly returned from the execution of the runaways. He was knighted for it, and made standard-bearer.

† In this battle were killed on the King's side, Robert Bartu, Earl of Lindsey; the Lord Stewart, the Lord Aubigny, son to the Duke of Lenox, Sir Edmund Verney, &c. On the Parliament's side, perished the Lord St. John of Bletzo, and Colonel Charles Essex. The Lord Willoughby was taken prisoner, in endeavouring to rescue his father the Earl of Lindsey. Upon the news of this battle (says Whitelock) all counties were alarmed and frighted, being a strange thing in England.——With relation to this battle, Denzil Lord Hollis tells a remarkable story, from his own knowledge, concerning the famous Oliver Cromwell; and that shows, (as he observes) "he was as errant a coward, as he was notoriously perfidious, ambitious, and hypocritical." This was his base keeping out of the field at Keinton battle; where he, with his troop of horse came not in, impudently and ridiculously affirming, the day after, that he had been all that day seeking the army and place of fight, though his quarters were but at a village near hand, whence he could not find his way, nor be directed by his ear, when the ordnance was heard twenty or thirty miles off.

Majesty

Majesty in the north of England, did arm and employ Papists; that men had been sent to Hamburgh and Denmark to raise forces there, and to bring them over to join with the Earl of Newcastle, and the army of Papists which was intended to be raised in Newcastle; that the King had received in his court divers Papists in Ireland; some of which were indicted of high treason for their rebellion there; namely, the Lord Taaffe, &c. that divers English traitors were the chief counsellors, and actors in this unnatural war, as the Lord Digby, Oneal, Wilmot, Pollard, Ashburnham, &c. that divers jesuits and priests, in foreign parts, made great collections of money for the relief of the Papists in Ireland, and the furthering of his Majesty's designs against the Parliament; for all which reasons they were resolved to enter into a solemn oath and covenant, and expected that their brethren of Scotland would help and assist them, according to the act of pacification between the two kingdoms."

The King answered this declaration with two others, which were published after the battle of Edge-hill. In the first he said:

"That notwithstanding the solemn protestation of both Houses, of having no evil intention to his person, yet they had used their utmost power, by the strength of their army, to have destroyed him. That if he refused to give admittance to the petition sent by the Earl of Essex, it was because it was sent by persons whom he had particularly accused of high treason. He denies his ever having had any inclination to the Papists, or that he had released any priests or jesuits out of the gaol of Lancaster. He says, that the Papists supposed to have commissions were not so much as known to him, and that they had no command, to his knowledge, in his army. He expressly denied, that he ever sent to raise forces in Hamburgh or Denmark. He affirmed, the Parliament entertained several Papists in their troops, and of this he spoke knowingly, as having taken several of them prisoners at the battle of Edge-hill."

The second declaration was intituled, "His Majesty's declaration to all his loving subjects, after his late victory against the rebels on Sunday the 23d of October, 1642." This title was prefixed on purpose to cherish the fears, which the King's friends were endeavouring to infuse into the people, on account of the pretended victory lately obtained by the King against the Parliament's army. The intent of this declaration was to vindicate the King upon three principal articles; namely,

I. That his Majesty favoured Popery, and employed Papists in his army.

II. That his design was to root out Parliaments.

III. That it was his intention, by the commission of array, to take away part of gentlemen's estates from them. As to the first, he said:

"That although he should employ Papists, no one would wonder, who considered the hardships and streights he was driven to, and the little scruple the Parliament made to employ Popish officers and soldiers, who served in great numbers in their army; the industry they used to corrupt their loyalty; the private promises they allured them with to their service, even to the assuring them, that all the penal laws should be repealed. That notwithstanding the artifices of his enemies, and the weakness of his own condition, he could not prevail with himself to recall his proclamation, against receiving into his army such as had not taken the oaths. He owned, however, that he had swerved from this general rule, in favour of some of eminent abilities in command and conduct."

Presently after, both Houses returned an answer to this declaration, the substance whereof was as follows:

"That it was astonishing, the King, having affirmed so positively, that a far greater number of Papists served in their army than in his, should not have been pleased to name a single instance: that they should have been glad of knowing their names, as it would have afforded means to remove those of that religion, who under the profession of Protestants, might have crept into the army without their privity."

Then they pretended to shew the absurdity of saying, that the Parliament endeavoured to corrupt the loyalty of the Papists, with the promise of repealing the penal laws, and alledged divers instances of their severity against them, during the sitting of the present Parliament.

But for a demonstration, said they, that the King acted not with sincerity, when he alledged, in his vindication, that he had ordered no recusant to be received into his troops, and that this order was a mere illusion, they named several Popish officers, who had commissions under the King's own hand, which commissions then remained in the House of Commons. Moreover, they annexed to this declaration a petition, presented to the King by the Popish inhabitants of the county of Lancashire, desiring leave to provide themselves with arms for his service, and the King's answer granting their request.*

The

* This petition, and his Majesty's answer, seem so decisive, that they ought to be inserted in their own terms.

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

The humble Petition of us the inhabitants of Lancashire, whose names are under-written, in behalf of ourselves, and divers others being recusants,

Humbly sheweth,

"That whereas we, and the rest of this county, your Majesty's most loyal subjects, are disarmed, and not sufficiently provided for the defence of your royal person and our own families; our most humble supplication to your Majesty is, that we may be received into your most gracious protection from violence, have our arms, taken from us, re-delivered in this time of actual war, and by your Majesty's special directions, be enabled further to furnish ourselves with competency of weapons for the security of your royal person, (if we be thereunto required) our countries and families, who now are, not only in danger of the common disturbances, but also menaced by unruly people to be robbed: and when, by the Almighty's assistance, your Majesty's kingdom shall be settled, in case we be again disarmed, that a full value of money in lieu thereof may be restored."

THE KING'S ANSWER.

To our trusty and well-beloved, Sir William Gerrard, Baronet; Sir Cecil Trafford, Knight; Thomas Cliston, Charles Townley, Christopher Anderton, and John Clansfield, and other of our subjects, Esquires in the county of Lancashire.

Charles R.

"Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas by reason of the laws and statutes of our realm, by which all recusant convicted are to be without arms, your arms have been taken from you: So that now, in this time of imminent danger, wherein there are armies raised against our commands, and contrary to our proclamations, and are marching against us, and divers of our good subjects, for obeying our lawful commands, and opposing the rebellious proceedings of others ill-affected, they are by a strong hand seized upon and imprisoned, their houses plundered, and their goods taken away; and the like is threatened to ourselves, who, as all other our subjects, ought to have our protection against unlawful violence and force: and the laws made for disarming recusants, were made only for a provision to prevent danger in time of peace, and were not intended to bar you from a necessary use of arms in time of actual war, for your own safety, or for the defence of our person against all rebels and enemies, which by your duty and allegiance you are bound unto; which is not, nor ever was meant to be discharged, or taken away by any act: and whereas, the arms which were taken from you, ought by law to have been kept and preserved, to have been made use of by you in such time of open war, or by such others as you should provide, yet under the specious pretence of disarming recusants, and persons ill-affected, your arms have been disposed and dispersed into the hands of several persons ill-affected, and for the most part, fomenters and exciters of the commotions now raised in this kingdom; our will and command therefore is, and we charge and require you, upon your allegiance, and as you tender the safety of our person, and the peace and welfare of our kingdom, that you, with all possible speed, provide sufficient arms for yourselves, your servants, and your tenants, which we authorize and require, during the time of open war raised against us, to keep and use for the defence of us, and of yourselves, and of your country, against all forces and arms raised, or to be raised against us, or against our consent, or contrary to our proclamations, by colour of any order, or ordinance, or authority whatsoever: and we shall (according as we are bound to all our subjects) use our utmost powers for the protection of you and yours, against all injuries and violence. And whensoever these arms which you shall provide (after it shall please God to put an end to these dangers and distractions) shall be taken away from your custody, by reason of our laws now in force, we do hereby assure you, we will allow you for the same, so much as you shall have dispensed in provision thereof."

These two papers demonstrate, that the King actually employed papists in his service, even at the beginning of the war, and before any effusion of blood: for this petition was presented to him, whilst he

The King and the Parliament were in this state of animosity, when his Majesty's private friends in the House of Commons moved to sue for peace, under colour of the Parliament's inability to continue the war, after their late loss at Edge-hill. The King, on his part, to confirm the opinion his friends were striving to infuse into the people, that the Parliament's army was entirely routed, and to encourage his well-wishers in London to join with those in the Parliament, sent an offer of pardon to the cities of London and Westminster; thereby insinuating to the inhabitants, that such an offer could not but proceed from the superiority he had acquired by his victory. He practised the same thing with regard to some other towns. It is certain, there was then a great agitation in London, caused by the King's friends, who under pretence of dreading a war, which, according to them, was so unfortunately begun, used their utmost endeavours to induce the people openly to demand a peace. Against these secret practices, it was the business of the leading men in the Parliament to provide. And as they were no less able than their adversaries, they quickly found means to baffle this project. Instead of opposing the motion to sue to the King for peace, they supported it with all their power. They said, "That the Parliament had not taken arms for the sake of going to war, but only to procure a good peace, the most desirable thing in the world: that both houses ought not to be ashamed to make the first advances, and humbly sue for peace to their sovereign, but withal, care was to be taken, that a too great zeal for peace might not be a means to leave them at the mercy of their enemies: that in order to make such a peace as was necessary to the welfare of the kingdom, the King was to be told, that they were not yet reduced to the point, of being forced to accept of such terms as he should please to impose, and therefore, if they would have a peace wherein every man might find his safety, it was necessary to take good measures for the continuance of the war: that among all the means which could be used, they saw none more proper, than to invite their brethren of Scotland to their assistance, pursuant to the treaty between the two nations. Not that they actually wanted them, the Parliament's affairs not being reduced to such an extremity, that foreigners were to be hastily introduced into the kingdom, but that the Scots would doubtless so answer their request, as to convince the King, this refuge would not fail the two Houses in case of need: that thereby they should become more formidable, and if the King was really desirous of a peace, he would be forced to grant it upon reasonable terms, which was all that ought to be expected."

As this advice was very plausible, and besides, proposed by men in whom the majority had great confidence, it was approved by the House. Indeed, none could be ignorant, that by the peace which the King had hitherto offered, and which his friends moved to sue for, could be meant only a peace that should put him in possession of all his prerogatives, and that his word should be taken for security that he would abuse them no more. But though the members of Parliament doubted not that the King would grant an act of oblivion, such as they should desire, they did not believe, that such a peace could be advantageous to the kingdom, because they did not believe the King's word to be a sufficient security. Besides, the Presbyterians were no better pleased than they had been hitherto, with a peace which would of course restore episcopacy in all its former lustre. Wherefore things not being yet brought to that state, that the Parliament should be induced to wish for such a peace, it was resolved,

I. That his Majesty should be addressed for settling the peace of the kingdom.

II. That the preparations of forces and other necessary means for defence should be prosecuted with all vigour, if an honourable and safe peace might not be obtained.

III. That the Scots should be applied to for assistance, if there should be occasion.

These resolutions entirely broke all the measures of the King's friends, who had flattered themselves, that the pretended victory of Edge-hill would produce some great effect.

Pursuant to these resolutions, the Parliament took care to recruit the Earl of Essex's army, and to that end it was ordained, that such apprentices as should be listed for soldiers, should reckon the time spent in the wars, as part of their apprenticeship. Whereupon great numbers of apprentices engaged in the Parliament's service.

After that, both Houses sent a declaration into Scotland, wherein they did not demand indeed an immediate aid; but said, "That they did not doubt but the Scots would assist them, if there should be occasion, according to the treaty of amity and alliance between the two nations. That therefore they desired them to raise such forces, as they should think sufficient to secure their own borders against the attempts of the army of Papists, levied by the Earl of Newcastle in the north of England. To engage them the more to what they desired, they said, the enemies of the Protestant religion were so prevalent with his Majesty, that he had rejected all the petitions presented to him. That the present war was for the maintainance of religion, against the efforts of those who had projected its destruction, and that in order to preserve it more effectually, they had willingly embraced the invitation of the Scots, to a nearer degree of union in matters of religion and church government, which they had accordingly resolved to pursue."

It was now some months, since the Scotch commissioners residing at London, had intimated in a memorial presented to the Parliament, that the Scots passionately desired an union of the churches of England and Scotland in the same worship and discipline. As this proposition was expressed by way of wish only, and besides was worded in such a manner, that it might be understood, either that the Scots desired the English to embrace the worship and discipline of the church of Scotland, or that they themselves were willing to conform to the church of England, the Parliament had, in the same ambiguous terms, civilly answered, that they also wished the same thing, and would heartily concur in accomplishing the project. This answer was doubtless framed by the leading Presbyterians, to serve as a corner stone, of which they hoped one day to make good use. But it was not yet time to declare their intention more openly, for fear of losing all the church of England men that were against the King. Probably these men would have been alarmed, if they had clearly known, that the Presbyterians meant to establish their worship and discipline upon the ruins of the church. For the same reason also, in the declaration above mentioned, both Houses, or rather the directors, thought not proper to speak more plainly, and in saying, that both Houses intended to pursue this union, the proposition was left in all its ambiguity, though it was easy for the Scots to perceive, that in time they should receive satisfaction. For it is not to be imagined, there were none but Presbyterians in the Parliament's party, though this may be the notion some would give us of that party, their aim being to insinuate, that the war between the King and the Parliament was properly a religious war, and that the Parliament's sole design was to destroy the church of England, and establish Presbyterianism in its room. As this design was unjust in itself, they would infer, that the war against the King was unjust. This reasoning would be solid and convincing, were it true, that the opposite party to the King had proposed to themselves no other end. But as it is certain, the Presbyterians were not the only persons that had cause to complain of the King, it is no less so, that the party of his enemies consisted not of Presbyterians was yet at Shrewsbury. For a greater conviction, both Houses annexed also to their declaration, a list of the names of twenty-eight officers, Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Serjeants, Majors, Captains, and Lieutenants, that were papists, and actually in the King's service, in the Earl of Newcastle's army.

alone, but also of a very great number of church-men, who saw, that under colour of destroying Presbyterianism, an arbitrary power was about to be established. It is easy to conceive, that these men were ill-affected to the King, had joined with the Parliament, and as yet were attached to their party. But it is inconceivable, that the Presbyterians, who at the beginning of the Parliament made so inconsiderable a figure in both Houses, as well as in the kingdom, should be grown so very numerous in the space of two years, or that the members of the church of England, who complained of the King's former administration, should have entirely renounced the church, and embraced Presbyterianism. It is certain therefore, though the Presbyterian party, considered as a religious party, had prevailed in the Parliament, there were however in that same party, considered as enemies to the King, many church-men who had no other view than the reformation of the civil government, and the security of the nation's liberties. These were the men the Parliament were to manage, for fear of alarming them, till they could be engaged to turn Presbyterians, whether by the superiority the Parliament should acquire in the course of the war, or by the absolute necessity they should be under of relinquishing the people's liberties, or of recurring to the assistance of the Scots, which could be obtained but by changing the government of the church. On the other hand, the church of England men could not take it ill, that the Parliament managed the Scots, since their assistance might happen to be absolutely necessary. The ambiguous expressions therefore in the declaration, with respect to the union of the two churches, served to manage all those who were concerned for the Parliament's affairs. The Scots were gladly suffered to think, that the proposition was understood in the sense they themselves gave it, and the church of England men were told, that the Parliament was properly bound to nothing, in promising to endeavour an union, because there was no more reason for the church of England to conform to that of Scotland, than for this last to conform to that of England. That however great advantage would accrue from this pretended engagement, in that the King, from the apprehension of seeing the Parliament closely united with Scotland, would be induced to make peace upon reasonable terms.

Though on this occasion, the King's enemies had gained some advantage in the Parliament, his friends did not think themselves vanquished. They plainly saw, that so long as both Houses should be able to act with freedom, the King's adversaries would always be superior, and that it was scarcely possible to take away this freedom without an extraordinary assistance. Wherefore, whilst men were still in the agitation occasioned by the battle of Edge-hill, they sent the King word, that if he would appear before London with his army, they did not question, such commotions would be raised in the city, as would turn to his advantage, in which his friends would not fail to exert themselves to the utmost of their power. This made him resolve to march to London. To that end, he ordered a body of horse to go before, who advancing to Reading, the Parliament's troops, quartered there, were seized with such a terror, that they entirely abandoned the place, and the King came thither soon after with his army. Both Houses were alarmed when they heard the King was within thirty miles of London. So, whether for that reason, or with design to amuse him, they sent and desired a safe conduct for a committee of Lords and Commons to attend his Majesty with a petition for peace, pursuant to a resolution taken some days before. The King granted a safe conduct for the committee, excepting only Sir John Evelyn, because he was proclaimed traitor.* In the mean time, both Houses had advice that the Earl of Essex was marching towards London with the utmost speed. For this cause they were in no haste to send the committee to the King, on pretense of his scrupling to admit Evelyn. It is hard to conceive why the King, who could not be ignorant, that the execution of his project depended upon his diligence, stayed long enough at Reading to give the Earl of Essex time to come to London as soon as himself. However this be, he marched the 11th of November to Colebrook, fifteen miles from London. Meanwhile the Earl of Essex's army arrived about the same time, in the neighbourhood of London. But whether it was not ready soon enough, or the Parliament was alarmed, the committee was sent to his Majesty the same day, with a very humble petition, to appoint a place for a treaty. The King returned a gracious answer to this petition, testifying, he wished for nothing more than a peace, and to that end, was content to enter into a treaty. The committee returning to London with this answer, the Parliament immediately sent orders to their forces not to exercise any hostility. But presently after the departure of the committee, the King began to march towards Brentford, seven miles from London, and arriving there the 12th in the morning, attacked the town, where some of the Parliament's troops were quartered, and became master of it, after some resistance.† Immediately after he sent a message to both Houses to inform them, that since his answer to their petition last night, he had received advice, that the Earl of Essex was drawing his forces out of London towards him, which had obliged him to march to Brentford: that however he was still desirous of peace, and expected their committee at Brentford that night, or early the next morning.

The Earl of Essex's army was indeed arrived near London the 7th, and the Earl himself was actually in the House of Peers the 12th, during the assault of Brentford. Whereupon both Houses ordered the Lord Mayor to send out the trained bands, to join with the Earl of Essex's army, and by that it became much superior to the King's.‡ The same day the general made the necessary preparations for battle; but the King not thinking fit to expect him, retired towards Kingston.

The Parliament complained, the King had deceived them under the false show of desiring to treat of a peace, since immediately after the departure of the committee, he marched to surprise Brentford. The King justified himself two ways. He said first, that not only there was no truce agreed upon, but none so much as desired. Secondly, that after the committee's departure, he received certain information, that the Earl of Essex had sent forces to Kingston, Acton, and other places, to surround him, which had obliged him to advance to Brentford. The former of these reasons was the best, for there being no cessation of arms, he might justly take all advantages as he thought proper. But he insisted the least upon this, for being disappointed, he would not have it appear that his design was to become master of London, or at least to raise commotions there in his favour, for fear of exposing his friends to a strict inquisition. The latter was not of the same force. For if he was afraid of being surrounded at Colebrook, he did not avoid that inconvenience, by advancing eight miles nearer London. He rather made it greater by that march, unless he advanced with design to attack the enemy, which did not appear by his conduct.

It is extremely probable, that the King, when he left Oxford, intended to surprise London, or hoped, that his friends would so manage, that he should be received there without opposition, before the Earl of Essex could arrive. But he either lost too much time at Reading, or was prevented by the Earl's expedition.

* This committee consisted of Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, Philip Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Wenman, Mr. Pierrepoint, and Sir John Hippesley.

† Part of Colonel Hollis's regiment were quartered there, who made a vigorous defence, but would, in all probability, have been most of them cut off, if the Lord Brook's and Colonel Hampden's regiment had not come to their relief, and maintained a fierce and bloody fight till night, wherein many were slain, others driven into the river, and many taken prisoners. So that they quitted the town in the night, and the King possessed it.

‡ The whole army, of horse and foot, consisted of about twenty-four thousand men.

This war continued all the winter in several parts of the kingdom, there being scarcely a county free from it.

In the beginning of December, the Earl of Newcastle, who had levied an army for the King in the northern parts, began his march towards York. He was stopped at the passage of the river Tees, which parts the Bishopric of Durham from Yorkshire, by young Hotham, who had with him a detachment of the little army commanded by the Lord Fairfax in that county for the Parliament; but the Earl forced the passage, and came to York, with about eight thousand men.

There were likewise during this winter, in the same county, two pretty warm actions. The first at Tadcaster, where the Lord Fairfax was intrenched, and where he was attacked by the Earl of Newcastle, who, after an obstinate dispute, was obliged at last to retreat. The second was at Gisborough, where Hugh Cholmley defeated six hundred of the King's party, commanded by Colonel Slingsby, who was taken prisoner, with a good number of his men. Some days after, Sir Thomas Fairfax, the general's son, attacked the town of Leeds, defended by Sir William Savil, with fifteen hundred men, carried it by storm, and took five hundred prisoners. These were the most remarkable actions in the north.

In the south, Sir William Waller, commander for the Parliament, blew up Farnham castle, and made the garrison prisoners of war. Shortly after he took Winchester, and then Chichester, after an eight days' siege.

In the midland counties, several notable actions, though little decisive, were also performed. The 5th of December, Wilmot, Commissary-General of the King's horse, the Lord Digby, and others, attacked the town of Marlborough, fortified by the Parliament, where was a numerous garrison. The town being carried by storm, was plundered and burnt, and about a thousand of the garrison slain and taken prisoners. February the 2d, Prince Rupert took Cirencester by storm, and made twelve hundred prisoners. March the 1st, the Lord Brooke attacked some of the King's forces intrenched in the close of the cathedral of Lichfield, and was there slain; but after his death his men carried the close.* The 19th of the same month, a battle was fought at Salt Heath near Stafford, which was maintained on both sides four hours, till at last the Earl of Northampton, who commanded the King's forces, being slain, the Parliament's troops became victorious.

The same day Sir William Waller surprised the Lord Herbert, who was besieging Gloucester, killed five hundred of his men, and took above a thousand prisoners. After that, he took Chepstow in Monmouthshire, and then the town of Monmouth itself.

We proceed now to what passed in the western counties, from the beginning of the war, to March the next year, 1643.

From the time the King was at Beverley, after having failed in his attempt upon Hull, he sent the Marquis of Hertford into the west, to try to raise a party capable to give the Parliament's forces a diversion. He granted him a commission to command all the western parts, and the Marquis made Sir Ralph Hopton his general of horse. The Marquis being come into Somersetshire, fixed his quarters at the Bath, where he could raise but few men, by reason of the vigilance of the committee of the militia, who greatly obstructed his levies. At last, the Earl of Bedford, who commanded in those parts for the Parliament, having drawn together much more numerous forces than were those of the King, the Marquis of Hertford was obliged to retire into Wales. He sent however Sir Ralph Hopton with about one hundred and fifty horse into Cornwall, to endeavour to gain that county to the King's interest. The Earl of Bedford neglected to pursue this little troop, not doubting but the committee of the militia would be able to disperse them, and went and joined the Earl of Essex. This passed before the battle of Edge-hill.

Hopton was well received in Cornwall, and seconded by Sir Bevil Greenvil, a Cornish gentleman, who so ordered it, that the county declared for the King. Then Hopton drew together three thousand of the trained bands, and marched towards Launceston, whence they chaced the committee of the militia, who had assembled some troops. But endeavouring to lead these trained bands into Devonshire, they refused to march out of their county. For which reason he dismissed them, having first driven the committee from the little town of Saltash. Meanwhile, with the assistance of the gentlemen of the county, he found means to levy fifteen hundred regular troops, with whom he became absolute master of all Cornwall, and even made incursions into Devonshire.

The Parliament having intelligence of Hopton's progress in Cornwall, ordered all their forces in Dorset and Somerset to join with those of Devon, and gave the command of this army to the Earl of Stamford. The Earl heading these troops, sent Ruthen, a Scotchman, Governor of Plymouth, with a detachment into Cornwall. He was no sooner there, but was met by Sir Ralph Hopton, who put him to rout, killed many of his men, and took above twelve hundred prisoners. Ruthen, after his defeat, retired to Saltash, where he endeavoured to fortify himself, and the Earl of Stamford threw himself into Tavistock.†

Hopton taking advantage of the terror he had struck into the Parliamentarians, divided his forces into two bodies; with one of which he marched towards Ruthen, and beat him out of Saltash, and thereby remained again master of Cornwall. The other body moved towards Tavistock, which the Earl of Stamford also quitted, and retiring to Plymouth, enabled Hopton with the more ease to fix quarters in Devonshire. But shortly after, both parties having agreed to observe an exact neutrality in the two counties of Devon and Cornwall, in order to remove the war into other parts, Hopton retired with his forces into Cornwall.

Money being the sinews of war, it is not strange the King and the Parliament should do their utmost to raise all they could. But the wonder is, that they should upbraid each other with the expedients made use of to that end. According to the laws of the land, the King cannot levy money upon the subject, without consent of Parliament; but it is no less certain, that the Parliament cannot impose taxes without the royal assent. Taxes are laid by acts, to which the King and both Houses must necessarily give their approbation. But what is to be done when the King and Parliament are at war with one another? Neither of them, according to the laws, must levy money upon the people, and then it will be almost impossible to wage war, or else both must be left at liberty to raise it, without regarding each other's consent. This was what the King and the Parliament practised, and yet they reproached each other with breach of the laws. If we believe the authors who wrote in favour of the King, his Majesty had no other money than what he was supplied with voluntarily by gift or loan.‡ If he sometimes taxed the counties in his power, it was always with the consent of the inhabitants. But this is a kind of artifice to deceive the reader. For it means nothing more, than that some of the leading men of a town or county were gained, by whom it was resolved to give the King

* Lord Brooke had taken possession of Lichfield, and was viewing from a window St. Chad's Cathedral, in which a party of the royalists had fortified themselves. He was cased in complete armour, but was shot through the eye by a random ball. Lord Brooke was a jealous puritan, and had formerly said, that he hoped to see with his eyes the ruin of all the Cathedrals of England. It was a superstitious remark of the royalists, that he was killed on St. Chad's Day, by a shot from St. Chad's cathedral, which pierced that very eye by which he hoped to see the ruin of all cathedrals.

† This battle was fought on Bradoc-down near Liskeard. The chief of the Cornish gentlemen that helped Sir Ralph Hopton to raise his forces, were Sir Bevil Greenvil, Sir Nicholas Stanning, John Arundel, and John Trevannion, all members of Parliament.

‡ And by these means, says Lord Clarendon, the King was able to pay his foot, though it amounted to above 3000*l.* weekly.

such a sum, after which it would have been in vain for the rest to oppose it, or refuse to pay their share. The Parliament proceeded in much the same manner. They demanded for the maintenance of the war, contributions, which they termed voluntary, but which were very far from being so. This very clearly appeared in an ordinance of the 29th of November, for assembling such as had not freely contributed. The King, considering this ordinance as an express breach of the law, issued a proclamation, enjoining all his subjects not to submit to it. He published another of the same nature, to command all persons not to execute the ordinance of Parliament for paying tonnage and poundage to the two Houses. All this was founded upon the laws, requiring the royal assent for the imposition of taxes. But such were the times, that a strict observance of the laws was become impracticable. The Parliament answered this last proclamation, not by acknowledging, the laws were violated by their ordinance, but by saying, that the statute urged by the King, was made to hinder the King from imposing any tax, without consent of both Houses, and not to divest the Parliament of a right to impose what they thought proper. It is easy to perceive, that this was only a cavil, since the King's consent was no less necessary for imposing a tax, than that of both Houses. Or rather, they had no right, neither the one nor the other, separately, if the laws had been kept to. And yet the King, in the next February, published another proclamation, ordering that the customs upon goods imported, should be paid him at Oxford, which, in all appearance, was not performed.*

The King, as before observed, had sent the Earl of Newcastle into the north, to gain to his party the Bishopric of Durham, with the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and to levy an army. The Earl happily executed the King's design. He so managed, that these four counties entered into an association to furnish him at the common expence, with men and money, so that he raised an army of eight thousand men. As soon as the Parliament was informed of this association, they ordered the like to be entered into by the counties that owned their authority, and appointed generals to command their forces. The Lord Fairfax was made general of Yorkshire; Sir William Brereton, of Cheshire; Sir William Waller, of Hampshire; the Lord Grey, of Lancashire; Major-General Brown, of Berkshire; the Earl of Denbigh, of Shropshire; Colonel Middleton, of Wales; and the Earl of Manchester, of Essex and the counties adjoining, called the eastern counties, namely, Essex, Cambridge, Isle of Ely, Hertford, Norfolk, Suffolk, and the city of Norwich.† By means of these associations, the Parliament had forces always ready. The King frequently tried to prevent these associations in counties where he knew he had a good number of friends, as for instance, in Kent, and some others. But when both Houses perceived the King's practices were likely to prevail in any of the counties where they were superior, they obliged them to associate with others, and furnish their quota.

Besides these associations between the counties of the same party, there were also at the beginning of the war, private agreements between neighbouring counties of different parties, to observe, between them, an exact neutrality. These agreements were founded on the common advantages of the contracting counties, as they removed the war from their own doors, and settled a mutual commerce between them, which they could not well be without. We have given an instance in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The like agreement was made between the two parties in Yorkshire and Cheshire. But the Parliament refused to authorise these private agreements, because they were too advantageous to the King, who in the end would have been able, by this means, to assemble all his forces in one place, whereas he was obliged to disperse them throughout the whole kingdom. Besides, the King's party had so well managed his concerns, that these agreements were made only in places where it was for his advantage; as for example, in Yorkshire, where the sole view was to stop the inroads of the garrison of Pontefract castle, which very much annoyed the city of York.

The King retiring to Oxford, after the Brentford affair, carried thither the prisoners taken at Brentford and Edge-hill. Within a few days after his return, he granted to Sir Robert Heath a commission of Oyer and Terminer, to try some of these prisoners, among whom was Captain John Lilburn, who with some others was condemned to die, for being taken in arms against the King. The Parliament having notice of this sentence before its execution, declared, that if any prisoner of war should be put to death at Oxford, or elsewhere, they would inflict the like punishment upon such prisoners as were or should be taken hereafter. This declaration saved the lives of the condemned, the King not thinking proper to expose his officers to the same fate.

A. D. 1642-3.] Though the measures of the King's friends to oblige the Parliament to make peace were broken, they were not discouraged. As the King, after the business of Brentford, had fortified Reading, and left there a strong garrison, they pretended, the inhabitants of London had cause to be extremely alarmed at their neighbourhood. So under colour of preventing the danger, they drew a petition, to which they procured as many hands as possible, to desire leave of both Houses to present to the King some propositions which he might consent to with honour. Many of the inhabitants of Westminster, and of the parishes of St. Martin's and Covent Garden, known to be the King's adherents, prepared also a similar petition. It was a very uncommon thing, and of dangerous consequence, for private persons, without the interposition or approbation of the magistrates, to take upon them to make overtures of peace to the King. Accordingly, the Parliament would not receive their petition, but ordered even that the authors should be brought to justice. Probably, they did not expect, the Parliament would make use of their mediation for a peace: but in publishing this petition, wherein they called themselves the richest and most considerable inhabitants of London, their aim was to insinuate to the people, that the honest part of the citizens wished for peace upon more moderate terms than the Parliament, but were restrained by the magistrates. The two Houses fully perceiving the motives of this petition, ordered it so, that the mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, sent a very humble petition to the King, wherein they took care to clear themselves from all disloyalty, and expressed an earnest desire of peace. To that purpose, they besought his Majesty to return to his Parliament, accompanied with his royal, not martial attendance; to the end whatsoever was amiss in church and state might be reformed by the advice of both Houses, and such a peace obtained, as should be for the honour of his Majesty, and the welfare of his subjects. This petition showed, that the city of London desired no other peace than what the Parliament should please to agree upon with the King. It had this advantage of the first, that it came from the Mayor and Common Council, whereas the other was subscribed only by private hands.

The King was really persuaded, that the Londoners desired and would accept of such a peace as he should be pleased to grant, but that the magistrates, in concert with the Parliament, did their utmost to prevent it. This petition being presented to him the 10th of January 1642-3, he returned a very gracious answer, and gave it in writing to the committee of Aldermen. He said, "That he never entertained any misapprehension of the loyalty of his City of London, or of the inhabitants in general: but could not say the same with regard to their magistrates, and particularly Alderman Pennington their pretended Lord Mayor, and two or three more, who endeavoured, with all their power, to prevent the people, and excite them to rebellion. Then he enumerated all the outrages exercised at London upon himself and the laws, and assured them he was ready to return, when they should be in a fit posture to receive him with honour and safety, and had apprehended the disturbers of the public peace, that they might be proceeded against by course of law, as guilty of high-treason." The King greatly flattered himself with respect to his papers, which he really believed to be unanswerable. But the wonderful effects he hoped from thence did not always answer his expectations. In this belief, when he delivered his answer in writing to the committee of Aldermen, he told them, it was his desire, that it should be publicly at a common-hall and before the people. The Lord Mayor, with the consent of both Houses, willingly gave his Majesty this satisfaction, and his answer was accordingly read in public. But the Parliament had sent a committee of Lords and Commons to be present at the reading, and afterwards to reject the King's answer. This did Mr. Pym, one of the committee, in a set speech, the design whereof was to show, that the King's whole answer was full of scandalous and injurious aspersions upon the city and Parliament. So the King had little reason to be satisfied with the success of his answer, on which however, he had much depended, imagining it would be capable of sowing discord between the people of London and the magistrates.

* According to some authors, the Parliament raised in all upon the nation, during the course of the civil war and afterwards, above ninety-five millions, five hundred and twelve thousand pounds. And, according to Mr. Walker, there was levied, from the year 1641 to 1647, above forty millions in money, and money-worth. In March 1642, they made an ordinance for raising thirty-four thousand, one hundred and eight pounds, thirteen shillings per week.

† These were afterwards generally called the associated counties.

Some days after, the King sent to the sheriffs of London a declaration, grievously complaining of Pym's speech, and of the publication of a pamphlet in the city in his name, as if he retracted his former promises. He required also the master and wardens of the several companies of the city, to summon all their members, and read this declaration with his fore-mentioned answer, publicly in their several halls. He declared that Isaac Pennington not being regularly elected according to their charter, or lawfully admitted, could not be looked upon as Lord Mayor of London, and ordered the sheriffs to commit him to safe custody, with some other aldermen. But the Parliament perceiving, the King's aim was to incite the people of London against their magistrates, commanded the sheriffs not to execute this order.

As the King frequently sent private agents to London, to correspond with his friends there, and to be fully informed of what passed in the city and Parliament, both Houses thought proper, in order to render this practice more difficult, to declare, that all persons coming from the King's quarters to London, without a safe conduct, should be treated as spies.

During this winter, before the opening of the second campaign, the contest about the number of papists in the service of the King and of the Parliament was renewed, on occasion of some papers published by the Earl of Newcastle and the Lord Fairfax against each other. The Earl of Newcastle did not deny that he had papists in his army; but maintained, they were few in number, and besides, it was lawful to employ them, since it was not because of their religion, but for their loyalty. On the other hand, he affirmed, there were great numbers in the Parliament's army, and appealed for the truth of what he said to their muster-rolls.*

Since the Queen was in Holland, she had not been idle. She laboured effectually to procure the King officers, arms and ammunition, which was facilitated by the Prince of Orange her son-in-law's credit. September 1642, both Houses sent an agent, Walter Strickland, to the Hague, to complain to the States-General of the preparations making in Holland for the King, and of the supplies that were sent him. But Strickland was received very coldly, by reason of the Prince of Orange's credit in the assembly of States. Besides, the States-General did not consider him as a public minister, because hitherto the Parliament had never sent agents abroad in their own name. They were contented therefore to depute one of the members of their assembly, to know what he had to say. Strickland put into their hands a declaration from the Parliament, which was long neglected, the States-General not vouchsafing to return any answer. At length, Strickland having presented it to the States of Holland, they promised to observe a strict neutrality, and engaged the province of Zealand to take the same resolution. They even arrested some ships laden with ammunition and soldiers for the King. Then the States-General returned in answer: "That they would expressly forbid every body to transport any weapons or warlike ammunition into England, and would gladly employ their mediation for putting an end to the troubles."

But this could not hinder the indirect supplies that were sent to the King, by reason of the Prince of Orange's great credit. During the winter, General King, a Scotchman, brought his Majesty ordnance and ammunition, and General Goring brought over some English officers that were in the service of the States. It is true, that from time to time the English ships seized some of those vessels that were sent to the King. Strickland made frequent complaints of these supplies: but the States-General took no notice of them. They even granted the Queen, who was preparing to return to England, so large and general a passport, that by virtue thereof she might transport into England troops, ordnance, arms and ammunition, in what quantities she pleased. Nevertheless the States of Holland, whom it concerned to keep fair with the Parliament, stopped one of the Queen's vessels laden with ammunition; whereupon she delivered in a protestation. In all probability, they had a mind thereby to manage both parties, the Parliament, by seizing one of the ships, and the Queen, by stopping but one out of many. The supply, however, brought to the King by the Queen was very considerable. She arrived about the middle of February in Burlington-Bay, and from thence went to York, where she made some stay.†

The King constantly insisted upon the laws of the land; urged that they ought to be observed in time of war as in time of peace; and, by virtue of the prerogative, he pretended to adjourn the Courts of Justice to Oxford during Hilary-Term, but the Parliament would not consent.

On the other hand, the counties being divided between the two parties, the Parliament addressed his Majesty, representing the inconveniencies that would follow the holding of the assizes in the several counties, some whereof were for the King, and some for the Parliament, and besought him to agree to their being deferred to a more convenient season. But the King positively refused it, under colour of the necessity of punishing malefactors at all times. Had he gained this point, he might have condemned as rebels all those that had taken arms against him, for the Judges must have administered justice according to the law, which not supposing an open war between the King and the Parliament, condemns, without distinction, all that are in arms against the King. But the case the kingdom was then in, being wholly extraordinary and unexpected, the Parliament pretended, the laws could not be executed in that respect, without some restriction and explication. For this reason, they desired the assizes might be suspended, till some means might be agreed upon, for the impartial

* The Earl says, in one of his papers, "That the Parliament had had, for many months, great numbers under their pay, both English, French, and other nations, whom, at the time of their enrollment, and even since, they did know to have been professed Papists: whereas, it was notoriously known, that before this course was taken on the other party, his Majesty and his ministers did not admit to, nor continue any soldiers in pay, who were suspected to be that way inclined, or did refuse the oaths of allegiance and supremacy."

† The day after her Majesty's landing, four of the Parliament's ships came into the road, and firing upon the vessels that were landing the ammunition; the balls reached the town, near the place where the Queen was resting herself after her voyage. Whereupon, she was forced to remove to an obscure lodging behind a hill. The Marquis of Montrose, and the Lord Ogilby, with two troops of horse, conducted her to the Earl of Newcastle, who entertained her at York.

rendering of justice. But finding, the King refused to consent to it, they published an ordinance, forbidding the assizes to be held till further order.

Though the war was begun in April 1642, and a battle, with several skirmishes, had been fought, the King could hardly be persuaded, that the very persons who were in arms against him, could or dared refuse the obedience that was due to him. Of this notion he gave an evident proof in March 1642-3, on the following occasion. The city of Bristol being in the hands of the Parliament, the King had gained Mr. Robert Yeoman's the last year sheriff, and one of the principal citizens, and sent him a commission to raise forces, and appoint what commanders he thought proper, Yeoman's design being to surrender the city to the King. To that purpose, he joined with one Bourchier, another citizen, and they both formed a plot, into which many of the inhabitants entered, to seize the city for the King. This plot being discovered the very night it was to be executed, the conspirators were imprisoned, and the Parliament sent down a commission to Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes the Governor, to call a council of war, and proceed against the prisoners by Martial Law: the conspirators being condemned to die, the King wrote to the Governor by General Ruthen, Earl of Forth, that if he put these men to death, some prisoners in his hands should undergo the same fate. Fiennes returned the General a civil answer: but in showing him however, the difference between prisoners of war, and secret spies and conspirators, he threatened, in his turn, there would be frequent opportunities, in the course of the war, for the Parliament to use reprisals. Whereupon the King wrote a thundering letter to the Mayor and Aldermen of Bristol, commanding them, as well as all the inhabitants, to rise against the governor and garrison, and rescue the condemned prisoners. It was easy to foresee the Mayor would ill obey this order. Accordingly, the prisoners, Yeaman, and Bourchier, were executed, without the King's thinking proper to proceed in the like manner against the prisoners in his power.

Nothing is more proper to show the real dispositions of the King and Parliament, than the treaty at Oxford in March and April 1643, concerning a peace.

Both Houses of Parliament having considered, that the King made some advantage of the inclination he had constantly shown for peace, sent and desired a safe-conduct for commissioners they intended to send to him, which the King granting, the commissioners presented to his Majesty certain propositions as proper to serve for foundation to a peace.* Rushworth has preserved in his collections two speeches made in the council upon this occasion; the Earl of Bristol's to persuade the King to continue the war, and the Earl of Dorset's to shew the advantages and necessity of a peace.† It is not said, what was the result of the council's deliberations; but it may be judged by what followed, that the King relished the Earl of Bristol's reasons better than the Earl of Dorset's.

A. D. 1643.] The Parliament having no guard against the artifices of the King's friends, who were strenuously endeavouring to persuade the people, that the war was waging only for the sake of some of their members, could not better contradict them, than by openly suing to the King for peace, and by publishing the terms on which they were ready to conclude it. They meant to show by these terms, that it was not the private interest of some of their members that put them upon action, but solely the welfare and security of the nation: however, they knew at the same time the King would not accept them. His Majesty, on his part, was obliged to show he wished for peace, since he had always pretended to take arms only in his own defence. The King continually insisted upon restoring the laws to their former vigour, and the Parliament, upon security for the observance of the same laws, and thereby both rendered a peace impracticable. The substance of the propositions presented to the King by the Parliament was to this effect:

"I. That the armies on both sides be disbanded, and his Majesty be pleased to return to his Parliament.

"II. That he leave delinquents to a legal trial and judgment of Parliament.

"III. That the papists be disbanded and disarmed.

"IV. That his Majesty be pleased to give his royal assent to the following bills:

"I. For taking away superstitious innovations.

"II. For the utter abolishing of all Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, &c.

"III. Against scandalous ministers.

"IV. Against pluralities.

"V. For consultation with godly, religious, and learned Divines. That his Majesty be pleased to promise to pass such other bills for settling of church-government, as, upon consultation with the assembly of the

---

* The commissioners on this occasion, were Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland; Philip Herbert, Earl of Pembroke; William Cecil, Earl of Salisbury; and Henry Rich, Earl of Holland; with the Viscounts, Wenman and Dungarnon; and Sir John Holland, Sir William Litton, Knights; William Pierrepoint, Bulstrode Whitelock, Edmund Waller, and Richard Winwood, Esquires. They had their first access to the King in Christ-Church garden, where he was walking with the Prince, and divers of the Lords attending him. All kissed his hand, and Waller approaching the last, his Majesty said, "Though you are the last, yet you are not the worst, nor the least in my favour." The discovery of a plot then in hand in London to betray the Parliament, wherein Waller was concerned, did manifest the King's courtship to Waller, to be for that service.

† The substance of the Earl of Bristol's reasons was as follows:

"I. That the Parliament had declared divers of the greatest and most eminent among the nobility delinquents of the highest nature; so that there could not be an accommodation without the utter ruin of themselves and their families.

"II. But granting that this article were removed, his Majesty could not condescend with his honour to beg peace of his subjects.

"III. That no mention could be found in the history of Spain of intestine and civil wars, because they were truly subjects, and their sovereign truly a sovereign. But since in England the state would neither be so to the King, nor suffer the King to be so to them, he thought they should be compelled to it.

"IV. That it was no dishonour for subjects to condescend to their King, but it was an excessive diminution to his Majesty's royalty, to submit himself to his subjects.

"V. His opinion therefore was, that his Majesty should neither propound to the Parliament, or receive from them, any conditions for peace, but such as should absolutely comply with the regal dignity and prerogative, and such as might be no way prejudicial to his Majesty's servants and counsellors, or their estates.

"VI. That there was an army on foot which could by force compel that, which fair words could not effect."

On the other side the Earl of Dorset represented:

"I. That peace, and a sudden one, was absolutely necessary between his Majesty and the Parliament.

"II. That he would not advise them to embrace a peace that should be more disadvantageous than the war, a peace which would destroy the estates and families of the nobility. But it was to be considered, that the Parliament declared only against delinquents, such as they conjectured had miscounselled his Majesty, and were the authors of the tumults in the common-wealth. But this declaration of theirs, except such crimes could be proved against them, was of no validity; the Parliament would do nothing unjustly, nor condemn the innocent; and certainly innocent men needed not fear to appear before any judges whatsoever. He who should, for any cause, prefer his private good before the public utility, was but an ill son of the common-wealth.

"III. That the business of the kingdom was to study to reconcile all differences between his Majesty and his Parliament, and so to reconcile them, that they should no way prejudice his royal prerogative, of which the Parliament being a loyal defender (knowing the subject's property dependent on it) would never endeavour to be an infringer; so that if doubts and jealousies were taken away, by a fair treaty between his Majesty and the Parliament, no doubt a means might be devised to rectify differences.

"IV. That in Spain, the subjects were scarcely removed a degree from slaves, nor the sovereign from a tyrant. But in England the subjects had, by a long and received liberty, made their freedom result into a second nature: neither was it safe for the Kings to strive to introduce the Spanish government upon the free-born nation, nor just for the people to suffer that government to be inforced upon them; which he was certain his Majesty's goodness never intended.

"V. Granting that his Majesty had an army of gallant and able men, yet he had infinite disadvantages on his side; the Parliament having double his number, and surely persons of as much bravery, nay, and sure to be daily supplied when any of their number failed; a benefit which his Majesty could not boast of, they having the most populous part of the kingdom at their devotion; all, or most of the cities, considerable towns, and ports, together with the mainest pillar of the kingdom's safety, the sea, at their command, and the navy; and, which was most material of all, an unexhausted Indies of money to pay their soldiers, out of the liberal contributions of coin and plate, sent by people of all condition, who accounted the Parliament's cause their own.

"VI. All which things considered, he concluded it necessary, to beseech his Majesty, to take some present order for a treaty of peace between himself, and his high court of Parliament."

said Divines, shall be resolved on by both Houses of Parliament.

" VI. That his Majesty be pleased to give his consent, that an oath may be established by act of Parliament, to be administered in such manner, as by both Houses shall be agreed on; wherein they shall abjure and renounce the Pope's supremacy; the doctrine of transubstantiation, purgatory, worshipping of the consecrated host, crucifixes, and images; and that the refusing the said oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by act of Parliament, shall be a sufficient conviction in law of recusancy.

" And that his Majesty be pleased to consent to,

" I. A bill for the education of the children of papists by protestants.

" II. To a bill for the true levying of the penalties against recusants, in such manner as both Houses of Parliament shall agree on.

" III. To a bill whereby the practice of papists against the state may be prevented.

" VI. That the Earl of Bristol, and the Lord Herbert, may be removed from his Majesty's councils and court, and that they may not bear any office, or have any employments concerning the state or commonwealth.

" VII. That the militia be settled in such a manner as shall be agreed on by both Houses.

" VIII. That his Majesty be pleased to appoint for Judges, [here were inserted the names] with the clause Quam diu se bene gesserint.

" IX. That all such persons as have been put out of the commissions of peace, &c. since the first day of April 1642, may again be put into them; and that such persons may be removed, as shall be excepted against by both Houses of Parliament.

" X. That his Majesty be pleased to pass the bill presented to him, to vindicate and secure the privileges of Parliament from the ill consequence of the late precedent, in the charge and proceeding against the Lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the House of Commons.

" XI. That his Majesty's royal assent may be given unto such acts as shall be advised by both Houses of Parliament, for the satisfying and paying the debts and damages, wherein the two Houses of Parliament have engaged the public faith of the kingdom.

" XII. That his Majesty be pleased to enter into a strict alliance with the States of the United Provinces, and other neighbouring Princes and States of the Protestant religion.

" XIII. That in the general pardon which his Majesty hath been pleased to offer to his subjects, all offences and misdemeanors committed before the 10th of January 1641, which have been, or shall be questioned in Parliament before the 10th of January 1643, shall be excepted; which offences and misdemeanors shall nevertheless be taken and adjudged to be fully discharged against all other inferior courts: that likewise there shall be an exception of offences committed by any persons, which have had any hand in the rebellion of Ireland: and an exception of William Earl of Newcastle, and George Lord Digby.

" XIV. That his Majesty will be pleased to restore such members of either House of Parliament to their several places, out of which they have been put since the beginning of the Parliament; that they may receive satisfaction and reparation for those places; and that all others may be restored to their offices and employments, who have been put out of the same upon any displeasure conceived against them, for any assistance given to both Houses of Parliament, or obeying their commands, or forbearing to leave their attendance upon the Parliament without licence, or for any other occasion arising from the differences betwixt his Majesty, and his Parliament."

As the King had talked very much of his offer in August last, to treat of a peace, and of the refusal of both Houses, he did not think it adviseable absolutely to reject these propositions. He consented therefore, that they should be discussed in a treaty; but gave six others on his part; namely,

" I. That his Majesty's own revenue, magazines, towns, forts, and ships which have been taken or kept from him by force, be forthwith restored unto him.

" II. That whatsoever had been done or published contrary to the laws of the land, or derogatory to his Majesty's power and rights be renounced and recalled.

" III. That whatsoever illegal power hath been claimed and exercised by both or either House, over his subjects, as imprisoning their persons without law, stopping their Habeas Corpus's, and imposing upon their estates without act of Parliament, be disclaimed, and all such persons so committed forthwith discharged.

" IV. That a bill be framed, for the better preserving of the Book of Common Prayer from the scorn and violence of Brownists, Anabaptists, and other sectaries, with proper clauses for the ease of tender consciences.

" V. That all such persons, as, upon the treaty, shall be excepted out of the general pardon, shall be tried, per Pares, according to the usual course and known law of the land.

" VI. And to the intent this treaty may not suffer interruption by any intervening accidents, that a cessation of arms and free trade for all his Majesty's subjects be first agreed upon."

Some days after, the King sent a message to both Houses, to desire that his last proposition might be first taken into consideration, to the end that during the cessation of arms, the peace might be treated of with the greater tranquillity; to which they consented.

It was the 28th of February before both Houses sent the terms to the King, on which they proposed to conclude a suspension of arms, during the treaty; namely,

" I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, victuals, money, bullion, and all other commodities, passing without such a safe-conduct as may warrant their passage, may be stayed and seized on, as if no such cessation were agreed on at all.

" II. The same with regard to all manner of persons passing without such a safe-conduct.

" III. That his Majesty's forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Windsor than Weatly, and in Buckinghamshire no nearer to Aylesbury than Brill; and that in Berks the forces respectively shall not advance nearer the one to the other than now they are: and that the Parliament-forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Oxford than Henley; and those in Buckingham no nearer to Oxford than Aylesbury: and that his Majesty's forces shall take no new quarters above twelve miles from Oxford any way; and that the Parliament forces shall take no new quarters above twelve miles from Windsor any way.

" IV. That no siege shall be begun or continued against Gloucester, and that his Majesty's forces now employed in the siege shall return to Cirencester, and Malmsbury, or to Oxford, as shall be most for their conveniency; and the Parliament-forces which are in Gloucestershire, shall remain in the cities of Gloucester, Bristol, and the castle and town of Berkley, and retire nearer to Windsor, as they shall see cause; and that those of Wales which are drawn to Gloucester, shall return into their quarters, where they were before they drew down to Gloucester.

" V. That in case it be pretended on either side, that the cessation is violated, no act of hostility is immediately to follow; but first, the party complaining is to acquaint the Lord General on the other side, and to allow three days after notice given, for satisfaction. And in case satisfaction be not given, or accepted, then five days' notice to be given before hostility begin: and the like to be observed in the remoter armies by the commanders in chief.

" VI. Lastly, That all the other forces in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, and not beforementioned, shall remain in the same quarters and places, as they are at the time of the publishing of this cessation, tion, and under the same conditions as are mentioned in the articles before, and that this cessation shall not extend to restrain the setting forth, or employing of any ships for the defence of his Majesty's dominions."

The King replied to these propositions by a message to both Houses, complaining "That he had been left without an answer almost a month, from the 3d to the 28th of February. He conceived, that the articles of the cessation now presented to him, were so strict, that such of his good subjects who were not of his army would receive no benefit by the suspension, which he would ever insist upon: and therefore he returned the articles, with such alterations as he doubted not but both Houses would consent to, since they sufficiently manifested, how solicitous he was for the good of his people, and how desirous to prevent any more effusion of his subjects' blood. He desired the cessation might begin the 12th of March, or sooner, if the conditions should be sooner agreed on, and was willing the same should continue for twenty days, in which time he hoped by the treaty a full peace might be established throughout the kingdom.

It must be observed, that the King, in this negotiation, proposed to himself three advantages, as will hereafter evidently appear.

I. To gain time to make his preparations.

II. To set on foot, by means of a cessation of arms, a free commerce and correspondence between the quarters of both armies, and particularly, between London and Oxford, which would help to provide himself of many things necessary for the ensuing campaign, by sending for them from London or elsewhere.

III. To convey safely from York the forces and ammunition that were come from Holland.

All this was concealed under the pretence of procuring the ease of his people by a free commerce throughout the kingdom.

Though both Houses were by no means pleased with the King's alterations in their articles, yet as he offered to treat upon that subject, they desired a safe-conduct for six commissioners, namely, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Say, and four Commoners. The King immediately granted it, excepting the Lord Say, because he was proclaimed traitor. When he sent the safe-conduct, he signified to them by a message, that he was content his proposition concerning the magazines, &c. and theirs for disbanding the armies, should be first treated of and agreed, and then the second of his Majesty's, and the second of theirs, and so in order: and that the time of the treaty might not exceed twenty days.

The Parliament's five commissioners repairing to Oxford, presented to the King fresh articles concerning the cessation of arms. But they were so little different from the first, that the King was not satisfied with them. And therefore he delivered to the commissioners the following objections against the last articles.

I. They are in effect the same his Majesty formerly excepted to, and there is not the least mention of freedom of commerce between his subjects, and consequently they have no ease or benefit by this cessation, though that is his Majesty's chief aim.

II. The putting the ships that may be employed under the command of persons approved of by his Majesty, is not consented to by these articles; and by that means the conveying of any number of forces from one place to another (which is an act of hostility) remains free to both Houses.

III. The army raised by the Parliament is spoken of, as if his Majesty were no part of the Parliament, or himself to have raised that army. Now in order, to prevent any inconveniencies that might arise upon real differences or mistakes, upon the latitude of expressions and to avoid delays, his Majesty desired that the committee might have liberty to debate any such differences and expressions, and yet no such power is given in these articles, and the committee confessed to his Majesty, they have no liberty, but are strictly bound to the very words of the articles now sent.

IV. His Majesty's desire, that during the cessation none of his subjects might be imprisoned otherwise than according to the laws of the land, is in no degree consented to.

V. His Majesty's desire against violence is not at all taken notice of, nor is his desire against plundering any way satisfied; his Majesty not only meaning thereby the robbing of the subject by unruliness of the uncommanded soldiers, but particularly the violence and plundering used to his subjects, for not submitting to impositions required from them by ordinances of one or both Houses, which are contrary to the known laws of the land.

VI. Besides, as there is no consent given to those alterations offered by his Majesty, so where an absolute consent may be supposed, because the very words of his Majesty's articles are wholly preserved, yet by reason of the relation of somewhat going before that is varied by them, the sense of those words is wholly varied too. So that upon the matter, all the propositions made by his Majesty (which did not in terms agree with those presented to him) are utterly rejected. For these reasons his Majesty desires, that the committee now sent may speedily have liberty to debate and agree upon the articles of cessation."

Both Houses perceiving, the King concealed under the little alterations he had made in their articles, more than appeared at first sight, thought proper to tell him, they were not wholly ignorant what advantages he intended to draw from such a cessation of arms as he proposed. To that end, they sent him their reasons in writing, which were replied to, in writing, by the King, at great length. The two Houses having examined the King's answer, sent their committee new instruction, wherein they said, "His Majesty's expressions were so doubtful, that they did not think good to consume any more time in debates upon the cessation, and the rather, as the remainder of the whole time for the treaty was but seven days, and if the cessation were presently agreed, it would not yield any considerable advantage to the kingdom. Wherefore they should desire his Majesty, to give a speedy and positive answer to their first proposition concerning the disbanding, that so the people might not have the shadow, but the substance of peace."

These instructions being communicated to the King, he returned an answer, wherein he endeavoured to show, it was not his fault that a cessation of arms was not concluded. He pressed again, that whatever was thought doubtful in the articles might be expounded, whatever was excepted at might be debated, a cessation concluded, and power given to the committee to that end. Considerable discussion ensued; but it will here suffice to remark, that the conferences went no further than the first demand on each side; and the Parliament finding that there was no probability of coming to any agreement, suddenly recalled their commissioners.

During the course of this negotiation, the King had frequent conferences in private with the commissioners. Whitelock relates in his Memorials, that in one of these conferences, the commissioners (of whom he was one) having been with the King till midnight, and pressed him with their reasons upon a very material point, his Majesty was prevailed with to give a satisfactory answer, which would have much conduced to a happy success of the treaty, and told them, "He was fully satisfied, and promised to let them have his answer in writing according to their desire;" but because it was then too late to draw it up, he ordered them to wait on him the next morning at such an hour. Accordingly they came, but instead of that answer, which they expected, the King gave them a paper quite contrary to what was concluded the night before, and very much tended to the breach of the treaty. Whitelock says, he was informed by some of the King's own friends, that after the commissioners were gone from his Majesty, and his council also withdrawn, some of his bed-chamber (and they went higher) hearing from himself what answer he had promised, and doubting it would tend to such an issue as they did not wish, they being rather for the continuance tinuance of the war, never left persuading the King, till they prevailed with him to change his former resolutions, and give him order for his answer to be drawn directly contrary to what he had promised; it being that Prince's misfortune to prefer always the opinions of others to his own. Which is an observation confirmed also by the Lord Clarendon in his character of King Charles I.*

It was not without reason that the King desired a cessation of arms, on the terms by him proposed, though for never so short a space, and that he insisted upon a communication of quarters. He found himself at Oxford unprovided with ammunition, and the Queen, who was at York, had brought him a good quantity; but the difficulty was to convey them to Oxford with a strong guard. If therefore the cessation of arms had been concluded with the clause of communication of quarters, nothing would have hindered the King from sending for his ammunition to York, without the Parliament's being able to complain. For though in the first article of the proposed cessation, it was allowed to stop all persons carrying ammunition, it was not said, that such a conveying was a breach of the suspension. Since therefore by the article of communication of quarters, the King might have drawn as many of his troops as he pleased from York to Oxford, he might likewise, if this article had been granted have sent for his ammunition with a guard, which the Parliament's forces could not have attacked without breaking the truce, when the guard should have passed into their quarters.

At the beginning of April, when the treaty was negotiating at Oxford, the King detached Prince Rupert with twelve hundred horse, and seven or eight hundred foot, to establish a communication between York and Oxford, by securing certain places, between these two cities. The Prince marched by Birmingham, a town of the Parliament's, and taking it by storm, made the inhabitants pay a large fine, as a punishment for assisting the garrison to repulse him.†

After this little conquest, the Prince marched directly to Lichfield, where he entered without difficulty, the town being open in several places. But the Cathedral, with the close, was a sort of fortress, which he was obliged to besiege in form, it being strongly garrisoned. At last, he drained the moat, and sprung two mines, one whereof taking effect, he furiously stormed the place, which was bravely defended by the garrison: but the dread of not being able to stand a second assault, caused them to desire to capitulate. The Prince granted them an honourable capitulation, being very glad to be freed from the trouble of continuing the siege, which had lasted ten days. He intended to push his conquests farther to the north, in order to make a line of communication between York and Oxford: but the King recalled him from Lichfield, wanting him to raise the siege of Reading.

The treaty at Oxford being broken off the 15th of April, the Earl of Essex marched that day from Windsor, and on the next, appeared before Reading. His army consisted of sixteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse; and the garrison of three hundred horse, and three thousand foot. The King was so possessed with the notion, that the Parliament's soldiers served them unwillingly, and by constraint, that he issued out a proclamation, offering pardon to such as were in the Earl of Essex's army, a precaution entirely fruitless. At the beginning of the siege, the Governor, Sir Arthur Aston, being wounded in the head, and forced to keep his chamber, the command devolved to Colonel Richard Fielding, the eldest Colonel in the garrison.

The King no sooner heard of the siege of Reading, but he sent away a detachment of horse, under the command of Commissary Wilmot, who found means to throw into the town five hundred men and some powder. But this supply not appearing sufficient to Colonel Fielding, he demanded to capitulate, and a truce was agreed on, during which the besiegers and the besieged mutually gave hostages.

At the same time the King coming with his army within a few miles of Reading, detached Ruthen his General, lately made Earl of Forth, who with a thousand musqueteers, vigorously attacked a post,‡ by which the King must necessarily pass, in order to relieve Reading. The Earl of Forth was in hopes, that whilst he attacked this post, the garrison would sally out upon the besiegers. But as, without knowing it, he had made his attack just as the truce was agreed on, there was no sally from the town. So, not being able to force the pass, he retreated to the King.

Meanwhile, Fielding having negotiated a capitulation with the Earl of Essex, found means, before it was entirely concluded, to go in the night to the King, and tell him, he hoped to have liberty to march away with all their arms and baggage. The King approved of the capitulation, which was signed the next day, and the town surrendered to the besiegers. But by one of the articles, which probably Fielding did not tell the King, and which perhaps was not yet agreed on, the Earl of Essex excepted the deserters, who could not obtain liberty to march out with the rest of the garrison. When the King's troops came out of the town, and were passing through the enemies' guards, the soldiers were insulted, and some waggons plundered, contrary to the articles of the capitulation.

The King was very well pleased with saving the garrison of Reading, and indeed that was his principal view in permitting Fielding to capitulate. But when the garrison came to Oxford, several officers complained, that Fielding was too hasty in surrendering a place which could have held out much longer. Some even accused him openly of betraying the King. Whereupon he desired to be tried by a council of war, which was granted him. The King, who perhaps had too readily consented to the capitulation, and was incensed at him, when he understood that the place was capable of making a longer defence, could not however find fault with his capitulating, since it was done with his approbation. But his admitting the article whereby the deserters were excepted, was charged to him as a crime, and they published a declaration, protesting he had consented to that exception, being very far from refusing protection to any who should leave the enemy, and betake themselves to his service. Fielding was likewise accused of not paying punctual obedience to the King's orders. However this be, Fielding was sentenced by the council of war to lose his head; which sentence, after long intercession, was remitted by the King; but his regiment was given to another. This sentence occasioned great dissention in the King's army.

The Earl of Clarendon says, the King having received wrong intelligence, that the Earl of Essex, after the taking of Reading, was marched directly to Oxford, resolved to retire into the north to join the Earl of Newcastle. But it was only a false alarm. The Earl of Essex was so little able to besiege Oxford, that he was forced on the contrary to remain above six weeks at Reading, without being able to act, by reason of the sickness which infested his army.

* Whitelock observes farther upon this treaty, that their instructions were very strict, and tied them up to treat with none but the King himself, who, he says, manifested on this occasion, his great parts and abilities, strength of reason, and quickness of apprehension, with much patience in hearing what was objected against him, wherein he allowed all freedom, and would himself sum up the arguments, and give a most clear judgment upon them. He says also concerning the commissioners, the Earl of Northumberland demeaned himself with much courage and wisdom. Mr. Pierpoint acted his part with deep foresight and prudence. Sir William Ermyn was a gentleman of good understanding and conversation, and would give his opinion upon good reason. Sir John Holland, a gentleman of excellent parts as well as person, shewed a very good judgment and testimony of his abilities. Mr. Whitelock (that is, himself) was put upon very much labour, being employed in drawing up all the papers to the King, which were transcribed afterwards by the secretaries.

† In the too eager pursuit of the enemy William Fielding, Earl of Denbigh, who from the beginning of the war had been a volunteer in Prince Rupert's troop, was wounded, so that he died within two or three days.

‡ Cavesham bridge, defended by the Lord Roberts's and Berkley's regiments.

Whilst the treaty for peace was negociating at Oxford, Sir William Waller continued his conquests along the Severn, where having defeated the Lord Herbert of Ragland, son to the Marquis of Worcester, he became master of Hereford. But in assaulting Worcester, he was repulsed, after which he went and joined the Earl of Essex before Reading.

The taking of Reading seemed to be a good omen, to the Parliament, for the rest of the campaign; but the great mortality among the Earl of Essex's soldiers, suffered him not to improve this advantage. After the surrender of Reading, both Houses thought of no less than besieging Oxford, where the King was in great distress for want of warlike stores. In all appearance, the intelligence he had received, that the Earl of Essex was going to march thither, came from some friends at London, who knowing it was the Parliament's design, did not question, it would be put in execution. Meanwhile, the King received some ammunition in May, and as his enemies were not in condition to make any attempt, he remained quiet at Oxford.

At length, after a six weeks stay at Reading, the Earl of Essex marched towards Oxford, rather out of condescension to the Parliament, than in expectation of making any progress, by reason of the ill state of the army. He advanced however to Thame, within ten miles of Oxford, where he stopped. There was in his army a Scotch Colonel named Hurry, who had served in Germany with the Earl of Forth, the King's general, with whom he had a secret correspondence. As soon as the Earl of Essex approached Oxford, Hurry quitted the Parliament's service, and went over to the King, who received him very graciously. After that, he informed Prince Rupert of the situation of the quarters of the Parliament's army, and persuaded him to make an attempt upon the enemy. So the Prince going from Oxford in the evening with a body of horse, took a long circuit, and at break of day came to Wickham, where beating up the quarters of two regiments, one of horse, the other of foot, he cut them in pieces. Then he attacked another quarter with the same success, after which he resolved to retire by a bridge, where he had left a guard. But the Earl of Essex having now taken the alarm, had detached some troops to intercept the Prince, who was to cross Chaldgrave field, and enter a lane, which led to the bridge. The Earl of Essex's horse not giving the Prince time to reach the bridge, he chose rather to expect them in an open field, than enter the lane with the enemy in his rear. He charged therefore these horse with such bravery, that he put them to flight, towards a body of foot, which the Earl of Essex was leading himself. Whilst the horse were flying, the Prince passed the lane and bridge, and entered Oxford in triumph.* Upon the first alarm at the head-quarters, Mr. Hambden, Colonel of foot, mounted his horse, and rode as a volunteer in the regiment ordered to intercept the Prince. He was shot in the shoulder in this action, and within few a days died of the wound. He was a person very eminent in his party, both for his courage as an officer in the army, and for his wisdom and capacity as a member of Parliament. He had given proof of his firmness in his famous trial concerning ship-money.

After this loss, the Earl of Essex, whose army was in a very ill state, thought not proper to remain longer at Thame. He put his troops into quarters of refreshment at St. Albans, Uxbridge, and the neighbouring parts, till they should be recruited and furnished with many things they wanted, which the Parliament did not seem much to regard, whether from inability, or some other reason.

From that time, the King's military affairs began to flourish, and the Parliament was extremely embarrassed. The Queen joined the King the 13th of July, and brought him two thousand foot, a thousand horse, a hundred waggons laden with ammunition of all sorts, six pieces of cannon, and two mortars. On the other side, Sir William Waller, sent into the west by the Parliament, had the ill fortune to be defeated, and his army was so dispersed, that it was no longer serviceable. In this juncture it was that the King resolved to besiege Bristol, by Prince Rupert, with whom was joined the Cornish army that had vanquished Sir William Waller.

The 22d of July, Prince Rupert encamped before Bristol, and the same day, with the assistance of some sailors, who had been gained, he seized the ships in King-road, laden with goods of great value, which the inhabitants of Bristol had thought to secure there.

On the morrow, the Prince holding a council of war, it was resolved to proceed by assault, and not by approach. The walls must have been very weak, otherwise, it can hardly be conceived, that the besiegers should resolve to storm two days after their arrival, especially as there was a numerous garrison in the place. However this be, the next day both armies attacked the city, each at three several places, so that the garrison were forced to divide themselves into six bodies to defend the walls. The Cornish army was repulsed with great slaughter in their three assaults. The two divisions of Prince Rupert's were likewise repulsed: but the third, commanded by Colonel Washington, had better success, the Colonel finding means to make a breach in the wall large enough for the Prince to enter with his horse. But this advantage only put him in possession of the suburbs, beyond which was the city-wall, much stronger than what he had passed. However, he marched up the street to Frome-gate, where he was forced to halt, and where he lost many of his men, who were shot by the inhabitants from the walls and windows.

What the Prince had gained was so inconsiderable, that probably, the siege would still have cost much time, and many lives, if the governor had not lost his presence of mind, and ordered a parley to be beaten. The Governor was Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, who at the beginning of this Parliament, had made in the House of Commons several fine speeches against the King, but who, in all appearance, was not very skilful in the art of war. The Prince immediately granted the desired capitulation, thinking himself very happy to gain a place of that importance in so short a time. This capitulation was ill observed by the King's soldiers, who stripped those of the garrison, and made themselves more than amends for the breach of the capitulation at Reading. Fiennes was imprisoned for his cowardly surrender at Bristol, and some months after condemned to die by a council of war. But he was reprieved by the Earl of Essex, and passed the residue of his days abroad.

The taking of Bristol infusing fresh hopes into the King, he was willing to improve the present opportunity, whilst the Parliament had no army ready to oppose his progress. He resolved therefore to besiege Gloucester, the possession whereof would have been of great consequence to him. By it he would have been master of all the Severn, from Bristol to Shrewsbury, and of the whole country between that river and Wales, where there would have been only Hereford; which, probably would have quickly surrendered, By this means, he would not only have extended his quarters into a very good country, but also secured a communication from Cornwall to the northern counties. For as the Parliament had no army in the west, since Waller's defeat, the communication of the western counties with Bristol could not be interrupted. The taking of Gloucester would have opened a communication from Bristol to Shrewsbury, and from thence to the north, by means of Lancashire, which was more for him than for the Parliament. Besides this, the taking of Gloucester would have secured him the possession of Wales, where the Parliament would have had no entrance but by sea. If therefore even some of his friends have blamed him for undertaking this siege, it may be affirmed, the ill success was the best foundation of their opinion. Lord Clarendon says, the King having sent a messenger to

* With near two hundred prisoners, seven cornets of horse, and four ensigns of foot. Among other persons of note, Colonel Gunter was slain.

Colonel Massy, Governor of Gloucester, to persuade him to deliver the place, Massy in public answered in a high stile, but in private bade the messenger tell the King, "that if he came himself to besiege the town, he would not hold it against him, for it would not stand with his conscience to fight against the person of the King."* But the sequel showed, either that Massy had altered his mind, or the King had taken a mere compliment for a positive promise, since in the defence of this place Massy was very far from expressing the least inclination to favour the King.

Nothing shows more clearly how advantageous to the King the taking of Gloucester would have been, than the Parliament's alarm when they heard the first news of his marching to form the siege. Whereas before, the Earl of Essex's army was suffered to decay, all endeavours were used to recruit it, the moment the King's intention was known. Care was taken to complete the regiments by fresh levies of soldiers, raised in London with all possible expedition. And to facilitate these levies, the Parliament ordered the shops to be shut up till Gloucester should be relieved, and moreover, the Earl of Essex's army was strengthened with a numerous body of the city trained-bands. These things were done with that diligence, that in fifteen days the Earl of Essex was ready to march to the relief of the besieged.

The King came before Gloucester the 10th of August, with about eight thousand horse and foot, and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which however were not so vigorously pushed as was expected, by reason of the frequent sallies of the besieged. Besides, the King was obliged to go to Oxford, which made him lose some days. The Earl of Essex beginning to march the 26th of August, arrived in a few days near Gloucester, and, advancing to Presbury Hills, drew up his whole army in view of the city, expecting the King would come and give him battle. But the King not thinking fit to run any hazard, raised the siege, which could not be done without great disorder. The Earl of Essex marching into Gloucester, found the besieged reduced to a single barrel of powder, and no better provided with other stores. After staying there three days,† he departed towards London, passing through Tewkesbury in his way. He marched two days before the King knew he was gone, and surprised the town of Cirencester, where lay two regiments.‡ After that he crossed north Wiltshire, a deep and inclosed country, which obliged him to make very short marches.

As soon as the King had notice of the enemies' march and route, he departed also in order to follow them, sending Prince Rupert before with all his cavalry, consisting of five thousand horse. It is likely, his intention was that the Prince should post himself between London and the Parliament's army, whilst he followed, and put the army between him and his cavalry. Be this as it will, Prince Rupert came up with the Earl of Essex, as he was marching over Auborn-Chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night. There ensued in this place a sharp conflict, Prince Rupert having charged the Earl's rear, who were put into some disorder. This conflict obliged the Earl of Essex to quarter at Hungerford. The next day he continued his march towards Newbury, but found that the King had prevented him by two hours, and posted himself near the town. Prince Rupert, after the action of the foregoing day, went and joined the King.

The two armies, being too near each other to part without blows, prepared for battle, and the fight began,§ Prince Rupert, as usual, performing wonders with his horse. He quickly made the Parliament's cavalry give way: but took care not to commit the same fault he had done at Edge Hill, by pursuing the runaways too far. After he had routed the enemies' horse, he charged their infantry, who, though destitute of the assistance of the cavalry, received him with such intrepidity, that he could make no impression on their stand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about. It was fought all the rest of the day with pretty equal success. But in the night the King retired with his army, and left the way open to the Earl of Essex to proceed to Newbury. Next day, the Earl of Essex seeing the coast clear, pursued his march, and passing through Newbury, arrived at Reading as he had before resolved. Prince Rupert, who followed him, seeing him entered into the narrow lanes, attacked his rear, put them in disorder, and took some prisoners: but prevented not the Earl from continuing his march. He remained two days at Reading to refresh his troops, and without leaving a garrison in the place, which was possessed by the King's forces after his departure, returned to his old quarters. The King lost in this battle above twenty officers of note, and among others the Earl of Sunderland, the Earl of Caernarven, and Lord Falkland, Secretary of State, who would be present at the fight, though he had no call, not being a military officer. ‖

After the battle, the King retiring to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex to Windsor, neither had much share in the actions of the rest of the campaign.

About the beginning of May, whilst the King's troops were at Launceston, few in number, and very short of provisions, the Earl of Stamford, the Parliament's General in the west, entered Cornwall with an army of seven thousand men. He posted himself on the top of a hill near Stratton, whence he sent a party of twelve hundred horse, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, to Bodmin, a town in the middle of the county, in order to keep in awe and hinder the militia from joining the King's forces as they had once before done. Sir Ralph Hopton, who commanded for the King at Launceston, and had but three thousand men, easily saw he should be driven out of the county, unless he found means to avoid it by some notable action. This made him resolve to march against the enemies, though they were much superior in number, and advantageously posted. The Earl of Stamford thought himself so secure from any attack, that though he had frequent notice of the enemies' approach he could not believe it. Indeed, it would have been rash in Sir Ralph Hopton, to attack him with so great advantage, had there been any other way to save the county for the King. However that be, the 16th of May, approaching the hill on which the Earl of Stamford was encamped, he ordered him to be attacked at four several places.¶ As the assailants were

* Lord Clarendon does not say, the King sent a messenger, but that Colonel Legge, under whom Massy had served in the King's army, sent him a letter of kindness and overture, as was proper in such a case from one friend to another. To which letter Massy returned an answer in a high stile, but told the messenger in private as above.

† And in that time, says the Lord Clarendon, which was as wonderful as any part of the story, caused all necessary provisions to be brought in to them, out of those very quarters in which the King's army had been sustained, and which they conceived to be entirely spent: "So solicitous were the people to conceal what they had, and to reserve it for them."

‡ And took forty loads of provisions, six standards, three hundred common soldiers, and four hundred horses, the said forces being designed for Kent, to raise an army there for the King, and Sir Nicholas Crispe to command them.

§ Essex had been forced to lodge in the field all night.

‖ Being dissuaded by his friends to go into the fight, he said, "He was weary of the times, and foresaw much misery to his country, and did believe he should be out of it ere night." His death, says Whitelock, was lamented by all that knew or heard of him; being a gentleman of great parts, ingenuity and honour; courteous and just to all, and a passionate promoter of all endeavours of peace between the King and Parliament. He was slain in the 34th year of his age. Whitelock's account of Newbury fight is briefly this: Essex finding his soldiers full of mettle, and resolved to force their way, he led them in person, and first charged the enemy with his own regiment and the Lord Roberts's brigade of horse; the fight began about six a-clock in the morning, Sept. 20, and held with very hot service till ten or eleven at night. The Parliament's forces beat the enemy from all their advantages, got the hill from them on which they were posted, pursued them to Newbury, and out of the town again, but the night coming on, they could pursue them no further; and though the King's forces (especially the horse, consisting most of gentlemen) made a gallant resistance, yet this place not being proper for their fight, their foot were thus beaten, and in the night marched away, leaving Essex master of the field, whose soldiers had the pillage of the dead bodies.

¶ The four divisions of the little army were led on, the first by the Lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton; the second by Sir John Berkley and Sir Bevil Greenvil; the third by Sir Nicholas Slanning and Colonel Trevannion; were resolved to conquer or die, they gained, though with great difficulty, the top of the hill, which their enemies were at length forced to relinquish, after sustaining the charge many hours. In this action the Earl of Stamford had only three hundred men killed, but left seventeen hundred in the hands of the enemy. Among these prisoners was Major-General Chudleigh, who being carried to Oxford, turned to the King. The Earl of Stamford, whether to excuse his defeat, or upon other grounds, openly complained, that Chudleigh had betrayed him, and in the heat of the battle turning against him, charged him with the body under his command.

After this battle the Earl of Stamford throwing himself into Exeter, his army being dispersed, and the party of horse sent to Bodmin, thinking proper to retire to Plymouth, Hopton remained master of Cornwall. Shortly after, he was informed by a messenger from Oxford, that the Parliament had resolved to send Sir William Waller into the west, with forces to join the remains of the Earl of Stamford's army and some levies that were to be raised in that country, and that the King on his part was sending thither the Marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice with a body of troops, who were now upon their march. This made him think, it would be very proper for his little Cornish army to join the Marquis's forces. He marched therefore into Devonshire, leaving a party at Saltash to defend Cornwall from any incursions of Plymouth, and advanced to Tiverton, where he expected orders from the Marquis. Presently after, hearing the Marquis of Hertford was come to Chard, a town in Somersetshire, on the edge of Devonshire, with seventeen hundred horse and one thousand foot, he went and joined him, and the two bodies together formed an army of seven thousand men. Taunton, a large town in Somersetshire, was the first, the Marquis of Hertford resolved to attack. But the garrison saved him the labour, by retiring to Bridgewater, on account of a sedition raised by the inhabitants. On the morrow, the Parliament's troops quitted also Bridgewater, and in a few days Dunstar castle was surrendered to the King.*

The Marquis of Hertford having staid about Taunton some days, heard at last that Sir William Waller was within two days' march of him, drawing troops together with the utmost diligence, and expecting more from London and Bristol. Whereupon he resolved to attack him, without giving him time to strengthen his army any more. Whilst he was preparing to execute this design, the committee of the Militia, who were levying forces in those parts to join them with Waller's, perceiving a favourable opportunity, beat up one of the Marquis's quarters, who was now advanced to Somerton, and gave so brisk an alarm to the King's troops, that the Marquis was forced to draw out the whole army. Then the Parliament's forces retired to Wells: but seeing they were pursued, quitted Wells, and posted themselves on the top of Mendip hill, which overlooks the city. The Marquis of Hertford being come to Wells stayed there, the day being far spent. But Prince Maurice, Sir Ralph Hopton, and the Earl of Carnarvon, taking the enemies' retreat for a flight, went out with two regiments of horse to pursue them, and marched directly to them. Whereupon the Parliament's forces being mostly foot, and few in number, retired in order to join a detachment of horse sent by Waller to support them. But the Earl of Carnarvon, who was farthest advanced, gave them no time to retreat in good order. As they were obliged to pass through a lane, he entered after them, and pursued them beyond, till he met with Waller's horse, who stopped his career, and compelled him to retire in his turn with great precipitation. Prince Maurice coming to his relief, a warm action ensued, wherein the Prince received two cuts in his head, and was beaten off his horse, but was fortunately relieved. Night obliged both parties to retire, the King's to Wells, and the Parliament's to Bath.

Some days after, the Marquis of Hertford, knowing Waller's army daily increased, marched towards Bath to try to draw him to an engagement. But Waller having his reasons to defer it, because he still expected fresh supplies, the Marquis advanced to Marsfield, five miles beyond Bath to Oxford. Whereupon Waller, whose chief business was to hinder him from joining with the King, marched out of Bath, and drew up his army on Lansdown, expecting the enemies, who failed not to move towards him. As the Marquis of Hertford was in a country so disaffected to the King, that only force could procure him any supply or relief; and as besides, he was advanced beyond Bath on purpose to engage them to fight, he was unwilling to lose the opportunity. In this action, which was called the battle of Lansdown, of his two thousand horse the Marquis of Hertford lost above fifteen hundred. But on the other hand, he drove Waller from his post, and compelled him to give way, about demi-culverin shot. Next day, Waller retired to Bath, and the Marquis entirely remained master of the field.†

But this inconsiderable advantage, gained with the loss of almost all his horse, threw him into a very ill situation. He had been sent into the west to drive Sir William Waller from thence, and yet, after the battle, Waller was between the King's army and the western counties, where the Marquis could penetrate but by a second battle, which he was not in condition to hazard, being without horse. This made him resolve to march to the Devizes, leave there his infantry under the command of Sir Ralph Hopton, and break through to Oxford, with the Prince and the remainder of the horse, in expectation of returning from thence with a body of cavalry strong enough to bring off the foot he should leave at the Devizes, which was but thirty miles from Oxford. This resolution was pursued. But as soon as he had quitted his infantry at the Devizes, Waller came before the town with his whole army, and invested these troops, who were in a very ill state by reason of the scarcity of provisions. As he was sensible, the besieged could not remain long in such a state, he made them an overture of capitulating with him, which Hopton gladly embraced, in the uncertainty whether any supplies would come from Oxford, or would arrive soon enough. He entered therefore into a treaty with Waller: but with intention to prolong it as much as possible, and not yield to the last extremity, as expecting every moment to be relieved from Oxford. Waller was so confident that they were at his mercy, that he had sent the Parliament word, "That their business was done, and by the next post, he would send the number and quality of his prisoners."

Meanwhile, the Marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice being come to Oxford, and having represented to the King the distress of his troops at the Devizes, his Majesty immediately sent the Lord Wilmot with fifteen hundred horse, who came within two miles of the Devizes before the capitulation between Hopton and Waller was signed.

Waller was no sooner informed of the enemies' approach, but he drew up without drum or trumpet his whole army on Roundway Down, over which the King's troops were necessarily to pass in order to join those in the town. Wilmot, finding he could not execute his design without fighting, drew up within musquet shot of Waller's army. But perhaps he would have thought of it more than once, before he attacked with fifteeen hundred horse an army so superior in number, had not Trevannion; the fourth by Colonel Basset and Colonel William Godolphin. In memory of this battle, Sir Ralph Hopton was afterwards created Lord Hopton of Stratton. As for the twelve hundred horse sent to Bodmin, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, father to the Major-General, upon the news of the defeat, Sir George, with as many as he could keep together, got into Plymouth.

* By Mr. Lutterel the owner, who thereupon was made governor of it by the Marquis.

† In this battle, fell Sir Bevil Greenvil. This was the first time the King's horse had turned from an enemy, occasioned, it seems by a regiment of cuirassiers commanded by Sir Arthur Haslerig, which were so completely armed, that they were called the Regiment of Lobsters. Just after the battle, Sir Ralph Hopton was miserably hurt by the accidental blowing up of some powder.

Waller begun the fight, by charging the enemy with a regiment of cuirassiers lately sent from London, and which till now had been deemed invincible.* This regiment was vigorously repulsed, and retreating in disorder, infused such a terror into Waller's troops, that they made but a faint resistance. Meanwhile Hopton seeing from the town the disorder of the enemies, came out with his foot, and bravely seconding Wilmot, who for his part did not give the enemies time to recover themselves, they quickly put the whole army to rout, killed five or six thousand men, and took nine hundred prisoners. Waller, after his defeat, escaped to Bristol. He complained very much of the Earl of Essex, who, lying then at Thame, suffered Wilmot to pass without sending a party after him, or giving the alarm to Oxford, which would have caused Wilmot to be recalled. The Earl of Essex on the other hand, who was no friend to Waller, could not forbear saying some reproachful things on his defeat. This bred such enmity between them, that it might have been very prejudicial to their party, had not the Parliament taken care to reconcile them.

After so complete a victory, the Lord Wilmot returned in triumph to Oxford, and the Marquis of Hertford, taking the command of the army, appeared before the city of Bath, the gates whereof were opened at the first summons. Presently after, the King, having resolved to besiege Bristol, ordered the Cornish army to join Prince Rupert at the siege. As soon as he was master of Bristol, he resolved to send an army into the west, under the command of Prince Maurice, and to keep the Marquis of Hertford near his person. To that end, he gave orders to the Earl of Carnarvon, who was to serve under Prince Maurice, to advance towards the west with a party of horse, whilst the Prince should follow with the infantry, of which the Cornish army made the best part. The Earl of Carnarvon marched first into Dorsetshire, which declared for the Parliament, and took Weymouth, Dorchester, and Portland castle. Here Prince Maurice came and joined his cavalry. When he was at the head of the army, he suffered his troops to use such licence, and so ill observed the articles made upon the surrender of the towns, that the Earl of Carnarvon, out of indignation quitted his command in this army, and returned to the King before Gloucester. Meanwhile Prince Maurice, after staying some time in Dorsetshire, entered Devonshire, and laid siege to Exeter, which was surrendered by capitulation by the Earl of Stamford.

After the taking of Exeter, the Prince applied himself chiefly to increase the number of his forces by fresh levies, whilst the Parliament had no army in that country able to withstand him. In a short space, he assembled seven thousand foot, with horse in proportion, besides three thousand men commanded by Colonel John Digby before Plymouth, the blockade of which place he had, till the Prince should come and besiege it. There had lately been discovered at Plymouth a plot framed by Sir Alexander Carew, knight of the shire for Cornwall, and governor of the fort and island of St. Nicholas, on which depended the security of the town, to deliver the island and fort to the King. Carew was apprehended and sent to London, where some time after he was condemned to die by a court-martial.†

When Prince Maurice had compleated his levies, instead of going to Plymouth, he laid siege to Dartmouth, which employed him more than a month. During that time, the inhabitants of Plymouth, whom the discovery of Carew's plot had thrown into a great consternation, recovered themselves, and resolved upon an obstinate defence. This resolution was confirmed by a supply of five hundred men sent by the Parliament by sea, with a Scotch governor, an experienced warrior. So, Prince Maurice, when he came before the place, found the conquest of it much more difficult than he had expected. He continued however the siege, notwithstanding the winter, which was now begun.

Since the Earl of Newcastle's arrival at York, with his army levied in the north, the Lord Fairfax had been obliged to keep at some distance from that city, to avoid being attacked by an army much more numerous than his own. All the northern parts from York to the borders of Scotland were for the King. The southern part of Yorkshire was for the Parliament, and the war was waging in the middle parts of the country to the right and left. But little else was transacted, besides the taking of small towns, which served only to enlarge the quarters of one or other army.

In May 1643, the Earl of Newcastle took two or three of these places. In the same month, the Lord Fairfax having detached fifteen hundred men, under the command of his son Sir Thomas Fairfax, ordered Wakefield to be attacked, where lay three thousand men of the King's party. This assault was made about four in the morning, with such vigour and conduct, that the King's troops were driven from the town, and many taken and slain. Amongst the prisoners was General Goring the commander.‡

Presently after, the Earl of Newcastle had his revenge. Having taken Howley house, he marched from thence towards Bradford, and in the way was met on Atherton-moor by the Lord Fairfax, whom he entirely routed. Fairfax, with the remains of his army, threw himself into Hull, where Sir John Hotham had been lately apprehended by order of Parliament, and the Lord Fairfax was made governor of that important place.

In June, Gainsborough, a town in Lincolnshire, was taken by the Lord Willoughby of Parham, commander for the Parliament in those parts, who there made the Earl of Kingston prisoner. But being informed that the Earl of Newcastle was preparing to recover Gainsborough, he sent his prisoner in a pinnace to Hull. The Earl was unfortunately shot by some of his own party, who would have stopped the pinnace. Meanwhile, the Earl of Newcastle began his march to besiege Gainsborough, and at his approach, detached a party of horse to invest the town. Oliver Cromwell arriving at the same time, with design to supply the town with provisions, defeated this detachment, pursuing them even in sight of their main body, which he did not think to be so near. As he was not in condition to face this army, he retreated in good order, and after throwing supplies into the town, retired at a greater distance. Shortly after, the Earl of Newcastle retook Gainsborough, and possessed himself of Lincoln, where he put a strong garrison; after which, he besieged Hull, whilst the King was before Gloucester.

The Lord Fairfax, assisted by Sir John Meldrum, a Scotchman, defended the town of Hull with great bravery and conduct for five weeks, though he was vigorously attacked. At last, October the 11th, the besieged made a great sally, and after a very obstinate fight, which was several times renewed, drove the besiegers from their trenches, and seized their cannon. This obliged the Earl of Newcastle, now created Marquis, to raise the siege.

The same day this famous sally was made at Hull, a great body of horse, part of the Earl of Newcastle's army, commanded by the Lord Widrington, were routed at Horn castle, by the Earl of Manchester, who had with him Sir Thomas Fairfax, and Cromwell.

The rest of the military actions during the winter, after this campaign, having a necessary connection with the affairs of Scotland and Ireland, we must speak of what passed in these two kingdoms in the course of this year.

The affairs of the Parliament not being in a situation to afford a prospect of any great advantages upon the King this campaign, the Scots began to prepare to assist them, in case there should be occasion. To that purpose, about the beginning of May, it was moved by some of the leading men, that there might be a joint meeting of the council, the conservators of the peace, and the commissioners for public burthens. In the hands of all these was lodged the authority of the kingdom, when there was no Parliament. This motion was readily complied with, all the public offices and posts being filled with men of that party. In this assembly it was proposed, that, considering the danger the kingdom was in, by reason of armies levying in the north of England, Scotland should be put in a posture of defence. As this could not be done without a Parliament, or a convention of estates, it was urged, that there was an absolute necessity of immediately summoning such a convention. The Marquis of Hamilton, and several others, strongly opposed it, alledging, that for them to appoint a convention without the King's order, was an encroachment upon the royal prerogative in the highest degree: that his Majesty had promised to call a Parliament in the year 1644, and therefore to hold a convention of estates before that time, without his privity, was directly contrary to the laws of the land. But their arguments were in vain. It was carried by the majority, that the Lord Chancellor should summon a convention of estates, against the 22d of June.

* This was the regiment of Lobsters before mentioned, which, according to Rushworth, rashly led on by Sir Arthur Haslerig, leaving the foot, charged the King's forces very disadvantageously, and so were presently routed.

‡ With about fifteen hundred men, and twenty-seven colours of foot.

The King having notice of what was projecting in Scotland, immediately sent thither the Earls of Roxborough, Kinnoul, and Lanerick. These three Lords arrived at Edinburgh the 15th of May, and brought the Marquis of Hamilton a patent, creating him a Duke. Besides this, they presented to the council a declaration from the King, wherein he endeavoured to display the justice of his cause against the Parliament of England. He vindicated his innocence with regard to all the aspersions cast upon him, particularly concerning religion, and represented very pathetically, the wrongs and injustices done him.

Shortly after, the King hearing that a convention of estates was summoned without his order or privity, easily perceived, this step was not taken without an intention to support it. He chose therefore to permit them to assemble, but with express orders to limit their consultations to the best ways and means of supplying the Scottish army in Ireland, and to relieving public burthens by pressing a speedy payment of the brotherly assistance due from England. But the convention was by no means inclined to be thus restrained. When the estates met, the first thing in debate was the limitation in the King's letter of license. The Duke of Hamilton, with the King's other friends,* voted it "No convention but as regulated by his Majesty's letter;" but all the rest voted it "A free convention."† The King pretended afterwards, the Duke of Hamilton and his brother the Earl of Lanerick had not served him with sincerity, and if they had pleased, they might have hindered the convention from meeting. Some time after, these two Lords repairing to Oxford, he ordered them to be apprehended, but the Earl of Lanerick found means to escape, and his brother the Duke was sent down to be imprisoned in the castle of St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall.

The convention of estates met the 22d of June, and the general assembly of the kirk, the 2d of August. It is observable, it was in June that an ordinance of the Parliament of England, was published for calling an assembly of divines and others, to be consulted by both Houses, for settling the government and liturgy of the church of England, and that this assembly held their first session the 1st of July, a few days after the meeting of the convention of estates in Scotland. The sequel shewed with what design this assembly was appointed.

The precaution taken by the Scots was not ineffectual. They seem to have foreseen what happened soon after. For in the interval between the proposing a convention of estates, and the time of their meeting, the Earl of Essex's army was seized with sickness after the taking of Reading; the city of Bristol fell into the King's hands; and Sir William Waller's forces were routed at Roundway-down. If the King's successes had not received a check, by the raising of the siege of Gloucester, and the battle of Newbury, it is very visible, the Parliament's affairs were in a very ill situation about the end of July and the beginning of August, that is, at the time the convention of estates, and the general assembly met in Scotland. Accordingly, both Houses failed not to improve the precaution taken by the Scots, and which, in all appearance, had been suggested to them. As they saw their affairs were declining, they applied, without farther consideration, to the convention of Scotland for assistance, and sent commissioners, with full powers to treat. These commissioners who came to Edinburgh whilst the King was approaching Gloucester, found the estates of Scotland as well disposed as they could wish. They had brought with them two declarations, one directed to the convention, the other, to the general assembly. The first was, only to desire the speedy assistance of the estates, and to inform them, that their commissioners had instructions to treat with them, not only concerning the satisfaction to be made for the desired aid, and also about settling the accounts between the two kingdoms. In the second, both Houses acknowledged the great zeal and love, manifested by the general assembly of the churches of Scotland, in their endeavours for the preservation of the true Protestant religion, from the attempts of the Popish and prelatical party, to the necessary reformation of church government in England, and the more near union of both churches. And therefore they exhorted the assembly to send into England some of their body, for the furtherance of that work in conjunction with the assembly of divines now sitting at Westminster. They declared also, that besides their instructions in the civil matters of both kingdoms, the commissioners had received directions to resort to and consult with the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland, in every thing relating to the reformation of the church of England; and to that end, Mr. Marshal, and Mr. Nye, ministers of God's word, were appointed to assist the commissioners with their advice.

With these declarations the commissioners found no difficutly in their negotiation. On the contrary, the general assembly addressed to the estates a declaration, containing the reasons which ought to induce them to assist the Parliament of England. The assembly and convention having respectfully appointed a committee to treat with the English commissioners, it was agreed at the first conferences, that the best and speediest means for accomplishing the union and assistance desired, was that both nations should enter into a mutual covenant or league. This covenant was prepared in a very short time, so that, August the 17th, it was presented to the estates and the general assembly, and approved by both the same day. On the morrow, being the 18th, it was sent to England by the Lord Maitland, afterwards Duke Lauderdale. He was accompanied with Mr. Alexander Henderson, moderator of the general assembly, and Mr. Gillespy, both ministers, as commissioners from the assembly to treat with the assembly of divines at Westminster, about the union of the two churches.

August the 28th, ten days after the departure of the Scotch commissioners, the Parliament of England consented to the covenant. Immediately after, the assembly of divines were ordered by both Houses to frame an exhortation to the taking of the covenant, to be read publicly in all the churches. That done, the covenant was ordered to be printed and published, and appointed to be taken the 22d of September by all the members of Parliament, and the assembly of divines, which was done with great solemnity. The manner of taking it was thus: the covenant was read, and then notice was given that each person should immediately, by swearing thereunto, worship the great name of God, and testify so much outwardly, by lifting up their hands; and then they went up into the chancel of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and there subscribed their names in a roll of parchment, in which this covenant was fairly written. It was taken that day by two hundred and twenty-two members of Parliament.*

Shortly after, the King issued out a proclamation to forbid the taking of the covenant, but it produced no great effect. On the contrary, the committee of estates did, by their printed act of the 22d of October, ordain it to be sworn and subscribed by all the subjects, under pain of having their goods and rents confiscated. After that, they summoned all the Lords of the council to come and sign it before them. The Duke of Hamilton, and some others, refusing to subscribe it, the committee by another act, of the 17th of November, ordered all their lands to be seized, and their persons to be apprehended, with permission to kill such as resisted.

After both kingdoms had agreed upon the covenant, the estates of Scotland appointed commissioners to treat with the English, concerning the aid desired. The Scots, by means of 100,000*l.* which they received from England; by the hopes of good pay, and warm quarters; not to mention men's favourable disposition towards the cause; soon completed their levies. And having added, to their other forces, the troops which they had recalled from Ireland, they were ready, about the end of the year, to enter England, under the command of their old general, the Earl of Leven, with an army of above 20,000 men.

In the treaty of peace concluded at London 1641, there was this clause: "That the kingdom of Scotland shall not denounce nor make war against the kingdoms of England, or Ireland, without consent of the Parliament of Scotland; nor, on the other hand, the kingdom of England make war against Scotland, without consent of the Parliament of England. And in case any of the subjects of any of the kingdoms shall rise in arms, or make war against any other of the kingdoms and subjects thereof, without consent of the Parliament of that kingdom whereof they are subjects, or upon which they do depend, that they shall be held as traitors to the states whereof they are subjects. And that both the kingdoms, in the cases aforesaid, be bound to concur in the repressing of those that shall happen to rise in arms, or make war without consent of their own Parliament."

The King supposing, that the Scots, in aiding the Parliament against him, intended to make war upon England, inferred from this clause, that they were guilty of treason. The Scots supposed on the contrary that, far from intending to make war against England, their design was to aid and defend that kingdom against the Popish and prelatical party, and rescue the King out of their hands.

As to Ireland, the success of the first campaign had been so equal on both sides, that neither could boast of having gained any great advantage. The point was to continue the war, each rightly judging, peace would be always very remote, so long as things remained in a state of equality. And therefore the King and the Parliament thought of strengthening themselves against

* A solemn league and covenant for reformation and defence of Religion, the honour and happiness of the King, and the peace and safety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

"We Noblemen, Barons, Knights, Gentlemen, Citizens, Burgesses, Ministers of the Gospel, and Commons of all sorts in the kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland, by the Providence of God living under one King, and being of one reformed religion, having before our eyes the glory of God, and the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the honour and happiness of the King's Majesty and his posterity, and the true public liberty, safety and peace of the kingdoms, wherein every one's private condition is included, and calling to mind the treacherous and bloody plots, conspiracies, attempts, and practices of the enemies of God against the true religion and professors thereof in all places, especially in these three kingdoms, ever since the Reformation of Religion, and how much their rage, power, and presumption are of late, and at this time, encreased and exercised, whereof the deplorable estate of the church and kingdom of Ireland, the distressed estate of the church and kingdom of England, and the dangerous estate of the church and kingdom of Scotland, are present and public testimonies; we have (now at last) after other means of supplication, remonstrance, protestations and sufferings, for the preservation of ourselves and our religion from utter ruin and destruction, according to the commendable practices of these kingdoms in former times, and the example of God's people in other nations, after mature deliberation, resolved and determined to enter into a mutual and solemn league and covenant, wherein we all subscribe, and each one of us for himself, with our hands lifted up to the most high God, do swear:

"I. That we shall sincerely, really, and constantly, through the Grace of God, endeavour in our several places and callings, the preservation of the Reformed Religion in the church of Scotland, in doctrine, worship, discipline and government, against our common enemies, the Reformation of Religion in the kingdoms of England, and Ireland, in doctrine, worship, discipline and government, according to the word of God, and the example of the best Reformed churches; and we shall endeavour to bring the churches of God in the three kingdoms, to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, confessing of faith, form of church-government, directory for worship and catechising, that we, and our posterity after us, may, as brethren, live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us.

"II. That we shall in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of popery, prelacy, (that is, church-government by Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that Hierarchy) superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found contrary to sound doctrine, and the power of godliness, lest we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues, and that the Lord may be one, and his name one in the three kingdoms.

"III. We shall with the same sincerity, reality and constancy, in our several vocations, endeavour with our estates and lives, mutually to preserve the rights and privileges of the Parliament, and the liberties of the kingdoms, and to preserve and defend the King's Majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms, that the world may bear witness with our consciences of our loyalty, and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminish his Majesty's just power and greatness.

"IV. We shall also with all faithfulness endeavour the discovery of all such as have been or shall be incendiaries, malignants, or evil instruments, by hindering the Reformation of religion, dividing the King from his people, or one of the kingdoms from another, or making any faction or parties among the people, contrary to this league and covenant, that they may be brought to public trial; and receive condign punishment, as the degree of their offences shall require or deserve, or the supreme judicatories of both kingdoms respectively, or others having power from them for that effect, shall judge convenient.

"V. And whereas the happiness of a blessed peace between these kingdoms, denied in former times to our progenitors, is, by the good Providence of God granted unto us, and hath been lately concluded and settled by both Parliaments, we shall, each one of us, according to our place and interest, endeavour, that they may remain conjoined in a firm peace and union to all posterity, and that justice may be done upon the wilful opposers thereof, in manner expressed in the precedent articles.

"VI. We shall also, according to our places and callings, in this common cause of religion, liberty, and peace of the kingdoms, assist and defend all those that enter into this league and covenant, in the maintaining and pursuing thereof, and shall not suffer ourselves directly or indirectly, by whatsoever combination, persuasion, or terror, to be divided and withdrawn from this blessed union and conjunction, whether to make defection to the contrary part, or to give ourselves to a detestable indifferency or neutrality in this cause, which so much concerneth the glory of God, the good of the kingdoms, and the honour of the King, but shall all the days of our lives zealously and constantly continue therein, against all opposition, and promote the same according to our power against all letts and impediments whatsoever; and what we are not able ourselves to suppress or overcome, we shall reveal and make known, that it may be timely prevented or removed; all which we shall do as in the sight of God.

"And because these kingdoms are guilty of many sins and provocations against God, and his son Jesus Christ, as is too manifest by our present distresses and dangers, the fruits thereof: we profess and declare before God, and the world, our unfeigned desire to be humbled for our sins, and for the sins of these kingdoms, especially that we have not, as we ought, valued the inestimable benefit of the Gospel; that we have not laboured for the purity and power thereof; and that we have not endeavoured to receive Christ in our hearts, nor to walk worthy of him in our lives, which are the causes of other sins and transgressions, so much abounding amongst us. And our true and unfeigned purpose, desire, and endeavour, for ourselves, and all others under our power and charge, both in public and in private, in all duties we owe to God and man, to amend our lives, and each one to go before another in the example of a real Reformation; that the Lord may turn away his wrath and heavy indignation, and establish these churches and kingdoms in truth and peace. And this covenant we make in the presence of Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as we shall answer at that great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed; most humbly beseeching the Lord to strengthen us by his holy Spirit for this end, and to bless our desires and proceedings with such success, as may be deliverance and safety to his people, and encouragement to other Christian churches, groaning under, or in danger of, the yoke of anti-christian tyranny, to join in the same, or like association and covenant. To the glory of God, the enlargement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and the peace and tranquillity of Christian kingdoms, and commonwealths."

the ensuing campaign. The treaty of Oxford not succeeding, as was easy to foresee, the King thought of means to employ at home the English troops that served in Ireland, and to that purpose, of making a truce with the rebels. As this notable project could not but be odious to the English, and render suspicious all the King's protestations with respect to the Irish rebellion, he saw himself obliged to use more caution, to procure an excuse to conclude this cessation. This he did by engaging the Lords-Justices of Ireland, and the council of Dublin to countenance his project.*

To have a pretence to conclude this truce, the King believed, the best way was to persuade the public, it would be extremely advantageous, or rather was absolutely necessary, to the English in Ireland, and their only refuge, to preserve what they still possessed in that country.

In the situation of affairs, since war had been declared between the King and the Parliament, the Lords-Justices who governed Ireland were greatly embarrassed. They had been commissioned by the King, and consequently from him they were to receive their orders. But on the other hand, the Parliament having taken upon them to pay the charges of the Irish war, they could not openly declare for the King, without forfeiting the assistance of the Parliament, the King not being in condition to supply them. A perfect neutrality was not possible, because the King's and the Parliament's interests being opposite, they could not implicitly obey the one, without being suspected by the other. They chose therefore to try to content both, as far as was possible, and the rather, as the King and the Parliament expressed an equal desire to end the Irish war. But they could not remain long in this situation. Such was their case at last, that it was not possible for them to please both. The Parliament having sent in October, 1642, a committee to Dublin to assist the council, and settle with the Lords-Justices, what related to the continuance of the war, these commissioners were at first received with respect, but in February 1643, by the King's express order, were sent back to England. The King was well pleased, the Parliament should supply what was necessary for continuing the war, but unwilling they should have any share in the government of Ireland, or their commissioners a place in the council of state. Shortly after, he removed some of the Lords-Justices and counsellors. Probably, he was then forming the project of a truce with the rebels, and wanted for that purpose, that the Lords-Justices, and all the counsellors should be disposed to act only by his orders. Besides, on this supposition, the Parliament's commissioners could not but be a great impediment, had they continued to assist at the council of state. From that time also, the instances of the Lords-Justices to the King and Parliament for aid, became more pressing and frequent. They represented the state of the English in Ireland, as entirely desperate, without a speedy supply of men, money, and ammunition. They said, the officers were very importunate for leave to return to England. In a word, they omitted nothing, that was apt to create a belief, there was no remedy. On the other hand, some officers of the English army presented a remonstrance to the Lords-Justices, April the 4th, 1643, declaring, they were reduced to despair for want of money to subsist, and that it ought not to be thought strange, if in their case they should have recourse to the first and primary law of nature, which God hath endowed men withal, namely, the law of self-preservation.

The remonstrance of the officers being sent to the King, he took occasion from thence to send to the Marquis of Ormond a commission, impowering him to treat with the rebels, and agree with them upon a cessation of arms for one year. He gave notice of it to the Lords-Justices, in a letter of April the 23d, 1643, commanding them to assist the Marquis in the execution of his commission, to the utmost of their power. The date of this commission is remarkable, for it evidently shows, that the Scots' resolution to assist the Parliament, which was not taken till the following August, was not the cause of the Irish truce.

May the 3d, the King renewed his orders to the Marquis of Ormond concerning the truce. But before the Marquis had received these fresh orders, the Lords-Justices had written to the King, the 11th of the same month, a very expressive letter, representing the miserable condition of Ireland, in such terms as showed, that every one was reduced to despair for want of money, and provisions, though till then the English forces had been crowned with success against the rebels.†

The King, who meant to take an advantage from this letter, to demonstrate to the public, the necessity of the cessation he intended to conclude, sent it to both Houses, who immediately took this affair into consideration. A committee was appointed, with orders to think of ways to raise money for Ireland. Upon the report of the committee, the Parliament resolved to raise money by voluntary contributions, and offered very advantageous terms to such as should advance the sums required.‡ But notwithstanding this, the King, July the 2d, dispatched fresh orders to the Lords-Justices, and the Marquis of Ormond, to conclude a truce for one year, which they were already endeavouring. From the 20th of June, the general council of the Irish, assembled at Kilkenny, had granted a commission to treat.

September the 7th, the King repeated his orders to the Marquis of Ormond, to conclude the truce as soon as possible. At the same time, he ordered him to send into England, all the English forces that could be spared after the conclusion of the truce. His reason was, that an army was preparing in Scotland to invade England.

At length, the cessation was signed the 15th of September, on the condition that both parties should remain in possession of what they held. The King founded the necessity of it, first, upon a remonstrance presented to him, December the 1st, 1642, by four Colonels, as well in their own, as in the names of many other officers, who served in the army of Ireland, wherein they told him, it was impossible for them to subsist any longer, if means were not found to supply their pressing wants. Secondly, upon the repeated letters sent from the Lords-Justices to the King and the Parliament, since January 1642-3, wherein they said, the army was likely to perish in a few days, for want of assistance. Thirdly, upon the forementioned remonstrance of the officers of the 4th of April, wherein they pretended a few hours' delay to assist them, would be too long. Nevertheless this army, which was reduced to extremity the 1st of December 1642, found means to subsist till the 15th of September 1643, though the Lords-Justices complained, they had received no supplies since November. This is a clear evidence, that all these complaints were very much aggravated by the private direction of the King, who meant to use them for pretence to the truce. This is what the Parliament represented in a declaration published

* The King, says Lord Clarendon, was not all this while without a due sense of the dangers that threatened him, in the growth and improvement of the power and strength of the enemy, and how impossible it would be for him, without some more extraordinary assistance, to resist that torrent, which he foresaw by the next spring would be ready to overwhelm him, if he made not provision accordingly. And finding by degrees, that it was not in his power to compose the disturbances of England, or to prevent those of Scotland, and abhorring the thought of introducing a foreign nation to subdue his own subjects, he began to think of expedients which might allay the distempers in Ireland; that so, having one of his kingdoms in peace, he might apply the power of that towards the procuring it in his other dominions. He was not ignorant, how tender an argument that business of Ireland was, and how prepared men were to prevent whatsoever he said, or did in it; and therefore he resolved to proceed with that caution, that whatsoever was done in it, should be by the council of that state, who were understood to be most skillful in those affairs."

† They complained, that they had no victuals, clothes, or other provisions requisite towards their sustenance; no money to provide them with any thing they wanted; no arms, and not above forty barrels of powder in his Majesty's stores.

‡ The adventurers were to have such and such towns, with so many acres of land for security, upon advancing such a sum upon each town. The sum proposed to be raised, was 200,000l.

lished on account of the Irish cessation, before they had notice of its being concluded: they complained very strongly, that they were never acquainted by the states of Ireland, with the treaty of a cessation, much less was their advice demanded, notwithstanding, that by act of Parliament, and by his Majesty's commission under the great seal, both Houses were "To advise, order, and dispose of all things concerning the government and defence of that kingdom." They said, that to accomplish more easily this dishonourable cessation, those of the state in Dublin, who were so honest and religious as to dissuade it, were first discountenanced, and at last put out of their places, and restrained to prison, as Sir William Parsons, one of the Lords-Justices, Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls, Sir Adam Loftus, Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, and Sir Robert Meredith, one also of the council table. That it was made only with a view to discourage those who had subscribed to advance money upon the Parliament's proposals, in order to render impossible the maintenance of the army in Ireland, and to employ it in England, to the destruction of the Parliament. For these and many other reasons, both Houses declared the intended cessation void, promising to indemnify those who should refuse to submit to it.*

Meanwhile, the King, who was assured of the concurrence of the Lords-Justices, the council of state, and the Marquis of Ormond, general of the army, so ordered it, that after the conclusion of the truce all the English troops that could be spared were sent to him. These forces landed at Mostyn in Flintshire, and their first attempt was upon Hawarden castle, which was surrendered to them the 4th of December. Then they took some other small places in Cheshire; after which the Lord Byron, who commanded for the King in these parts, besieged Nantwich, January the 15th, 1643-4. Three days after, making a sudden and violent storm upon five several places of the town at once, he was every where repulsed with the loss of many of his men. At last, the 21st of the same month, the Lord Fairfax, who advanced to relieve the town, entirely routed the Irish army, consisting of three thousand foot, (who were almost all slain or taken prisoners,) and of eighteen hundred horse, most of whom escaped by flight, but were so dispersed that they could be of no farther service to the King. Colonel George Monk was taken in this action, and sent prisoner to the Tower of London, where he remained some time, till at last he took arms under the Parliament. Thus the King received no advantage by these troops; they rather did him great prejudice, as, by all his proceedings to procure them, he confirmed the mistrust entertained by many people, of his being concerned in the Irish rebellion.

Not to interrupt the thread of the military actions, and of what passed in Scotland and Ireland, we have been forced to pass over several important events of the year 1643, of which it will be necessary to speak, though without any connection, as they are of a different nature.

The King was ever strongly possessed with the notion, that fear alone held most of the people attached to the Parliament, and that if he procured them a good opportunity to hold up their heads, he should oblige both Houses to make a speedy peace, without demanding the securities, which made the principal obstacle. This was the favourite scheme, as well as of his ministers, his council, his friends and adherents in London and elsewhere; and this was the spring of several projects to force the Parliament to a peace. It is certain, the King had many friends in London, and in the Parliament itself, who served him artfully, by pretending to dread that the war would be destructive to the Parliament; and thereby they endeavoured to infuse a real terror into the people, and incline them by degrees to wish and sue for peace. These men incessantly plotted to sow discord between the Parliament and the people. As it was necessary for them to hold private correspondence with the court, in order to act according to directions, his Majesty sent frequent messengers to London, sometimes secretly, sometimes openly, under colour of bringing messages to the Parliament, in order to convey his instructions to his friends, and be exactly informed of what passed in both Houses and the city. With this view, in December 1642, he published for the sake, as was pretended, of the inhabitants of London, a proclamation for the free and safe passage of all goods, wares and merchandizes to the city. But the Commons suspecting some hidden mystery under this condescension, passed the next month two orders, the one, that no carriers or waggoners should be permitted to go to Oxford or elsewhere, without special license from the Parliament: the other, that any agent or servant to any person that was in arms against the Parliament, who should presume to come to Westminster, or reside about London, should be forthwith apprehended as a spy. The 10th of April following, these orders were renewed, and even extended to all persons that should come from the King's quarters to London without a safe conduct, and the same was printed and published.

In all appearance, the King, who had so many correspondents in London, was not ignorant of this order. Nevertheless, on pretence it was not signified to him in form, he sent a message to the Parliament, with an offer of peace in general terms, without demanding a safe conduct for the bearer. But the Commons, resolving to stop the course of these artifices, which served to carry on the King's private correspondence in London, ordered the messenger to be sent to prison, for coming without a safe conduct. Three days after, to show the people, the King vainly amused them with hopes of a peace, they impeached the Queen of high-treason, and sent up the impeachment to the Lords by Mr. Pym. The King, full of indignation at this extraordinary proceeding, published a proclamation, to forbid obedience to the orders of the two Houses, declaring, he acknowledged them no longer for Houses of Parliament.

Affairs were in this situation, when the two Houses discovered a conspiracy formed in London, under colour of procuring peace refused by the Parliament. The particulars of this conspiracy, as they were communicated to the Lords by Mr. Pym, were as follows:—

"I. That the conspiracy was formed of a mixture and conjunction of persons of several qualities, some whereof were of both Houses of Parliament, others of the city, and others belonging to the court, who in their respective places and employments were to form and perfect the work, raised out of the ashes of the late petition of London for peace.

"II. The chief actors were Mr. Waller,† a member of the House of Commons, who pretended, and gave out to the rest, that many others of that House, and of the Lords, were privy to and concerned therein; Mr. Tompkins, a gentleman living in Holborn, brother-in-law to the said Mr. Waller, and a servant to the Queen, as being secretary to the commissioners for her Majesty's revenue; Mr. Challoner, an eminent citizen; one Mr. Blinkard, Mr. Alexander Hampden, who brought the last message from the King; Mr. Hassel; one of his Majesty's messengers, &c.

"III. The method was, for several persons in the city to dispose of themselves into a committee, to hold intelligence with both armies, the court, and the Parliament, to take a general survey of the affections of all the inhabitants within the weekly bills of mortality, which was to be done under these three ranks, Right Men, (or of the King's party) Averse Men, (or the well-affected to the Parliament) and Moderate Men, (or neutrals;) to consider of arms, ammunition, and all provisions of war, to appoint out of themselves select persons to treat with Mr. Waller, and Mr. Tompkins, in relation to the city, court, and Parliament; as also with Sir Nicholas Crisp, Sir George Binion, Captain Roydon, and others at Oxford.

* Whitelock says, twenty thousand English and Scots in the north of Ireland, vowed to live and die together in opposition to the cessation.

† Edmund Waller, the celebrated poet.

" IV. Mr. Waller's part, was to engage a considerable part of the Lords and Commons, and to be a means of conveying counsels, resolutions, and intelligence between them and the said city-committee. Mr. Tompkins was not only an assistant to Mr. Waller therein, but an instrument to convey by Hassel and others their proceedings to the court, principally to Lord Falkland, and to receive thence directions, powers, and commands.

" V. For preventing discovery, protestations of secrecy were taken, as they were Christians, not to disclose it, and no man in the city was to endeavour the engaging above two, whereby no one could impeach many.

" VI. From the court, Mr. Heron and Mr. Alexander Hampden, and others employed upon messages from the King to the Parliament, were to convey directions, encouragements, and advice to those in London, and authority was to be given under the Great-Seal, and warrants under the King's hand, for settling a council of war, naming of Generals and other officers, execution of martial law, raising of money, and providing arms; and to facilitate the whole, part of the King's forces to be in readiness to assist the party here, as there should be occasion.

" VII. The particulars of the design itself were, to seize the King's children, to secure several members of Parliament, particularly the Lord Say, the Lord Wharton, Mr. Pym, Sir William Stapleton, Colonel Hampden, and Colonel Strode, as also the Lord-Mayor and committee of the militia, under pretence of bringing them to a legal trial; to seize upon the out-works, forts, magazines, gates, and other places of importance in the city and the Tower, and let in the King's forces, and in the mean time to resist and obstruct all payments, imposed by authority of the two Houses for support of their armies.

" VIII. For their authority they had the following commission brought up by the Lady Aubigney, (who was under custody) the said commission being found hidden under ground in Mr. Tompkins's cellar.

" IX. In pursuance of this commission, they had often consulted of a General, and treated with Sir Hugh Pollard, prisoner in the Compter (once a member of the House of Commons, but expelled, being accused of having a hand in the design to bring up the northern army against the Parliament,) about it. And a declaration was ready drawn, setting forth the cause of their taking up of arms to be in pursuance of their late protestation, to maintain the true Reformed Protestant religion against all Papists and sectaries, to oppose illegal assessments, &c. which was to be distributed to their friends, and on the night of their rising set upon the posts round about London. Concerning which time of their rising they had also consulted, (of which precise notice was to be sent to Oxford, as to the day and hour) and some moved to have it done on Wednesday the last of May (being the fast day, and the very next day after the first intimation was given towards a discovery) but it had been put of, and not fully concluded, it being said, " it should be left to the Lords to determine," whom Waller pretended should side with them. Mr. Hassel lay close at Beaconsfield, and had word sent, the great ship was come into the Downs, by which he was to understand, that the design was near ripe; and he acquainted the Lord Falkland at Oxford therewith, and received answer, that they should hasten it with all speed, and when they were ready, three thousand of the King's forces were to advance from Oxford within fifteen miles of London, to be ready upon notice to fall into the work, and assist; and white ribbons or tape was agreed to be worn by all concerned in this action to distinguish them."

Lord Clarendon, who is very large upon this conspiracy, denies neither the plot itself, nor the King's commission, brought to London by the Lady Aubigney,* but urges, that the Parliament confounded in one single plot, two different projects, the first formed by Waller, Tompkins, and Challoner, who were at London, and the other by Sir Nicholas Crisp, who had been imprisoned, and making his escape, had retired to Oxford.

This discovery caused the two House to resolve to unite themselves more strictly together, by a new covenant or oath, tendered to all the members, and afterwards to the army, and such of the people as were willing to take it. Tompkins and Challoner, were hanged on gibbets erected before their own doors. But Waller saved his life, paying a fine of ten thousand pounds, and was banished the kingdom.† Hampden died in prison before his sentence, and Hassel died likewise the night before his trial. The ill success of this plot, prevented not another from being contrived the next August.

After the miscarriage of Waller's conspiracy, the King had a train of successes, which revived the courage of his friends at London, who began to be dismayed. The Lord Fairfax was defeated at Atherton in Yorkshire. The Queen had come to his Majesty with a considerable supply. Waller was entirely routed at Roundway-Down; and the King, now master of Bristol, was preparing to besiege Gloucester. Thus crowned with success, he thought it a favourable opportunity to force the Parliament to a peace; all his London friends began to use their endeavours; and he endeavoured to prepare the minds of the people by a public declaration, to this effect:

" As the grievances and losses of no particular persons could be compared to the damage he himself sustained; so a peace could not be so welcome to any man as to him. God Almighty knew, with what unwillingness, and anguish of soul, he submitted to the necessity of taking up defensive arms. And the world knew, with what justice and bounty he had repaired his subjects for all the pressures they had borne, by such excellent laws, as would for ever have prevented the like; and with what earnestness he desired to add any thing for the establishment of the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom; all which had been evidently invaded by those who had sacrificed the public good to their own ends. He well remembered the Protestation made by him, at the head of his army, " to defend and maintain the true Reformed Protestant religion, and if it should please God to bless his arms with success, he would maintain the just privileges and freedom of Parliament, and govern by the known laws of the land, for whose defence that army was only raised." And there could not be a more seasonable time to renew that Protestation than now, when God had vouchsafed him so many victories, which would hinder him from falling under the scandalous imputation, that his messages of peace proceeded from the weakness of his power, not love of his people. He declared therefore to all the world, in the presence of God, that he was so far from intending any alteration of the religion established, in which he was born and bred, and would resolutely die, or from the least thought of invading the liberty and

* This lady, with the consent of the two Houses, went to Oxford, to transact her own affairs with the King, upon the death of her husband, who was killed at Edge-hill, and having settled her business, and being ready to return, she was desired by the King to carry a small box (in which was put the commission) to London, and deliver it to one who should come for it with a certain token, which she did accordingly, not knowing what she carried. Ludlow says, she brought the commission made up in the hair of her head.

† Waller, as soon as imprisoned, sensible of the great danger into which he had fallen, was so seized with the dread of death, that all his former spirit deserted him; and he confessed whatever he knew, without sparing his most intimate friends, without regard to the confidence reposed in him, without distinguishing between the negligence of familiar conversation, and the schemes of a regular conspiracy. With the most profound dissimulation, he counterfeited such remorse of conscience, that his execution was put off, out of mere Christian compassion, till he might recover the use of his understanding. He invited visits from the ruling clergy of all sects; and while he expressed his own penitence, he received their devout exhortations with humility and reverence, as conveying clearer conviction and information than in his life he had ever before attained. Presents too, of which, as well as of flattery, these holy men were not insensible, were distributed among them; as a small retribution for their prayers and ghostly counsel. And by all these artifices, more than from any regard to the beauty of his genius, of which, during that time of furious cant and faction, small account would be made, he prevailed so far as to have his life spared, and a fine of ten thousand pounds accepted in lieu of it.

property of the subject, or violating the just privileges of Parliament; that the preservation of the established religion, the laws, the liberties of the people, and the just privileges of the Parliament, should be equally his care, as the maintenance of his own rights. Whether those that were enemies to the established ecclesiastical government, who prosecuted the learned, orthodox ministers, and put into their places, ignorant, seditious, and schismatical preachers, who villified the book of Common-Prayer, and profaned God's worship, were likely to advance religion: whether those who, without the least shadow of law, imposed exorbitant taxes upon their fellow subjects, imprisoned, tormented, and murdered them, were likely to preserve the liberty and property of the subject: those who had invaded the just rights of the crown, denied the King his negative voice, awed and terrified the members of both Houses, were likely to vindicate the privileges of Parliament, all the world might judge." In short, after several invectives against the two Houses, he concluded with saying: "Whosoever have been misled, by those whose hearts from the beginning have designed all this mischief, and shall redeem their past crimes, by their present service and loyalty, in the apprehending and opposing such who shall continue to bear arms against us, and shall use their utmost endeavours to reduce those men to their due obedience, and to restore the kingdom to its wonted peace, shall have cause to magnify our mercy, and to repent the trespasses committed against so just and gracious a Sovereign."*

This declaration was no sooner published than the King's friends in London affected an extraordinary terror, caused by the prosperous success of the King's arms, and insinuated, that the consequences should be prevented by a peace. But as the example of Tompkins and Challoner had effectually terrified the King's most devoted friends, not one dared openly to expose himself to the same danger. It was therefore resolved among them, that the House of Lords should first break the ice, and propose a peace to the Commons, which should be seconded by the King's friends in London. The Upper House consisted but of few Peers, some of whom were either openly or privately for the King. Others were his enemies, and some were ready to follow the stream which way soever it carried them. These last were the men the King's party strove to gain by various means, in order to be superior in the House of Lords, some by promises, and others by threats, and some by way of persuasion, intimating to them the absolute necessity of a peace. In short, they secured a majority of voices in the Upper House, that a peace should be proposed. The managers of this contrivance took care, not to propose a peace without terms such as the King desired. That alone had been sufficient to make them lose some of those they had gained. They had only to engage the Commons to enter into negotiation, after which, they hoped the superiority the King then had, supported with the endeavours of his party, would be capable to remove, in his favour, the difficulties that might occur in the principal articles. This resolution being taken, the Lords sent and desired a conference with the Commons, where they declared, that they had resolved to send propositions of peace to the King, and hoped the Commons would concur with them. The propositions were:

"I. That both armies might be presently disbanded, and his Majesty be entreated to return to his Parliament, upon such security as should give him satisfaction.

"II. That religion might be settled with the advice of a synod of divines, in such manner as his Majesty, with the consent of both Houses of Parliament, should appoint.

"III. That the militia, both by sea and land, might be settled by a bill; and the militia, forts and ships of the kingdom, put into such hands as the King should appoint, with the approbation of both Houses of Parliament: and his Majesty's revenue to be absolutely and wholly restored unto him; only deducting such part, as had been of necessity expended for the maintenance of his children, and not otherwise.

"IV. That all the members of both Houses, who had been expelled only for absenting themselves, or mere compliance with his Majesty, and no other matter of fact against them, might be restored to their places.

"V. That all the delinquents, from before the tenth day of January 1641, should be delivered up to the justice of Parliament, and a general pardon for all others on both sides.

"VI. And lastly, that there might be an act of oblivion for all by-gone deeds, and acts of hostility."

The Commons perfectly saw what was the aim of the authors of these propositions, and were terrified at it. The House was apprehensive, that they were but too powerfully supported, otherwise, it was not likely they should have taken such a step, at a time when a committee was already gone to desire assistance of the Scots. Wherefore, after a long debate, it was resolved, by a majority of votes, that the propositions should be sent to the King. It is extremely probable, this resolution was taken only to amuse the King's friends, and to gain time, in order to break their measures the more easily. For, the next day the Lord-Mayor of London, attended with a crowd of people, came to the House of Commons, of which he was a member, and delivered, from the Common-Council, a petition, wherein the House was intreated to persist in their former resolutions, and reject the propositions of the Peers. The Lord-Mayor affirmed also, that the people of London were ready to exert their utmost for the vigorous prosecution of the war. Whereupon, the House took courage again, and reversed the resolution of the foregoing day. Thus, the King's friends were in their turn greatly embarrassed, and under a necessity of taking new measures. The expedient they devised was to cause the women to rise, in hopes that such an insurrection might breed a greater, and occasion some revolution.

August the 9th, a petition for peace was presented to the Commons by two or three thousand women, with white silk ribbons in their hats. The conditions proposed by them were exactly the same as the King had always offered. A general answer being sent to them they were not satisfied, and their number by noon increasing to five thousand, they came to the door of the House, crying, "Peace, Peace; give us those traitors that are against Peace, that we may tear them to pieces; give us that dog Pym." Part of the trained-bands (that usually stood centinels there) firing upon them with powder only, to frighten them away, they laughed at it, and finding a heap of brickbats in the yard, threw them at the centinels, and drove them away. At last, some troops were forced to be sent for, who, after using fair means in vain, drew their swords, and cut them over their hands and faces. A ballad-singer was killed upon the spot,† and another woman lost her nose, whereof it was said she afterwards died. At length, they were dispersed. Thus ended the grand project of forcing the Parliament to a peace, a project wherein means were found to engage several Lords, and many Commoners, under colour that peace was necessary to the state.

The Earl of Essex was one of those who were most desirous of peace, but not in the same manner as the King's friends. He did not think it impracticable, in concluding a peace, to find necessary securities for the nation's liberties: as appears in his letter of the 9th of July to the Speaker, wherein, after the description of Chalgrave-Field, he says, "If it were thought fit to send to his Majesty to have peace, with the settling of religion, the laws and liberties of the subject, and to bring unto just trial those chief delinquents that have brought all this mischief to both kingdoms; and (as my Lord of Bristol spake once in Parliament) how we may be secured to have these things performed hereafter; or else, if his Majesty shall please to absent himself, there may be a day set down to give a period to all these unhappy distractions by a battle, which, when, and where, they shall chuse, that may be thought any way indifferent, I shall be ready to perform that duty I owe you; and the propositions to be agreed upon between his Majesty and the Parliament, may be sent to such an indifferent place, that both armies may be drawn near the one to the other; that if peace be not concluded, it may be ended by the sword."

* Adding, "We desire all our good subjects, who have really wished us well, now God has done such wonderful things for us, vigorously to endeavour to put an end to all these miseries, by bringing in men, money, plate, horses, or arms, to our aid, that so we being not wanting to ourselves, may with confidence expect the continuance of God's favour, to restore us all to that blessed harmony of affection, which may establish a firm peace."

† Rushworth says, she was shot by the centinels, who, upon the brickbats flying about their ears, were forced to fire ball.

The Earl of Essex's integrity made him experience what usually happens to honest men in civil dissentions, where the moderate pass for indifferent, and coldly affected to their party. The King, who was informed of this Lord's moderation, imagined, he desired a peace only, because he was displeased with the Parliament, and convinced of the injustice of the cause he had espoused. In this belief, he unsuccessfully used all means to gain him. On the other hand, the most violent of his party grew jealous of the Earl of Essex, perceiving he was no proper instrument for their designs. Wherefore they no longer confided in him, or at least feigned to trust him, in order to have by his removal, another General, more compliant and manageable. They cast their eyes on the Earl of Manchester, known formerly as the Lord Kimbolton, and began with advancing him to the command of the forces of the eastern associated counties, to which Lincolnshire was lately added, to go and oppose the Earl of Newcastle; and an ordinance was passed, to raise new levies, by pressing, to reinforce this army.

If the Earl of Essex had joined with the Parliament only out of passion, humour, or interest, the mortifications he met with, would have been apt to make him turn to the King, to be revenged of the two Houses. But that was not his character. Though he had complained several times of the disregard shown him, in leaving his army without recruits or clothes, and though several Lords of the King's party took this occasion to persuade him to change sides, he ever remained firm to his principles. How strong soever their solicitations might be, he never gave the least reason to believe, he was capable of betraying the Parliament, who had trusted him with the command of their forces. Both Houses being informed of the offers made to their General, assured him of their esteem and acknowledgment for his great services, and promised to recruit and cloath his army, before those of Sir William Waller, and the Earl of Manchester, which was accordingly done. This satisfaction was more than sufficient to make him forget all the occasions of complaint before given him.

The project of those who had undertaken to gain the Earl of Essex, was, that as soon as he should give the word, the Lords and Commoners who were in the secret, should retire to the army, and under the security thereof, protest against the violence that was offered, the breach of their privileges, by the Common-Council's taking notice of their debates, and over-ruling their conclusions, by hindering the sending of the propositions to the King. The Lords and Commoners who were concerned in this stratagem, as well as in Waller's plot, fearing the Earl of Essex might discover them, thought proper to avoid being called to an account, by retiring to the King. Of this number were the Earl of Portland, and the Lord Conway, who had been imprisoned for Waller's affair, and afterwards released, the Lord Lovelace, who had only staid with the Parliament by the King's leave, the Earls of Clare, Bedford and Holland. The Earl of Northumberland, dissatisfied with his not having in the Parliament the same credit as formerly, feigning an indisposition, obtained the Parliament's leave to retire for his health to his house at Petworth in Sussex. The flight of all these Peers turned greatly to the King's disadvantage, as it deprived him of so many friends in the Parliament, who were always ready to serve him, and wont to direct his adherents in London. Moreover, by the absence of these Lords, the King's enemies were more at their ease, and found fewer obstacles to their designs, than before. For shortly after, the Earl of Essex's army was enabled to relieve Gloucester, and the Parliament approved of the covenant made with Scotland, in which doubtless they would have been opposed by those that were lately withdrawn.

Sir John Hotham, Governor of Hull, was apprehended, as we have observed, by order of Parliament. The King had been so incensed with him, that there was little probability of his ever pardoning the indignity he had received from him, or of Hotham's delivering himself into his hands. Yet, the desire of becoming master of Hull in the one, and the thirst of revenge in the other, made them forget all that was past. Hotham, as he could not bear that, after the service he had done the Parliament in keeping Hull for them, without dreading to expose himself to the King's indignation, the Lord Fairfax should be made commander-in-chief of all the forces in the north, an honour, which doubtless he thought himself more worthy of, resolved to be revenged for this pretended injustice, by delivering the place to the King. The precise time of his applying to the Earl of Newcastle is not known; but it is certain, he wrote several letters to him, which were communicated to the Queen while she was in the north. He had drawn his son, Captain Hotham, into the plot, and it was agreed between them, to deliver Hull to the Queen, when on her march with her troops to the King. Meanwhile, young Hotham having given some occasion to suspect him, was seized by Sir John Meldrum, and sent prisoner to Nottingham castle. Hotham found means to escape, and going to Lincoln, wrote from thence to the Parliament, complaining of the injury done him and affirming, he was ready to answer whatever should be laid to his charge. But as the Queen was now upon her march, and it was time to execute the design, he returned to Hull, to contrive the means with his father. The Queen thought herself so secure of having Hull very soon in her power, that she said in her letter of the 27th of June to the King, "She staid at Newark but for one thing, to have Hull and Lincoln, for which she hoped he would pardon two days' stop." At the same time that the order was sent to seize young Hotham, the mayor of Hull was told to have an eye upon the father, examine his conduct, and take care to preserve the town. The son's return to Hull after his escape from Nottingham, the suspicions he already lay under, and the notice he received from Mr. Moyer, captain of a man of war then in the road, that Hull was going, that night or the next, to be delivered to the King, made Sir Matthew Boynton, the Mayor, though brother-in-law to the Governor, resolve to prevent it. That very night, whilst the Hothams were in bed, all the townsmen, officers, and soldiers of known affection to the Parliament, were assembled without noise, and all the ports of the town seized, without one drop of blood, or so much as a musquet discharged. Meanwhile, they had neglected to secure the two Hothams,* who found means to get out of the town: but at their coming to Beverley, they were both seized and brought to London, where, after a long imprisonment, they were condemned and executed.†

As the King, by his papers and emissaries in London, was continually endeavouring to convince the public of the greatness and sincerity of his zeal for religion, for the laws and liberties of the people, without ever mentioning what passed the fifteen first years of his reign, the two Houses were concerned to renew the remembrance of those times, lest the occasion of their fears and jealousies should in the end be forgotten. And

* The son was secured, but the father, upon the first notice of what was doing, got out at Beverley Gate, there having been no orders to stop him.

† The son was beheaded on Tower-hill, January 1, and the father January 2, 1644, both denying they ever intended to deliver up Hull.

therefore

therefore they did two things very proper to produce this effect. The first was, to order King James's book for tolerating sports on Sundays, which Charles I. had caused to be published again in the churches, to be burnt by the common hangman. This book being almost forgotten, could not produce any great effects at the time we are speaking of. But in all appearance, both Houses meant thereby to insinuate to the people, what was to be expected from the King's great zeal for religion, in case he came to be restored to his former power. The second was, to proceed to judgment against Judge Berkley, whom the Lords condemed in the exorbitant fine of twenty thousand pounds, and to stand committed to the Tower till he should be tried upon the other articles alledged against him. For this sentence concerned only that part of his charge relating to his extrajudicial opinions in the case of ship money. Berkley was one of the King's most zealous instruments to establish an arbitrary power. Nevertheless, he had now lain three years in prison, without being thought of. But this year the Parliament believed it proper to bring him to judgment, as well to revive the memory of a time, the King was endeavouring to bury in oblivion, as to reap the benefit of his fine.* The same month they passed an ordinance for seizing the King's, Queen's, and Prince's revenues, for the public use,† that is, to be employed in the war against the King. Four days after, the King on his part published a proclamation, forbidding all tenants or debtors to pay any rents or debts to such persons as were in open rebellion against him. But these orders, as well from the King as the Parliament, were executed only in places where they were supported with power.

Most of the Lords, who had withdrawn from the Parliament, and retired to the King, meeting with a very cold reception at Oxford, thought fit once more to change sides, and return to London. The Earl of Holland led the way. He was at first put under confinement, but some days after, had leave to live upon his own estate, without any employ. Probably, he had expected a better reception, since after his return he published a declaration very injurious to the King, wherein he said, that, retiring to Oxford, in hopes by his credit to procure a peace, he had been labouring it to the utmost of his power, but (added he) without success, the King and his council being entirely averse to all accommodation, because every thing at court was managed by the papists. The Earl of Northumberland, who had retired to Petworth, being informed how ill the Earl of Holland was received at Oxford, thought it proper to return to the Parliament, where he was received with respect, both Houses being willing to suppose, he had never intended to leave them, though many suspected he had withdrawn to his own estate, on purpose to see what reception the other Lords would meet with at Oxford. The Earls of Bedford, and Clare took also the same course, and came off with being debarred for a time from sitting in Parliament.

One of the principal transactions of this year 1643, was the resolution of both Houses to make a new Great-Seal. It had been proposed by the Commons in July; but, whether through scruple, as some pretended, or because the King's secret party were very numerous in the House of Peers, the Lords refused their consent, or rather delayed their answer. But in the November following, their scruples vanished. The Commons represented to them in a conference, the mischiefs occasioned by the conveying away, and through the want, of the Great-Seal. The next day the Lords declared their consent to the making a new Great-Seal. Accordingly a Great-Seal was made exactly like that in the King's hands, and by an ordinance of both Houses, it was declared, that all letters patent, and grants which had passed under the Great Seal since the 22d of May 1642, were void and of no effect. That the new Great Seal should be of like force, power, and validity as any Great Seal of England had ever been, and be put into the custody of the persons hereby ordained commissioners for that purpose, who should have the same power and authority as any Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper had used to have. On the last of November, the new Great Seal was carried by the Speaker of the Commons, attended with the whole House, to the Lords, and delivered to the Lord Grey of Werk, their Speaker, who in the presence of both Houses gave it to the commissioners. The first thing sealed with it, was a patent to the Earl of Warwick, of Lord High-Admiral of England, the Earl of Northumberland not being in that favour with both Houses as formerly.

The King and his friends made a great noise upon this encroachment of the Parliament, and urged the statute of the 25th of Edward III. by which the counterfeiting the Great Seal, is in express terms declared to be high-treason.

About this time, Count Harcourt, a Prince of the House of Lorraine, was sent from France into England. He came directly to London, where he was received with great ceremony, as ambassador extraordinary, though he had not presented his credentials to the Parliament. But it was supposed, he was not without them, and intended to address himself first to the King. After some days stay in London, without any application to the two Houses, he went to Oxford, where he had several conferences with the King. After that, he wrote to the Earl of Northumberland, that having proposed to his Majesty, from the King of France, and the Queen-Regent, the making of a peace with his subjects, he found him wholly inclined to enter into negotiation, and that if the two Houses would inform him, wherein consisted the differences between the King and them, he would gladly use his interest to adjust them. The two Houses told him, by the Earl of Northumberland, that they received with all due respect, the officers of the King and Queen-Regent of France, and that as soon as he should show, he was authorized for such a mediation, they would not fail to appoint a committee to treat with him. But he had no credentials for the two Houses, the Queen-Regent not judging proper to own them for Parliament, since the King of England refused them that title. So, this proferred mediation was fruitless.

Mr. Pym, one of the pillars of the Parliament, and a chief director of the affairs of the House, died December the 8th, 1643. The King's adherents speak of him as of a very wicked man, and those on the side of the Parliament represent him as the greatest patriot then in England. Thus much is certain, Mr. Pym's death was a very great loss to the Parliament, he being one of the most able members of the House.‡

The Commons, as was said, imprisoned in May this year, 1643, a person sent by the King with the offer of peace, and shortly after, he was discovered to be one of those employed by the King, to keep a correspondence in London. Upon the House arresting this messenger, his Majesty, by advice of his council, had deemed it inconsistent with his honour to hold any farther correspondence with the Parliament. Moreover, the 18th of October, both Houses had published an ordinance, declaring, any person coming to London from the King's quarters, should be looked upon as a spy. And yet, twelve days after, on the 30th of October, the King sent privately to London Daniel Kniveton, a state messenger, with three proclamations, one against taking the solemn League and Covenant; another, against the Observation of the Monthly Fast, enjoined by the Parliament; a third, for removing the Seals of the Green-wax offices belonging to the Exchequer, King's-Bench, and Common-Pleas, to Oxford. This man was taken up, and committed to prison. Nevertheless, the 19th

* The half of his fine was abated, and upon payment of the other half he had his liberty.

† Or rather, as they word it, "for the good of his Majesty, and the commonwealth."

‡ Lord Clarendon will have it, that he died of the Morbus Pediculosus, or Lousy Distemper. And the same is affirmed in Mercurius Rusticus. Whereas, Rushworth says, there was such a report, but the same was not true; and for public satisfaction, his body was viewed by many hundreds of people; the true natural cause of his death seeming to be the great pains he took, joined with a competent old age, and at best, but an infirm constitution.

of November following, Carpenter, another messenger, was privately sent by the King with an order to the Judges to adjourn the term to Oxford. Carpenter was also apprehended, and they were both tried and condemned to die. Kniveton was executed. Carpenter, though under the same condemnation, was reprieved and committed to Bridewell.

In proportion as the war was continued, the animosity between the King and the Parliament was inflamed. The King refused to own the two Houses for Parliament, and they omitted nothing, to blacken the King's reputation. These proceedings were not confined to England, but care was taken also to convey papers abroad, tending to vindicate one of the parties, and blacken the other. Both Houses being informed, or it may be supposing, that the King had emissaries abroad, who were using their utmost endeavours to represent the civil wars in England as a horrible rebellion against the Sovereign, ordered the assembly of Divines then sitting at Westminster, to write letters to the churches of Zealand, Holland, France, Switzerland, to warn them against the artifices of the King's agents, by giving them a clear relation of the affairs of England. They charged them to insist chiefly upon the King's employing Irish rebels and other papists, to be governors, commanders, and soldiers; to lay before them the proofs of the intention of the King's counsellors to introduce popery, and hinder the reformation designed by the Parliament: Lastly, to inform them of the disadvantageous opinion of the King's party concerning the Protestant churches abroad, because not governed by Bishops. The assembly failed not to send to these churches a circular letter, which was properly a manifesto for the Parliament against the King, with copies of the solemn league and covenant, and of the declaration of England and Scotland on that subject.

Some time after, the King on his part published a manifesto, addressed to all the Protestant churches, to efface the impressions which the Parliament's circular letter might have caused. This manifesto, which was very short, contained only a Protestation that he had never intended to consent to the public exercise of the Catholic religion in his dominions, but was firmly resolved to adhere, to his last breath, to the church of England, wherein he was born, baptized, and educated; and to the liturgy of that church, approved by so many convocations and Parliaments, by all the Protestant churches, and by the synod of Dort.

Meanwhile, money was necessarily to be raised, not only to maintain the forces already on foot, but also to levy others, in order to resist the Scots, who were upon the point of entering England. If, for the maintenance of these forces, he had imposed taxes by his sole authority, he could not have reproached both Houses for the same thing, and perhaps would have disobliged his own party by acting against the laws. Money, however, was to be found at any rate, otherwise he would not be able to continue the war. Hitherto he had used several ways to raise money, without giving any advantage against him, whether by selling or mortgaging the crown-lands, or by the voluntary contributions of his well-wishers. But the means he had already used were too feeble an expedient to free himself from this streight. He assembled at Oxford all the members that, according to him, had been driven from the Parliament; pretending, these members were the true Parliament, and the more, as he had publicly declared, he no longer looked upon both Houses at Westminster as such. He did not expect this new Parliament would increase the number of his friends; but he could reasonably hope it would grant him an aid of money, and that being authorised by such an act, he might openly and by way of authority, levy what money was necessary. This happened accordingly, and was properly the King's aim in calling this Parliament, which met at Oxford the 22d of January, 1643-4.*

A. D. 1643-4.] As it was not proper the King should immediately discover his sole end in calling this extraordinary Parliament, he only told them in his first speech, that he had assembled them to receive their advice, and consult with them how to appease the troubles of the kingdom.

The first step taken by this Parliament, was to try to convince the public of their intention to labour for peace. "The King was at first in some apprehension, "says Lord Clarendon," that such a conflux of persons together of the Parliament, who would look to enjoy the privileges of it in their debates, might, instead of doing him service, do many things contrary to it, and exceedingly apprehended, that they would immediately enter upon some treaty of peace, which would have no effect; yet whilst it was in suspense, would hinder his preparation for war, and though no body more desired peace, yet he had no mind that a multitude should be consulted upon the conditions of it: imagining, that things of the greatest importance, as the giving up persons, and other particulars of honour, would not seem to them of moment enough to continue a war in the kingdom."

But his council quickly freed him from these apprehensions. It was intimated to him, that there was no probability, the two Houses at Westminster would ever treat with the members that should meet at Oxford, because they would not look upon them but as private persons, and deserters of the Parliament. Whereupon the King's scruples vanished. As the Oxford Parliament was entirely directed by the King, and as his Majesty agreed to the proposing a peace to those at Westminster, it may easily be guessed, that in so doing, his intention was not to conclude it, unless both Houses at Westminster would have submitted to his terms. But the two Houses of Oxford had another view in this proceeding. Namely, to lay a snare for the Parliament at Westminster, and engage them, if possible, to treat with them, which would have been owning them for Parliament. However, they expected to reap some advantage from their refusal.

To this end, a letter was sent to the Earl of Essex, signed by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, forty-three Lords, and a hundred and eighteen members of the House of Commons. In this letter it was said, "That his Majesty having summoned them to attend him at Oxford, they were assembled in obedience to his commands: that his Majesty was pleased to invite them in the proclamation of summons, by graciously saying, "His subjects should see how willing he was, as far as in him lay, to restore the peace of the kingdom:" that this invitation had not only been made good to them, but seconded by such unquestionable demonstrations of his Majesty's deep sense of the miseries and calamities of his poor subjects in this unnatural war, and of his most entire and passionate affections to redeem them from that sad and deplorable condition, by all ways possible consistent with his honour, or the future safety of the kingdom: "That as it were impiety to question the sincerity of them, so it were great want of duty and faithfulness in us, (his Majesty having vouchsafed to declare that he did call us, to be witnesses of his actions and privy to his intentions,) should we not satisfy and witness to all the world the assurance we have of the piety and sincerity of both." Adding—That being satisfied of this truth, they had yet hopes to be the happy instruments of their country's redemption from the miseries of war, and restitution to the blessings of peace; and were desirous to believe, that his Lordship, howsoever engaged, would co-operate with them in the blessed work, by truly representing to, and industriously

* The same day the Parliament at Westminster called the Houses, and there appeared two hundred and eighty of their members, besides a hundred more in the service of the Parliament, in the several counties; and now they expelled by vote forty members, who had deserted the Parliament. In the House of Peers, remained only the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Essex, Kent, Lincoln, Rutland, Salisbury, Suffolk, Warwick, Manchester, Mulgrave, Denbigh, Stamford, Bollingbrooke. The Lords, Say, Dacres, Wharton, Grey of Werk, Willoughby of Parham, Howard of Escrick, Rochfort, and Roberts. ——The Lords at Oxford, in a letter (subscribed by fifty-two of them.) say, There were not above twenty-five Peers at Westminster; and the Earls of Arundel and Thanet; the Lords Stafford, Stanhope, Coventry, Goring, and Craven, were beyond the seas; and the Earls of Chesterfield, Westmoreland, and the Lord Montague of Boughton, under restraint at London. They add, the House of Peers consisted in all of above an hundred, besides minors, and recusant Lords.

promoting with those by whom he was trusted, their most earnest desire, that some persons be appointed on either part, to treat of such a peace as may yet redeem the country from the brink of destruction."

The Earl of Essex returned this short answer, "that the letter he had received, not being addressed to the two Houses of Parliament, nor any acknowledgment of them being therein, he could not communicate it to them: that the maintenance of the Parliament of England and the privileges thereof, was that for which himself and his whole party were resolved to spend their blood, as being the foundation whereon all the laws and liberties of the nation were built."

Though the Earl of Essex said he could not communicate the letter to the Parliament, it was known however that his answer had been concerted with a committee of both Houses, called the committee of state. Wherefore the King, knowing thereby the intention of both Houses, believed he should run no great hazard by sending them a message, in a letter to the Earl of Essex, directed to the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster. This message contained the usual offers to treat of a peace and appoint commissioners, if they would do the like on their part. The King added, he took this step by the advice of the Lords and Commons assembled at Oxford for a Parliament, or of rejecting it, and so furnishing him with a reason to upbraid them for refusing to labour for a peace. But they little regarded this artifice, and for answer declared, they would never own the members, who had deserted both Houses, for a Parliament; "And hereupon, added they, we think ourselves bound to let your Majesty know, that seeing the continuance of this Parliament is settled by a law, (which, as other laws of your kingdoms, your Majesty hath sworn to maintain, as we are sworn to our allegiance to your Majesty, these obligations being reciprocal) we must in duty, and accordingly are resolved, with our lives and fortunes to defend and preserve the just rights and full power of this Parliament; and do beseech your Majesty to be assured, that your Majesty's royal and hearty concurrence with us herein, will be the most effectual and ready means of procuring a firm and lasting peace in all your Majesty's dominions, and of begetting a perfect understanding between your Majesty and your people, without which your Majesty's most earnest professions, and our most real intentions concerning the same must necessarily be frustrated.

Upon this refusal, the Parliament at Oxford exulted, as if the bare proposal of a peace had been a clear and evident demonstration of their sincere desire to make a reasonable peace. They published upon this occasion a long declaration, so like those published by the King on the same occasion, that it was not difficult to perceive it flowed from the same fountain. They published also, some time after, another, pretending to show, that the members assembled at Oxford had been forced from the Parliament by the threats and outrages of the leading men. In this declaration were repeated all the outrages and artifices used by the chiefs of the party, to intimidate such as would not conform to their sentiments, and this, it was pretended, was the sole reason of their being obliged to retire.

Some time after, the two Houses at Westminster published also a manifesto, wherein they pretended to show, that under the specious colour of proposing peace, a snare was laid to engage them tacitly to own that they were not the true Parliament, but that that was the true Parliament which was assembled at Oxford. They drew their proofs from several letters written from Oxford to the Earl of Essex, from the expressions in the King's late message, but especially from an intercepted letter from the Lord Digby, where he said: "A point which his Majesty may not suffer them to gain, without subverting the grounds and maxims of all his late proceedings against them, and that which he now goes upon by the advice of all his nobility here, as you will perceive by this enclosed proclamation,* upon the effects whereof all the eyes of the kingdom are fixed. God send them to be as good actuated, as they are in speculation, for I am confident, that in reason it carries probability of the surest and readiest way to a re-establishment of his Majesty in his just rights and powers, of any course that hath been yet attempted."

The day before the two Houses at Oxford wrote to the Earl of Essex, to propose a peace, they voted, that the Scots, having entered the kingdom in a hostile manner, had thereby denounced war against England, and that all the English who should assist them, should be deemed as traitors and enemies to the state.

March the 12th, the same Houses at Oxford voted, "That the Lords and Commons now remaining at Westminster, are guilty of high treason, for raising of forces under the command of the Earl of Essex, for consenting, and being assisting to the present coming in of the Scots into England, and for counterfeiting the great seal." But as votes did no hurt to the Parliament at Westminster, so neither were they of much advantage to the King. He found more real benefit from them, with regard to the affair for which the Oxford Parliament was summoned; namely, the aid of money he expected for the support of the war.

This Parliament was however greatly embarrassed, how to give the King an effectual assistance. If, as the only and true Parliament, they had laid a general tax, the King would have run the hazard of meeting great opposition in levying the money, all the inhabitants of the counties on his side, not being satisfied that such a Parliament had a lawful authority. In that case, he would have been obliged to use force to compel those that should refuse to pay, which did not suit with his present circumstances. Another method was therefore taken, which was, to advise the King to borrow one hundred thousand pounds, of the richest men of his party. To that purpose, the Commons went into their respective counties, to take the number of those who were reckoned monied men, and make a list, wherein were set down the quality and ability of each. The Commons being returned to Oxford with their lists, the taxes were proportioned; after which, the King wrote circular letters to every particular person, to borrow of one, a hundred pounds, of another, two hundred, promising to repay the same as soon as he was able, and not forgetting to say in these letters, that this loan, was by advice of his Parliament. The Oxford Parliament hearing, that both Houses at Westminster had laid a duty upon wine, beer, ale, and other commodities, which they called an Excise, a word before unheard of in England,† made no scruple to enjoin the like in the counties where the King's authority was acknowledged.

From that time, nothing remarkable passed in this Parliament, which, sitting till the 16th of April, was prorogued to October, and never met again. It served only to procure the King money, for which it was solely designed, and to exhibit a spectacle never before seen in England; namely, two Parliaments at once, holding their sessions at the same time.

Three days before the opening of this Parliament, the Scottish army entered England, notwithstanding the season, which might have been expected would hinder their march.‡ The Marquis of Newcastle, who commanded in the north for the King, hearing that the bad weather prevented not this army's advancing, began to march also with his troops, and came to Newcastle the 2d of February.* The Scotch army approaching the town, the general ordered it to be summoned; but the summons had no effect. He stayed in those parts all the rest of February, waiting for his artillery, which was coming by sea. The 28th of the said month, he passed the Tyne at some distance from Newcastle, having left on the north side of the town, six regiments of foot, and some horse, to keep the garrison in awe. The Marquis being too weak to venture a battle, contented himself with harassing the Scots by frequent skirmishes, in order to retard their march; but at last he thought proper to retire to Durham, where the Scotch general followed him, though with great inconveniency, as he wanted forage for his horse.

When the Marquis of Newcastle marched out of York to oppose the Scots, he left the command of the city with a good body of troops, to Colonel John Bellasis. As soon as the Lord Fairfax was informed, that the Marquis had taken the northern route, he resolved to march towards York, and to that end, ordered his son Sir Thomas Fairfax to meet him at a certain place, with the party he commanded, that they might act in conjunction. But Bellasis having notice of this design, departed from York with most of the garrison to hinder their junction, and posted himself at Selby. A few days after, the Lord Fairfax, having taken a great circuit, to deceive the vigilance of the enemy, and joining his son, suddenly attacked Selby, with about four thousand men, where Bellasis lay with fifteen hundred horse, and eighteen hundred foot, forced the town, took the Colonel prisoner, with sixteen hundred of his men, and killed a great number.

The Marquis of Newcastle heard this sad news at Durham, the Scots being then within two miles of the place. He immediately feared, that the Lord Fairfax, after his victory, would attack York, or at least, march directly towards Durham, to put himself between the two armies. For this reason, he suddenly resolved to retire to York, as well to secure himself, as that city, which otherwise would have been in great danger.

A. D. 1644.] It soon appeared, that the Marquis had taken this resolution very seasonably, for, the 20th of April, that is, nine days after the Selby fight, the Lord Fairfax joined the Scots at Tadcaster, whence the two generals resolved to go and besiege York. But as that city was too large to be invested on all sides by the two armies, particularly towards the river, over which the Marquis had made a bridge of boats, they desired the Earl of Manchester, general of the forces of the eastern associated counties, to advance to this siege. Till the arrival of the Earl of Manchester, the two generals held the city blocked up to the southward of the river Ouse.

Whilst the Marquis of Newcastle was in the north observing the Scotch army, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir John Meldrum, with above five thousand men of the Parliament forces, besieged Newark, a considerable town in Nottinghamshire, where the King had placed a garrison. As soon as the King knew it, he sent orders to Prince Rupert, to endeavour to relieve the place. The Prince being then at Chester, put himself immediately upon the march, and being joined by other troops, made a body of seven thousand men, with which he advanced towards Newark. Meldrum, who commanded alone at the siege, resolved to fight the Prince, and to that purpose drew up his forces at a little distance from the town. The 21st of March there was a sharp conflict, particularly at a bridge, by which Meldrum had resolved to retreat in case of need. The bridge was vigorously attacked, and as bravely defended. Meanwhile, after the fight was over, Meldrum finding himself too weak to renew it the next day, resolved to retreat over the bridge in the night. But he found the guard he had left there had deserted, and the bridge in the possession of the enemies. So, not being able to retreat, and perceiving himself surrounded with the King's forces, Meldrum sent a trumpet to the Prince for a parley. It was agreed, that the foot should march away with their swords, colours, and drums; all the officers with their arms, horses, and baggage; and the troopers and dragoons, with their swords, horses, and colours. But he was forced to deliver all his ordnance and ammunition, with about three thousand muskets.

The Prince, after this expedition, which gained him great honour, returned into Shropshire, and from thence into Lancashire, to relieve the Countess of Derby, who for the space of eighteen weeks had been besieged in Latham-house, and made a gallant defence against a body of two thousand men. In his way to Latham, the Prince took by storm Stopworth, a small town in Cheshire. Whilst he was advancing towards Latham, the besiegers raised the siege, and part of them under the command of Colonel Rigby, went and reinforced the garrison of Bolton in Lancashire, which was in great danger. The Prince pursued them, and without giving them time to come to themselves, took the town by storm.†

After that, he attacked Liverpool. The governor, Colonel More, after some resistance, conveyed on board the ships in the Pool most part of his soldiers, and the richest goods in the town, and then the Prince entered with little opposition. Here he received a letter from the King, ordering him to march with all speed to the relief of York, which was now besieged. The King said to him in this letter, "That his affairs were in so very ill a state, that it would not be enough, though his Highness raised the siege of York, if he had not likewise beaten the Scotch army;" which words induced the Prince to fight a battle that proved very fatal to the King.

The Earl of Manchester was general of the seven eastern associated counties, who had raised an army of fourteen thousand horse, foot, and dragoons. With this army, the Earl of Manchester had already done the Parliament great service. In the last campaign he had taken the town of Lynn, and in the beginning of this, had possessed himself of Lincoln. As several of the leading members of Parliament thought of putting him in the Earl of Essex's place, occasion was taken from the services he had performed, to make a constant provision for his army. To that end, by an ordnance of both Houses, May the 15th, 1644, each of the seven associated counties were charged and rated at a certain weekly sum for the maintainance of his army;‡ after which, he received orders to join the two other armies, to besiege York together. The Parliament had also taken care for the subsistence of the Earl of Essex's § and Sir William Waller's armies; so that in May, they had five armies on foot, besides the troops dispersed in several counties, and in garrison.

Before the Marquis of Newcastle was blocked up in York, he had sent General Goring with four thousand horse, to ravage the parts in subjection to the Parliament. Wherefore, the Earl of Manchester detached likewise three thousand horse, which were joined by two thousand, sent from the Scots before York, to wait the motion of Goring. The Earl of Manchester therefore joined the two armies only with his foot, and some few horse, and presently after the junction, the siege of York was begun. The Marquis of Newcastle had sent the King word, that he hoped to hold out six weeks or two months, and besought him to think in the meantime how to relieve him. To retard, as much as possible, the progress of the siege, he made overtures for a treaty, but on such conditions as he knew would not be granted. Nevertheless he gained seven or eight days by this artifice, so that the cessation he had obtained, did not expire till the 15th of June. On the 24th, he sallied out, and furiously attacked the Earl of Manchester; but after a sharp conflict, was repulsed with loss.

† Rushworth says, the Prince's soldiers (consisting ten of thousand, or upwards) rushed into the town, and put great numbers to the sword, (twelve hundred, by their own confession) destroying for some miles round, and spoiling all they met, denying quarters, (as the townsmen alledged afterwards) and using other violences, besides totally plundering the town, and slaying four ministers. Colonel Rigby escaped to Bradford.

On Sunday the 30th of June, the besiegers had certain notice, that Prince Rupert was advancing at the head of an army, of near twenty thousand men, which had greatly increased in their march, as well by the troops drawn from several garrisons, as by Goring's horse, who had joined them, so that this army was not inferior to the three armies employed in the siege. The three generals, after a short consultation, thought it adviseable to raise the siege, and join their armies. They accordingly posted themselves on Marston-moor, about five miles from York. But though indeed Prince Rupert must have passed that way to come at them with his army, they left however two sides of York open, that provisions and ammunition, and even troops by small parties might be conveyed in. If the Prince's design had been only to relieve York, he had already effected it, and had only to remain in his post, and keep the enemies at bay, till all necessaries had been sent into the city.* But that same day, coming to York with a guard of two hundred horse, he conferred with the Marquis of Newcastle, or rather signified to him, that he intended to fight, according to his Majesty's express orders. As the Prince was extremely haughty, he made not the least compliment to the Marquis, upon the authority he assumed, in resolving to give battle, contrary to the Marquis's opinion, who maintained, it was by no means requisite in the present juncture, and the rather, as he expected five thousand men, who were coming from the north to his assistance. Moreover, the Prince made no scruple to command, without saying any thing to the Marquis, the forces in York to be ready to join him next morning in order to engage. Yet, these forces had been levied by the Marquis, and ever commanded with great reputation. Besides, the Marquis's birth and merit seemed to require a greater regard from the Prince. The Marquis told him, he was ready to obey his highness in all things, who might dispose of his troops as he pleased, and for his own part, would be contented to charge in the battle as volunteer. His dissatisfaction was farther increased, when having asked the Prince, what service he would be pleased to command him, the Prince answered him, he would begin no action upon the enemy till early the next morning, and desired him to repose himself till then. Thus, the Prince had the sole management of the intended battle.

In the night, the three Parliament generals having considered, that the place was relieved, and thinking, Prince Rupert had no farther design than to lay in provisions, resolved to march to Tadcaster, Cawood, and Selby, as well to preserve the East-Riding, as to hinder the furnishing of York with provisions from thence. Accordingly they began their march early in the morning, the Scots leading the van. But about nine o'clock they had intelligence, that the Prince was approaching with his army, and indeed he was advanced with five thousand horse, near their rear. Whereupon they were obliged to draw up speedily, and call back their van, which made all possible haste to re-join them. Fortunately for them, the foot which the Prince had drawn out of York, could not come up with his army till noon, and this gave the Scots time to re-join the rest of their army, which they had left in the morning. The armies were both drawn up about two in the afternoon. But there was between them a deep and large ditch, which neither cared to pass, for fear of giving the enemy too great an advantage. For this reason, they stood looking upon one another above two hours, each expecting the other to begin the charge.

Prince Rupert himself headed the left-wing,† consisting of five thousand horse. The right wing was commanded by Sir Charles Lucas, with Colonel Hurry, and the main body by General Goring. It does not appear, that the Marquis of Newcastle had any command in this action. The Parliament's right wing opposite to Prince Rupert, was led by Sir Thomas Fairfax, the left by the Earl of Manchester, assisted by his Lieutenant General Oliver Cromwell. In the main battalia towards the right was the Lord Fairfax, and General Leven towards the left. At last, between six and seven in the evening, the Parliament generals gave the signal, and marched to the enemies. The left wing of the King's army, commanded by Prince Rupert, was entirely routed by the Parliament's right wing, whilst the King's right wing had the same advantage over the left of the Parliament. The two victorious wings, after chacing their enemies, returned to the field of battle, and met face to face, so that each stood on the same ground that the enemy possessed at the beginning of the battle. Here the fight was renewed, and maintained on both sides with great warmth and vigour, till at last, night approaching, the King's horse were put to flight, and pursued within a mile of York, where they retired in the night. The countrymen who were commanded to bury the dead, said that they interred four thousand one hundred and fifty bodies. It was reported that three thousand of the Prince's men were killed. But the conquerors affirmed, they lost not above three hundred.‡

Though Prince Rupert had always been victorious where he had commanded in chief, it is not very surprising that he should once be defeated; but his resolution to retire next day with his army, appears very strange. His horse had not suffered much, because they had taken to flight betimes, at least those of the left wing, commanded by himself, and his foot were also in good condition, the greatest storm having fallen on the Marquis of Newcastle's. He might therefore have defended York, and waited the King's orders upon this fatal accident. So, this extraordinary resolution can scarcely be imputed but to an excessive shame and indignation, which hindered him from considering how prejudicial it would be to the King his uncle's affairs. He sent the Marquis of Newcastle notice of his design, just as the Marquis was sending him word, that he was instantly going to quit the kingdom. They both put their resolutions in practice. The Marquis repaired that very day to Scarborough, and embarked for Hamburgh,§ and the Prince left York, and marched towards Chester with the remains of his army. It is easy to guess

* Ludlow observes, that if the Prince could have been contented with relieving York, and retreated, as he might have done, without fighting, the reputation he had gained, would have caused his army to increase like the rolling of a snow ball.

† Rushworth says, the Prince led the right wing, and Sir Charles Lucas the left: and that the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell commanded the left of the enemy. The King's forces consisted of fourteen thousand foot, nine thousand horse, and about twenty-five pieces of ordnance. The Parliament's army did not exceed that number. Oliver Cromwell was hard pressed by the Prince's horse, and wounded above the shoulders, but at length he broke through. The Lord Holles affirms, that Oliver behaved in this battle, in a very cowardly manner; and that those who did then most service, were, the Major-Generals Lesley and Crawford; and Sir Thomas Fairfax.

‡ Sir Charles Lucas, Major-General Porter, Major-General Tilyard, and the Lord Goring's son were among the prisoners. There were about a hundred other officers taken, and fifteen hundred soldiers, twenty-five pieces of ordnance, a hundred and thirty barrels of powder, several thousand stand of arms, and about a hundred colours. Others say, there were about four thousand taken prisoners, and as many slain on the King's party; the whole of both armies amounted to near nine thousand men. Among the colours were Prince Rupert's standard, with the arms of the Palatinate, and a red cross in the middle; a yellow coronet, in the middle a lion couchant, and behind him a mastiff, seeming to snatch at him, and in a label from his mouth written, Kimbolton; at his feet little beagles, and before their mouths written, Pym, Pym, Pym; and out of the lion's mouth these words proceeded.——"Quousque tandem abutere Patientia nostra?"

§ With him went his two sons, Charles Viscount Mansfield, and Henry Lord Cavendish; his brother Sir Charles Cavendish; Dr. Brambal, guess why the Marquis of Newcastle quitted the King's service, after having been so unworthily treated by Prince Rupert. He believed, doubtless, he could not with honour resume his former command, having been deemed incapable to serve the King on so important an occasion.

The Parliament generals improved their victory, and the dissention of their enemies. They returned to their post before York, which was left to the discretion of Sir Thomas Glemham the governor, who seeing himself unable long to resist, surrendered this important place upon honourable terms. They were no sooner in possession of York, but the three armies separated. The Lord Fairfax with his forces remained at York, as governor. The Earl of Manchester marched towards Lincoln, not to be remote, without necessity, from the associated counties, whose troops he commanded. The Earl of Leven with the Scotch army marched northward to join the Earl of Calendar, who was advancing with a strong reinforcement from Scotland. When these forces were joined, he laid siege to Newcastle, which surrendered at discretion in October. Thus the battle of Marston-moor lost the King all the north, which hitherto had given the Parliament forces a powerful diversion. But this was not all the mischief the King had to fear. There was danger of the three victorious armies joining in the heart of the kingdom those of the Earl of Essex and Sir William Waller, and of their taking at once all the places which were still in his power. This was the more to be feared, as when he heard of the defeat of his army at Marston-moor, he was himself marching to the relief of the west, where the Earl of Essex then was with an army, which the King's forces in those parts were not able to withstand.

The Parliament seem by their extraordinary preparations in the beginning of the year 1644, to have intended to put a speedy conclusion to the war. Besides, the armies of the Lord Fairfax and Scotland, and that of the Earl of Manchester, which was paid by the eastern counties, a new regulation was made the latter end of March, for the maintenance of seven thousand five hundred foot, and three thousand horse, to be commanded by the Earl of Essex. At the same time, by another ordnance, the four southern associated counties, namely, Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Hampshire, were to maintain an army of three thousand six hundred foot, twelve hundred horse, and five hundred dragoons, under the command of Sir William Waller. These were not new armies, they subsisted before the regulation; but the point was to recruit them, complete the number fixed by the Parliament, and settle the necessary weekly payment of their subsistence money.*

Though Sir William Waller was worsted at the battle of Round-way-Down, the two Houses, far from losing their esteem for him, resolved to send him into the west, with an army capable of withstanding Prince Maurice, who found no farther opposition in those parts. The King having notice of this design, resolved to endeavour not only to hinder Waller's march into the west, but also to break the association of the four southern counties, where he had many friends, and even hoped to procure an association of these counties in his favour. To that purpose, he gave the Lord Hopton† an army consisting of troops drawn out of several garrisons, and of two regiments of foot lately arrived at Bristol from Ireland.‡ As soon as these forces were assembled, Lord Hopton posted himself at Winchester, where Sir John Berkley brought him two regiments newly raised by him in Devonshire, and the King sent him a detachment of a thousand men commanded by Sir Jacob Ashley. All these forces together made an army of four thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, with which he resolved to march into Sussex. Waller, who was then quartered about Farnham, assembled his troops and faced the enemy: but after some slight skirmishes, he retired into Farnham castle, whence he took a journey to London, to represent to the Parliament his want of supplies, without which it would not be possible to perform what had been enjoined him.

Immediately after Waller's departure for London, Lord Hopton marched with part of his army to attack Arundel castle, which was surrendered upon terms. But hearing a few days after, that Waller had returned to Farnham with a strong reinforcement, he rejoined the rest of his army.

Waller's journey to London answered his expectation. Besides a brigade of Londoners under Major-General Brown, he procured an order of Parliament to the Earl of Essex, to send him from his army a thousand horse under the command of Sir William Balfour. He was no sooner returned to Farnham with these supplies, but he marched all night, and at break of day beat up one of the Lord Hopton's quarters at Alton, and carried away prisoners Colonel Boles's regiment of foot;§ a troop or two of horse, which were in the same quarters, having betimes taken to flight. Then he marched directly to Arundel castle, and made the garrison prisoners. Here the learned Mr. Chillingworth was taken, and died within a few days.

The King hearing of the supplies given to Waller, sent a reinforcement to Lord Hopton. The Earl of Forth, the King's general, would go himself, but refused the command which the Lord Hopton offered to resign to him. Lord Hopton having then an army of about eight thousand men, resolved to give Waller battle, and begun his march with that intent, at the very time Waller was advancing towards him with the same resolution. The two armies met between Farnham and Winchester on Cheriton-down near Alresford, where the battle was fought the 29th of March. The Lord Hopton was defeated and forced to retire to Reading, and afterwards to Oxford. Waller marched to Winchester, and became master of the city, but did not think proper to besiege the castle, which was his own inheritance, because he had elsewhere more important affairs. Lord Clarendon pretends, the loss sustained by Waller at Alresford hindered him from improving his advantage, and marching into the west, as he had resolved. But it may be affirmed, this was not the thing that prevented his taking the western route. It was rather owing to the Parliament's resolutions, by whom he was recalled to London, after having dismissed the auxiliary regiments of that city, and Kent, which were also come to join with him.

Both Houses perceiving, that by the King's late loss at Alresford, his army was discouraged and considerably lessened; that moreover, they had sufficient forces in the north, to have nothing to fear from the Marquis of Newcastle, who was shut up in York, resolved to besiege Oxford, where the King was with his army. So, having relinquished, or suspended, the design of sending Waller into the west, they laboured with all possible diligence, to put the two armies of Essex and Waller upon the footing settled by their ordnance, that they might act together against Oxford.

The King had ever imagined, that Waller's design was to march towards the western parts. For which reason he had assembled his forces at Marlborough, and afterwards posted himself at Newbury, where he had remained some time, till he could better discover the designs of his enemies. But having at length found, the Parliament had altered their measures, he came to Reading, and caused the fortifications to be demolished in order to strengthen his army with the garrison, consisting of two thousand five hundred men. He also ordered Prince Rupert to come and join him: but afterwards permitted him to relieve Latham house, where the Countess of Derby was besieged. With the Reading garrison, his army was increased to eight thousand five hundred foot, and four thousand horse. But being still ignorant of the designs of his enemies, he thought proper to retire to Oxford with his whole army.

* For the maintenance of this army, and a suitable train of artillery, with other incident charges, there was to be monthly raised and paid out of the excise, the sum of thirty thousand, five hundred and four pounds. And, besides the money arising from the forfeited, estates in Hampshire and Sussex, the weekly sum of 2638*l.* was to be levied in the four associated counties for Waller's army.

† Sir Ralph Hopton was created Lord Hopton of Stratton, Sept. 4, 1643, at Oxford.

Meanwhile, the Parliament, who had for some time found means to take their resolutions with more secrecy than formerly, perceiving the two armies of Essex and Waller ready to march, sent to each a supply of four thousand two hundred of the trained bands of London. So, the Earl of Essex's army consisted of twelve thousand foot, and three thousand horse; and Waller's of seven thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse and dragoons. These two generals had orders to march separately, and besiege Oxford, if the King remained there; but if he went from thence, the Earl of Essex was ordered to follow him with his army, and Waller to march into the west, according to the first project. They departed from London, the 14th and 15th of May, to put themselves at the head of their respective armies, and immediately marched towards Oxford.

The King had posted almost all his infantry at Abington, in order to stop the enemies, and have time to consider what measures he should take, in case they really intended to besiege Oxford, which he still questioned. As Abington could not be easily defended but on the east side, and he was unwilling to run any unnecessary hazard, he had ordered General Wilmot to make a vigorous defence, if attacked on that side, but if on the west from Wantage and Farrington, to relinquish the place. But whether the order was not clear and full, or for some other reason, Wilmot, at the enemies' approach, on the east side, immediately retired to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex instantly entered Abington. The King perceiving the siege of Oxford was resolved, had but one way to hinder it, which was to defend the passes of the rivers Isis and Cherwell, which run on the west and east sides of the city, and to that end he quartered his horse near the Isis, and his foot towards the Cherwell. Waller found means at last to gain the pass at Newbridge over the Isis. Whereupon the King drew all his forces into Oxford and to the north of the city, with thoughts at the same time of providing for the safety of his person, not judging it proper to suffer himself to be shut up. There was no time to lose, for the King's troops were hardly retired, when the Earl of Essex passed the Cherwell at Gosworth bridge with his army. So the King giving orders to his horse, and a small body of foot, to wait for him at such a place, left Oxford the 3d of June about nine o'clock at night, and safely passed between the two Parliament armies. He was out of all danger of pursuit before the news of his retreat reached the enemies, and came at length on June 6, to Worcester, after having endured great fatigue.

Meanwhile, the city of Oxford being well stored with provisions and ammunition, and the King having left there almost all his foot, the two generals did not think fit to besiege it, and the rather, as they had no orders to do it, unless the King remained there. The Parliament's intention was, that in case the King quitted Oxford, the Earl of Essex should follow him with his army; and Waller with his, take care of the affairs of the west. But the Earl of Essex, for some unknown reason, reversed this order, and would himself march into the west. And when Waller urged the Parliament's orders, the Earl of Essex positively commanded him, as his general, to obey, to which the other could make no reply. So, the Earl immediately began his march to the west. The Parliament were very much offended with the Earl of Essex's disobedience, and sent him an order, which reached him at Salisbury, to return, follow the King, and leave to Waller the western expedition. But the Earl, instead of complying, sent a letter to the committee of war, with the reasons of his conduct, subscribing his letter, "Your innocent, though suspected servant, Essex." The Earl pursued his march, in a slow and easy manner, till he came into Devonshire.

The Queen had been ever since April at Exeter, where she was delivered of the Princess Henrietta, about a fortnight or three weeks before the Earl of Essex's approach. As soon as she heard of his entering Devonshire, she sent and desired a safe-conduct to retire to Bristol. The Earl of Essex answered, if her Majesty would please to go to London, he would have the honour to wait upon her thither; but could not give her a safe-conduct to Bristol, without the express order of both Houses. Whereupon the Queen withdrew into Cornwall, and some time after into France, with a convoy of men of war, sent her by the Prince of Orange.

Prince Maurice had been, since the 20th of April, before the little town of Lyme, which made a more obstinate defence than was expected. This place, and Plymouth, were almost the only towns in the west that were for the Parliament. It was therefore very necessary for the Parliament, to have in those parts, forces capable of reviving the courage of their friends, who had received no assistance since Prince Maurice's arrival. At the Earl of Essex's approach, who was now advanced to Dorchester, the Prince raised the siege of Lyme, and retired to Exeter. The same day, the Earl of Essex possessed himself of Dorchester. Then, he detached Sir William Balfour, who took Weymouth, whither the Earl of Essex instantly repaired. He had some thoughts of besieging Exeter, and indeed marched that way; but considering that Prince Maurice was there with his whole army, he was afraid of losing too much time in the siege, and stopped at Chard, where he remained some time, and from thence marched to Tiverton. Whereupon, Prince Maurice sent a detachment from Exeter, with orders to secure Barnstable; but the inhabitants shut the gates against them, and immediately sent to the Earl of Essex, to come and take possession of the town, which was done accordingly by the Lord Roberts. Here was taken Captain Howard, who having been formerly Lieutenant to Captain Pym, had deserted, with nineteen troopers, to the King's party; for which being now tried by a council of war, he was condemned and executed. Upon this, Prince Maurice caused to be hanged Turpin, a sea captain, taken prisoner in attempting to releive Exeter, when the Earl of Stamford was besieged in it. He being indicted for levying arms against the King, had been condemned, but hitherto reprieved, by reason of the consequences. The Parliament was very much incensed at this reprisal, considering the difference between a prisoner of war, and a deserter. Wherefore having Serjeant Glanvil, one of Turpin's judges, in their custody, who had lately quitted the King's party, and returned to London, they ordered him to be impeached of high treason. Soon after, the King's party caused fourteen clothiers to be hanged at Woodhouse in Wiltshire, and the Parliament ordered eight Irishmen to be executed, who had been taken prisoners. These executions gave occasion to the Parliament, in August following, to erect a court martial, to which were given very severe instructions, chiefly with respect to deserters. About the middle of July, Taunton Dean was taken for the Parliament, by a party of the garrison of Lyme.

The King staid at Worcester with his little army only a few days, hearing Waller was marching that way. When he quitted Worcester, he made several marches and counter-marches, to deceive the vigilance of his enemy, not being strong enough to venture to meet him. At last, having made a shew of marching towards Shrewsbury, Waller doubted not but his design was to join Prince Rupert, who was still in those parts. For this was before the battle of Marston-moor. He thought it therefore very important to march before.

fore, and post himself between the King and Shrewsbury, in order to hinder his joining with the Prince. The King was glad to have deceived Waller. As soon as he knew Waller expected him upon that route, he feigned to take it indeed, but suddenly turning about, instead of continuing his march towards Shrewsbury, took the road to Oxford, and left Waller in his post, without any possibility of overtaking him. When he came near Oxford, he was joined by the rest of his army, which he had left there when he quitted that city. Then, no longer fearing Waller, he went and quartered in Buckinghamshire, without any other design than to give the enemy battle, if there was occasion.

Waller having been thus circumvented, approached the King, and at length the two armies were in sight, with the river Cherwell between them. Waller drew up on a very advantageous ground, imagining the King would pass the river to attack him, and thereby furnish him with an opportunity to fight with advantage. But the King, to draw him from his post, feigned to march northward, and accordingly advanced into Northamptonshire, leaving a strong guard at Cropedy bridge, to hinder the enemies from passing, and following him in the rear. Whilst he was marching, he had intelligence, there was a body of three hundred horse going to join Waller, within two miles of the van of his army, and was told they might be easily cut off, if the army moved faster. Whereupon orders were sent to the van, and main body, to advance faster. As soon as Waller perceived there was a great distance between the King's rear, and the rest of his army, he detached a thousand horse, to pass the river at a ford, a mile below, and himself, with fifteen hundred horse, one thousand foot, and eleven pieces of cannon, attacked Cropedy bridge, took it, and passed his troops. Which done, he fell upon the King's rear, but was repulsed, with loss of many of his men, and part of his cannon. The detachment, which passed the ford, had much the same success. Waller being thus repulsed, and forced to repass the river, drew up his men on a hill, and there waited the King's motions. As it was yet but three in the afternoon, the King, believing the enemies were discouraged with their ill-success, ordered Cropedy bridge, and the ford, to be attacked by two great detachments. The first was repulsed at the bridge, with great loss on the King's side. The other gained the ford; but all that could be done, was to maintain it, expecting in vain, till night, that the first detachment would recover the bridge. Night coming on, both sides retired, Waller remaining master of the two passes.

The King was so prepossessed with the notion, that the enemies' army was entirely discouraged, that he resolved to send them an offer of pardon by a herald, imagining it would be immediately accepted, and Waller deserted. In this belief, he sent a trumpeter to Waller, to desire a safe-conduct for a gentleman to deliver a gracious message from his Majesty. Waller answered, he had no power to receive any message without permission from the Parliament, to whom his Majesty was to make application. The two armies faced each other for the space of two days, standing in the same posture, after which they both drew off, each taking a different route. In all appearance, Waller after this loss, did not think himself in condition to go any more in quest of the King, who was superior to him in number. As it was about this time, that the report of Prince Rupert's defeat at Marston-moor was spread, Waller thought, doubtless, there was no great necessity to hazard a second battle, since the King would probably be very much distressed. When he knew afterwards, the King was marching towards the west, he gave himself still less trouble about what the King might attempt, since it belonged to the Earl of Essex to get off as he pleased. There was a sufficient union between them, for Waller to be much concerned at what might happen to the Earl. Perhaps too, his not being able to follow the King, who was marching against the Earl of Essex, was the reason why he dismissed the regiments of the London auxiliaries, which, added to his loss at Cropedy, disabled him from acting till he had fresh troops.

The King, who at the beginning of this campaign was in a sad strait, found himself, a month after, much at ease. Of the two armies by which he had been attacked, one was unable to hurt him, and the other was gone into the west, where he himself was very strong. In the first place, he was master of all the fortified towns, Plymouth excepted. Secondly, he had at Bristol a large garrison, part whereof might be drawn out upon occasion. In the third place, almost all the gentry of the western counties were well-affected to him. There were only the meaner sort of people, who were divided between him and the Parliament, but who however were always ready to join with the strongest. Lastly, Prince Maurice had at Exeter, and in the neighbourhood, four thousand men, which could be easily brought to him by the north of Devonshire, and the Earl of Essex not be able to prevent it. All these considerations determined him to march westward, to give the Earl of Essex battle, if an opportunity offered. He had scarcely begun his march, when he received the ill news of what passed at York, which confirmed him in his resolution. He perceived, that if he remained in the middle of the kingdom, where he had few friends or fortified towns, the three Parliament armies, which were now separated, would not fail to rejoin, and then he should be too weak to withstand them.

As soon as the King had taken this resolution, he informed Prince Maurice of it, that he might be ready to join him, and by the same express sent orders to the Lord Hopton, to draw what men he could out of Wales and lead them to Bristol, that he might meet him on the way with those troops, and as many more as could possibly be spared from that garrison. So, the King making easy marches, in order to give the Welsh troops time to join him, came the 15th of July to Bath, whence after two days, he departed, and at length arrived at Exeter. When all the forces, he had sent for, had joined him, he saw himself at the head of an army much more numerous than the Earl of Essex's.

Five days after the fight at Cropedy bridge, the King being at Evesham, caused to be drawn up a message for peace to both Houses, a copy whereof was sent to the Earl of Essex by the Marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to the Parliament, it being intimated that the French agent had the original to deliver if required. This message, directed to the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster, contained a general offer to treat of peace, and if commissioners should be sent to him, he would grant them a safe-conduct. The two Houses, ever jealous of the King, thought there was some artifice concealed in sending them only a copy of the message, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original of the French agent. Besides, they did not conceive themselves to be owned by the direction of this message as the two Houses of Parliament, and therefore imagined, the King had a mind to reserve to himself the power of saying, that he did not acknowledge them for the true Parliament of England, and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, since he had published the forementioned declaration against them. Wherefore they resolved to take no notice of the message, nor return any answer.

Whilst the King stayed at Bath, he assembled the inhabitants of Somersetshire at Kingsmoor, and made a speech to them, exhorting them to take arms for him, and furnish him with money. He told them "That victory was the only means left to restore peace to the nation, that blessed peace which he had so often sought for from them at Westminster, and which they had so scornfully rejected. But," continued he, "when I mention peace, I would be understood to intend that peace, which is built upon such foundations as are most likely to render it firm and stable; wherein God's true religion may be best secured from the danger of Popery, sectaries, and innovations; the crown may possess those just prerogatives which may enable me to protect and govern my people according to law; and the subjects be confirmed in those rights which they have derived from their forefathers, and which I have granted them in Parliament; to which I shall always be ready to add such new graces, as I shall find most to conduce to their happiness: this is the peace which I labour for, wherein I may justly expect your best assistance with your hearts, hands, and purses."

When the Earl of Essex heard of the King's approach, he called a council of war, to debate what was to be done in this emergency. His own opinion was, to return, and hinder the King from penetrating farther into the country, and to give him battle if a favourable opportunity offered. He represented, that in Devonshire or Somersetshire, as he should not be straitened in room or provisions, he might either fight, or avoid it as he should think fit. But the Lord Roberts of Truro, field-marshal in this expedition, whose estate lay all in Cornwall, positively affirmed, that as soon as the army should enter that county, the people would all declare for the Parliament; that then it would be impossible for the King to come there, and the army might easily subsist, and be re-inforced with a great number of troops. Upon this assurance, which afterwards proved very false, the Lord Roberts, rather by a sort of violence, than the strength of his reasons, caused it to be resolved, that the army should march into Cornwall.

Pursuant to this resolution, the Earl of Essex entered that county the 26th of July, after forcing the passage at Newbridge, which was bravely defended by Sir Richard Grenvil. The same day the King came to Exeter, and after a general muster of his army, followed the Earl of Essex, who did not find in Cornwall what the Lord Roberts had made him expect. He advanced however to Launceston, and from thence to Bodmin, where he wrote to the Parliament, that he did not doubt, the King's design was to straiten him for provisions, and therefore earnestly desired, that an army might be sent into the west to lie upon the King's rear, and hinder him from executing his project. But as Sir William Waller was not ready to march, being then in London, soliciting supplies for his army, all that could be done was to detach Colonel Middleton with two thousand five hundred horse and dragoons, with orders to march westwards.

The King seeing the Earl of Essex entangled in a country where he wanted provisions for the subsistence of his army, thought it a fair opportunity to try to gain him. Wherefore he sent him a letter under his own hand, persuading him to free himself from his present straits, by restoring peace to the kingdom. The Earl of Essex returning no answer to this letter, Prince Maurice, and the Earl of Forth, lately made Earl of Brentford, the King's general, wrote to him two days after; and the next day he received another letter on the same subject, signed by Lord Hopton and many general officers of the King's army. At last, he returned a brief answer to the Earl of Brentford, that he had no commission to treat.

About this time, the Lord Wilmot, Lieutenant-General of the King's horse, was arrested and sent prisoner to Exeter by his Majesty's order, he having taken the liberty to send the Earl of Essex word, that if he would enter into a treaty, the officers of the King's army were so desirous of peace, they would constrain his Majesty to conclude it upon reasonable terms. Wilmot's disgrace bred some murmurs amongst the officers of horse, by whom he was very much beloved. They even presented a petition to the King, to pray him to let them know what crime that Lord was accused of. The King, in such a juncture, was very ready to give them this satisfaction. Nevertheless the Lord Wilmot was deprived of his post, after which, he had leave to retire beyond sea. It was generally believed in the army, that Wilmot's disgrace was owing to some intrigue of the court, and the King's private hatred of him on account of the part he had acted against the Earl of Strafford.

The Earl of Essex perceived too late the vanity of the Lord Roberts's promises. So far were the people of Cornwall from rising in his favour, that on the contrary they ran in crowds to join the King's army. The Earl could have provisions but by sea, and in small quantities, by means of a river which afforded him a communication by sea with Plymouth.* At last, Sir Richard Grenvil having brought the King a supply of troops, it was resolved in a council of war, to make use of the superiority of the number, not to compel the Earl of Essex to fight, but to cut off his provisions. This was happily effected, by means of a fort run up on the bank of the river, by which the enemies received their provisions. Thus the Earl of Essex being reduced to the last extremity, after having kept his post almost a month, resolved to abandon his army, to avoid falling into the King's hands. But before he executed that design, he ordered Sir William Balfour to endeavour to save the horse, which he performed very fortunately in a dark misty night, by passing unobserved through the King's quarters. As soon as the Earl of Essex knew the horse were out of danger, he sent to the King and demanded a parley; but before the answer was returned, took ship with some officers and retired to Plymouth, leaving Major-General Skippon to procure the best terms he could for the foot.

The King having granted the parley desired by the Earl of Essex before his departure, a conference was held between some officers of both armies, where articles were agreed on; by which the infantry were obliged to surrender their arms, artillery, baggage, and ammunition; and, being conducted to the Parliament's quarters, were dismissed.

By this treaty, the King properly gained only artillery, arms, and ammunition. But though it was something to reduce this army to such a condition, it would have been of much more advantage to him, had he made the officers and soldiers prisoners of war. For the Parliament wanted neither artillery, arms, nor ammunition, to repair their army, which indeed was able within five or six weeks, to give the King battle. Though the Earl of Essex might have been justly upbraided for the two faults he had committed, in obstinately pursuing his march into the west, contrary to the orders of both Houses, and in preposterously running himself into Cornwall, he was not insulted for his misfortunes, but at his return was very civilly received. It was then no proper time to examine his conduct. The point was to recruit and arm the ruined army, as well as that of Waller, and accordingly both Houses applied themselves to it with all posible diligence. They ordered also Colonel Middleton to repair speedily to the Earl of Essex's army, and the Earl of Manchester to march the same way with his forces.

After the King had gained so considerable an advantage, he hoped, the affrighted Parliament would desire nothing more than to come to an agreement. He plainly perceived, that such a peace as he desired was impracticable, as long as the Parliament was prosperous. But he flattered himself with the hopes, that after so great a misfortune, his enemies would gladly accept his offers, and insist no longer upon terms he was fully resolved not to grant. In this belief, he sent from Tavistock a fresh message to both Houses, with offers of peace, and annexed to it a duplicate of his former message from Evesham. This message was so worded, that he seemed out of pure moderation to offer, after his victory, to be content with having, by a peace, what he was in condition to obtain by force of arms.

The 10th of September, the King appeared before Plymouth,† in hopes, that after his late victory, the gates would be opened to him. But having summoned it in vain, and even given some assaults, he was forced to retire, the season not permitting him to undertake so important a siege, which, probably, would have employed him several months. Meanwhile General Goring, with a detachment of the army, became master of Barnstaple.

We have had frequent occasion to speak of the affairs of the Elector Palatine, and to observe, how much James I. and Charles I. neglected the interests, the one of the King his son-in-law, and the other, of the Elector his nephew. All the Elector's dominions being in the hands of his enemies, he fled for refuge to the King his uncle, who gave him a pension for his subsistence. This pension, it is likely, was ill paid since the King was engaged in the war with Scotland, and still worse, since the beginning of this Parliament. So, the Elector having attended the King till he retired into the north, and seeing the war ready to kindle, abruptly quitted the King his uncle at York. He retired into Holland, and staid there till August 1644, when he suddenly came to London to reside there, under the protection of the Parliament. The King hearing of it, wrote to him, to know the reason of so extraordinary a proceeding. It does not appear what answer the Elector returned; but probably, not knowing how to subsist, and considering the King his uncle was not able to maintain him, he believed, he should find more assistance in the Parliament, which had ever expressed a great affection and zeal for his House. He was not deceived in his expectations, for the Parliament granted him an honourable pension, which was more regularly paid than the former from the King.*

The King was so strongly possessed with the belief, that his victory could not but make a strong impression upon the minds of the people, that he resolved to march directly to London. He did not question, but his army would considerably increase by the way, and the people forsake the two Houses, when they should see him marching towards the metropolis. He imagined, the people wanted only an opportunity to free themselves from the yoke of the Parliament, and that the present one being very favourable, was not to be neglected. He published therefore the 30th of September, a proclamation, dated at Chard, wherein he set forth, with what earnestness and sincerity he had always desired, and offered peace, which had been constantly rejected by both Houses, after which he said, "That he had therefore resolved with his army, to draw presently towards London, and his southern and eastern counties, not looking upon these parts as enemies to him, but as his poor subjects, oppressed by power, (of which he was assured the greater part remained loyal to him,) and so deserving his protection; hoping, that at a nearer distance of place, there might be allowed so right an understanding between him and his people, that at length he might obtain a treaty for peace, and a full and free convention in Parliament, and therein make an end of these unhappy differences, by a good accommodation; whereby his people might be settled in the possession of their rights and liberties. And therefore he required his subjects within his own quarters, through, or near which he should pass, forthwith to prepare themselves with the best arms they could get to be ready to join him. He authorised, likewise, as well the trained bands of London, as his subjects of the eastern and southern counties, to chuse their own commanders among those gentlemen and citizens, that were of approved loyalty, and lovers of peace, requiring them at his approach, to put themselves in arms, and assist in this expedition, and commanding them to seize such places of strength, as the rebels were possessed of, and to apprehend the persons of all such as should hinder the settling the peace of the kingdom."

All the effect this proclamation produced, was, that the inhabitants of Somersetshire, where the King then was, presented a petition to him, humbly beseeching his Majesty, "That they might have liberty to wait upon him in person, and at a nearer distance of place, become petitioners to both Houses, to embrace his Majesty's offers of peace; and in case of refusal, they promised to spend their lives and fortunes, in assisting him to compass by the sword, what by fair means could not be effected." But this was only a promised aid, and as yet too remote for the King to make any use of it in the present expedition.

If every thing had happened as the King had imagined; if the people had flocked to his army; if he had been cheerfully supplied with all necessaries, very probably, he might have arrived at London before the Parliament forces could have been joined to form a new army. But his army, instead of increasing in their march, as he expected, daily diminished by fatigues, by want of money, shoes, and stockings, by sickness, which disabled many of his men from following the army.† He was obliged to make frequent halts in several towns to wait for money and other necessaries, which, he perceived, would not be supplied when he should be removed. The horse being discontented, as well at the Lord Wilmot's disgrace, as at their having received no pay this campaign, he was forced to stay till the eastern counties should supply him with money to satisfy them. These delays were the reason that he came not to Salisbury till the 15th of October, six weeks after the advantage gained in Cornwall. Then it was that he altered his resolution, and instead of marching to London, contented himself with returning to his old quarters in and about Oxford.

Whilst the King was on his march, the Parliament was not idle. They had provided six thousand stand of arms, and clothes for the Earl of Essex's foot, and detached the city brigade consisting of five thousand men, besides the necessary recruits, to join him. Sir William Waller had taken the field again, his army being recruited and re-inforced, and was now at Andover ready to march. The Earl of Essex's horse, which had fortunately escaped in Cornwall, were come to him, as well as those sent into the west, under the command of Colonel Middleton. Thus, the Earl of Essex saw himself in condition to march the 17th of October in order to join Sir William Waller and the Earl of Manchester, who was within distance. The King having notice that Waller was to march to Reading, advanced with all possible diligence towards Andover, to give him battle before he had joined the Earl of Essex. He even fell upon his rear and killed twenty or thirty of his men. But this could not hinder the junction of the three armies, which was done the 21st of October.

Whilst the King's enemies lay so near him, he very unadvisedly, as it seems, detached from his army the Earl of Northampton with three regiments of horse, to relieve Banbury castle, which had been besieged ever since July the 19th, and was now reduced to extremity. The Earl succeeded in his expedition, but the King was likely to pay dear for it, since, a few days after, he was forced to fight, deprived of the aid of these three regiments. His design, was only to retire to Oxford, there being no farther reason to induce him to pursue his march towards London. But he would first besiege Dennington castle, and therefore advanced to Newbury, which lies but a mile from that castle, whilst the Parliament army was at Reading. The next day, that army marched towards Newbury, where the King fortified himself in the best manner he could, and placed his foot in the intrenchments, whilst the horse were posted in two adjoining open fields, and for some days there were frequent skirmishes between the two armies. At last, on the 27th of October, being Sunday, the Parliament Generals having divided their forces into two bodies, attacked the King's intrenchments at two several places. The fight, which began about three or four in the afternoon, held till night, and was extremely sharp, each side repulsing the other by turns. When night approached, the assailants forced part of the intrenchment, and took some pieces of ordnance. But night hindered them from improving this advantage, and put an end to the fight.

* He had before his coming, sent two letters to the Parliament, declaring in the first, his satisfaction in the covenant, wishing them success; and in the other, the great streights he and his mother were in, for want of the stipend they formerly had, and bemoaning the courses his brother Prince Rupert took, in fighting against the Parliament. Upon his landing at Gravesend, a committee of the Commons attended him, and in May 1645, the Commons ordered him an allowance of 8000*l.* a year, 2000*l.* whereof out of the King's revenue, and the rest out of the estates of the Lord Cottington, and Sir Nicholas Crispe.

Meanwhile, the King fearing the enemy would next morning penetrate into his lines, withdrew in the night, and marched to Wallingford, leaving his heavy cannon and baggage in Dennington castle. The Earl of Essex was not in the battle. He had quitted the army some days before, whether on account of some sudden indisposition, or perhaps out of some discontent, not being able to agree, either with the Earl of Manchester, or Sir William Waller.

The Parliament-Generals, who thought themselves victorious, should, it might be thought, have attacked the King in his retreat, it being then full-moon. They suffered him to march however without pursuing him,* so that he safely arrived at Oxford. But this was not their greatest error. The King having left his cannon, ammunition, and baggage in Dennington castle, they could have done nothing more advantageous than to employ their whole strength to take the castle. But they contented themselves with summoning the Governor,† and upon his refusal to capitulate, they remained quiet at Newbury without attempting any thing against him.

Meanwhile, the King being informed of the discord between the Parliament-Generals, and of their leaving Dennington castle unattacked, very wisely improved so favourable a juncture. Some days after his arrival at Oxford, he was joined by Prince Rupert, who brought him some horse. He drew a body of foot out of the garrison of Oxford, and other neighbouring towns, and the Earl of Northampton rejoined with his brigade of horse. By means of these supplies he formed an army of six thousand foot, and five thousand horse, with which he marched back towards Newbury the 2d of November. After the battle, the Parliament-army moved towards Oxford, but had returned to Newbury, on pretence that the ways were unpassable. But the chief reason was, the Generals could not agree, there being no commander-in-chief. They received the intelligence of the King's march; but would not believe it till they heard of his being within six miles of Dennington. Whereupon they resolved to draw up the next day between Dennington and the King's army. To that end, orders were given for all their horse to rendezvous early on the morrow, it not being possible that day by reason their quarters were too separate and remote. But that very night, the King pursued his march to Dennington, and drawing up his army, between the castle and Newbury, waited in that posture to see what the enemy would attempt. Though presently after the Parliament-army was also drawn up, the Generals, having viewed the posture and strength of the King's, and held a council of war, judged it unsafe to engage. So, after some skirmishes, the King having drawn out what he left at Dennington, marched back to Oxford, where he arrived the 21st of November. In his way thither, he sent a detachment of his army to the relief of the Marquis of Winchester, who had been long besieged in his own castle of Basing. But this detachment found the siege already raised. Thus ended the campaign of the year 1644, which proved less fatal to the King than he had reason to fear, though he lost York and all the north.

It is time now to speak of some other occurrences of the year 1644, which had no immediate relation to the war.

March the 26th, 1644, the Parliament passed an ordinance, enjoining every family within the bills of mortality, for three months, to forbear one meal a week, and contribute the value thereof for the public occasions. This was properly laying a tax upon every family. For otherwise, very likely the Parliament did not much care whether this weekly meal were forborne or not, provided the value which was to be set upon each person and family were paid.

April the 13th an Oxford spy was executed in the Palace-Yard at Westminster.

To the year 1644 the affairs of the war were so publicly debated in the Parliament, that the King was acquainted with the resolutions there taken, before they were begun to be executed. But this year the managers thought fit to give the committee of both kingdoms, who were charged with the affairs of the war, more power than before, that they might give their orders, and cause them to be executed, without being obliged to communicate their resolutions to both Houses. A considerable advantage was hereby gained, in that the resolutions became more private, and the King had not so good information. But on the other hand, the committee had by it a power which might be of very dangerous consequence. And therefore several members complained, that the most important affairs were not communicated, but that the direction and management was reserved to themselves alone by the committee. The time for which they had been appointed being about to expire, the Commons passed an ordinance, for the continuance of the committee three months longer, and sent it up to the Lords. But the Peers, instead of passing the ordinance as sent by the Commons, added a clause to increase the number of the committee, with five Lords and ten Commoners of their nomination. It is not to be doubted, the King's private friends used their endeavours to increase the number of the committee, in hopes of being able to gain some one to inform them of what should pass there. But the Commons foreseeing the consequence of this addition, refused to consent to it, and desired the Lords, that they would pass the ordinance without any amendment. The Lords declining to do it for some time, the Commons found means to get the Lord Mayor and the Common Council of London to petition them among other things, that the committee of both kingdoms might be continued as it was. Then the Lords perceiving, that since the city of London interposed, their resistance would be fruitless, passed the ordinance four days after. The declarations of the city of London were a curb frequently used by the Commons to stop the career of the King's friends, when by their cabals they were endeavouring to disturb their deliberations, or to sow discord between the two Houses, Besides, that it would have been dangerous as well as unjust to dislodge that great city, by whom the charges of the war are chiefly borne, experience had shewn, that the city had infallible expedients to support their friends in the Parliament.

There was in the London petition another article of no less importance. A great many members of both Houses, had deserted the Parliament, before and after the beginning of the war. In the petition, therefore, was inserted an article, that none of the members who had deserted the Parliament should be received, without satisfaction first given to both Houses for their future fidelity. In pursuance of this desire it was declared soon after, by an ordinance, that such Peers as had deserted, or should desert the Parliament, should not be re-admitted without the consent of both Houses; and that whatsoever member of the House of Commons had so offended, or should so offend hereafter, and adhere to those that were levying war against the Parliament, were and should be absolutely disabled from sitting in the House of Commons. By this means, such as might intend to return to the Parliament for the King's service, had sufficient warning, that their artifice would be without effect.

In January 1643-4, the States-General of the United-Provinces sent Ambassadors into England, to offer their mediation, which the two Houses made no great account of, knowing what credit the Prince of Orange, the King's son-in-law, had in these provinces. Besides, the Ambassadors, who were all supposed to be the Prince of Orange's creatures, refused to acknowledge the two Houses of Westminster, for the Parliament of England. In short, these Ambassadors, after several journies to Oxford, and attempts to persuade the Parliament to accept their mediation, without the previous acknowledgment required, fully owned the two Houses for the Parliament of England, and presented a memorial to offer their mediation. It must be observed, this was the next day after the news of Prince Rupert's defeat at Marston-moor. As they had long delayed this acknowledgment, both Houses left them some time, in their turn, without any answer, being willing, doubtless, to intimate to them, that this mediation did not appear to them sufficiently impartial. Wherefore the 10th of December, they demanded a public audience, which was granted, and in which they offered again the mediation of their masters. Both Houses answered, that they readily accepted the mediation of the states: but nad already sent propositions to the King for a treaty of peace, of which they were to wait the success. That, moreover, the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, being united together by a solemn covenant, they could do nothing without the concurrence of the Scots, which would require some time.

In July it was ordered by the House of Commons, that the fine imposed by the Star-Chamber upon Mr. Denzil Holles, for his asserting the liberties of his country in Parliament, should be repaid him out of the King's revenue.

In October, an ordinance of both Houses was published, commanding, that no quarter should be given to any Irishman taken in arms against the Parliament.

In November, the Lord Macguire, and Mac Mahone, were brought upon their trials. They were apprehended, at Dublin, the very day they were to surprise the castle, and sent into England, where they had been confined in the Tower ever since. They had found means to break prison, and conceal themselves in a house in London. But unfortunately hearing a woman crying oysters in the street, one of them put his head out of window to call her, and was that instant espied by a servant of Sir John Clotworthy, who knew him, and immediately gave notice to the Lieutenant of the Tower. They were both seized again, and shortly after condemned and executed.

Since the famous William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, had been imprisoned at the end of the year 1640, we have had but little occasion to speak of him. It is time now to relate the catastrophe of his life. He was accused by the Commons of High-treason, December the 18th, 1640, and thereupon committed to the custody of the Black-Rod. The 26th of February following the articles of the impeachment were brought in against him, and then he was sent to the Tower. There he remained till October the 23d, 1643, when the Commons, having added ten fresh articles to the impeachment, he was ordered by the Lords to answer, the 30th of the same month. It would be too tedious to specify all the petitions he presented, and all the expedients, his council furnished him with, to cause his sentence to be deferred. It suffices to say, that he gained time till the 11th of November, 1644, on which day he spoke several hours together in his own defence.* But whether the Commons were afraid, their proofs were not sufficient for his condemnation, or the delays granted him by the Lords, gave them cause to think, they were inclined to save his life, they used the same method as in the case of the Earl of Strafford's; namely, a bill of attainder, which passed their House the same day the Archbishop made his defence before the Peers, with but one dissenting vote. The bill being sent to the Lords, they acquainted the Commons, that indeed they found the Archbishop guilty of the charge as to matters of fact, but desired some farther satisfaction in point of law, whether the matters amounted to treason. Whereupon the Commons communicated to them the reasons, whereby they pretended to prove him guilty of that crime. Upon which the Lords, the 4th of January, passed the bill of attainder, whereby it was ordained, he should suffer death as in cases of High-treason, and on the 6th, both Houses ordered he should be executed the 10th. On the 7th, the Lords, at a conference, informed the Commons of a pardon to the Archbishop from the King, dated the 12th of April, 1643, but it was over-ruled and rejected. The same day, the Archbishop seeing there was no remedy, petitioned the Lords, that the manner of his execution might be changed to beheading. He desired also, that some of his chaplains might be permitted to be with him before, and at, his death. The Lords very readily granted his two requests, but the Commons refused both, and sent him two ministers whom he did not ask for, with one of those he desired. The next day he presented a second petition to be beheaded, setting forth, that he was a Divine, Bishop, Privy-Counsellor, and Peer; whereupon the Commons were at length prevailed with. When he was upon the scaffold, he delivered a long speech, wherein, among other things, he insinuated, that he suffered for not forsaking the temple of God, to follow the bleatings of Jeroboam's calves, alluding to the schism of the Presbyterians. He said,—— "He had ransacked every corner of his heart, and thanked God, he had not found any sins there deserving death, by the known laws of the land. The King had been traduced by some for labouring to bring in popery, but, upon his conscience, he knew him to be as free from such a charge, as any man living, and held him to be as sound a Protestant, according to the religion established by law, as any person in the kingdom. He protested, he never endeavoured the subversion of the laws of the realm, nor never any change of the Protestant religion, into popish superstition. He had never been an enemy to the Parliaments, but did indeed dislike the mis-government of one or two——". After he had prayed, the executioner did his office at one blow. His friends were permitted to take his body and bury it in Alhallows-Barking-church. Such was the end of this famous prelate, who was one of the chief authors of the troubles that afflicted England; first, by supporting with all his power the arbitrary principles, which the court strove for several years to establish: secondly, by a too rigid observance of trifles in the Divine Service, and by compelling every one to conform thereto. All that can be said in his favour, is, that he believed in his own conscience, this rigidness was necessary.†

The same day the Lords passed the bill of attainder against the Archbishop, they passed likewise an ordinance, that the book of Common-Prayer should be laid aside, and the Directory established, which had been framed by the Assembly of Divines. Hereby the church of England was rendered, by public authority, completely Presbyterian, to the great satisfaction of the

* His trial lasted twenty days; beginning March 12, 1643-4, and ending July 29.

† The managers at his trial were, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Brown, Serjeant Wild, Mr. Nicholas, for the Commons; and his council were, Mr. Herne, and Mr. Chute. The sum of his charge was, "That he had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England, and instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary government." The chaplains he desired to have with him, were, Stern, Haywood, and Martin; those sent by the Commons, were, Stern, Marshal, and Palmer. He called his last speech a sermon, and began with a text, Heb. xii, 1, 2. In his printed defence, which he left behind him, he excuses himself in most particulars, by saying, that he was but one of many, who either in council, star chamber, or high commission, voted illegal things. His diary shows him to be superstitious, and a regarder of dreams. He was, in the main, a learned, sincere, and zealous man, humble in his private deportment, but withal, hot and indiscreet, eagerly pursuing trifles, as bowing to the communion table, sports on the Lord's day, &c. ——Among other works of piety and magnificence, this great prelate built a court at St. John's college Oxon: procured King Charles to give to the clergy in Ireland, all the impropriations then remaining in the crown: settled the impropriation of Cudsden on the Bishopric of Oxon: got Commendams annexed to the Bishoprics of the new foundation: obtained very ample charters for the universities of Oxford, and Dublin, and regulated the statutes of the former: founded an Arabic lecture at Oxford, and an hospital in Reading: set up a Greek press in London, &c.

Scots, and many of the principal members of both Houses.

As the King talked very much of the frequent offers, to persuade the people of his sincere desire of peace, and of the refusal of both Houses, they resolved to oblige him to explain more clearly, what he meant by peace, that the people might examine, whether he offered sufficient security.

During the campaign, it was no proper season for such a negotiation, by reason of the variety of accidents produced by the war. It was not till November the 20th, two days after the King's return to Oxford, that the two Houses sent him the propositions which had been prepared in the summer. They had sent to desire a safe-conduct for the commissioners, which the King had granted, but as to private persons, without one word to denote his considering them as the Parliament's commissioners. Though the two Houses were by no means pleased with such a safe-conduct, they accepted it and their commissioners repaired to Oxford, where the King arrived the day before. At the first audience, the King asked them, "Whether they had power to treat:" they answered, "No; their commission was only to receive his Majesty's answer in writing." The King replied, "Then a letter-carrier might have done as much as you." In all appearance, he had expected, that the two Houses would treat with him, without his owning them for the Parliament of England, in which he was much mistaken. He heard the propositions read with great attention and patience, and then receiving them from their hands, told them, he would give them his answer.

The Earl of Lindsey, who was with the King at Oxford, having sent his compliments to Holles and Whitelock, they two, with the consent of the rest of the commissioners, returned his civility by a visit. They found him indisposed, and in his bed; but he received them in presence of several Lords who were in his room. Presently after, the King came in, and had a long conference with them. He told them, "He knew that they were both desirous of a peace, and wished, that all the rest of the members were of their opinion; and therefore, says he, out of the confidence I have of you two, I ask your advice, what answer will be best for me to give at this time to your propositions, which may probably further such a peace, as all good men desire?" Whitelock answered, "The best and most satisfactory answer, I humbly believe, would be your Majesty's presence with your Parliament, and which I hope might be without danger to you." The King perceiving they did not care to speak their minds before so much company, said, "I desire you two to go into the next room, confer a little together, and set down in writing, what you apprehend may be fit for me to return in answer to your message." Whereupon they withdrew into another room, and by Holles's intreaty, Whitelock wrote down what was their sense in this matter, and what might be fit for the substance of the King's answer. But this he did, not in his usual hand, and without any name to it. The paper thus written being left upon the table, the King went in, and took it up immediately. No person was present, neither did the King admit any others to hear the discourse which passed between him and them. It was very extraordinary for these commissioners to confer in private with the King, unknown to their collegues, to whom they imparted nothing of what had passed between the King and them. Accordingly, shortly after, the Lord Savile, now made Earl of Sussex, who was in the Earl of Lindsey's room, when the King came in, and who returned afterwards to the Parliament, accused them publicly, of having held private conferences with the King. But as he was not able to prove what he advanced, the thing remained a secret, till Whitelock published it in his memorials, and even there we do not find the contents of the paper written with his own hand.*

The next day the King sent his answer sealed up to the commissioners; but they refused to receive it, unless they had a copy of it. The King denied it some time;† but at last gave them a copy. The substance of it was only to demand a safe-conduct for the Duke of Lenox and the Earl of Southampton, to carry his answer to the propositions. This paper was not directed to any person, nor the Parliament so much as named in it. They were prevailed with, however, on the supposition, that the two Houses would be at liberty to make what use of it they pleased. This paper being read at a conference of both Houses, the exceptions against the form and want of directions were highly debated; but at last, it was carried, to lay aside all objections, and ordered that the Earl of Essex should write to Prince Rupert to this effect: "That if his Majesty will send to the Parliament of England assembled at Westminster, and to the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, they would with all readiness grant a safe-conduct for the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton." The King was extremely loth to do this; but the affair being debated in his council, none opposed it but himself. Nevertheless, he could not be prevailed with, till after he was furnished with this expedient, to make a protestation against it in private, which should be recorded. After that, Prince Rupert's answer being worded as both Houses desired, the safe-conduct was sent to Oxford; and it was at length agreed that the commissioners of both parties should meet at Uxbridge: that the conferences should begin the 30th of January, 1644-5, and should last twenty days: that the propositions, as well on the King's as the Parliament's side, should be reduced to three heads, religion, the militia, and Ireland: that religion should be treated upon, three days together, then the militia three days more, and after that, Ireland, as many; which done, the affairs of religion should be resumed for three days, then the business of the militia, and lastly, Ireland for the same time. The King's commissioners were, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Kingston, the Earl of Chichester, and eleven others, among whom was Sir Edward Hyde, Chancellor of the Exchequer, afterwards Earl of Clarendon. Those for the Parliament were twelve in number, the chief whereof were the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Denbigh; and for Scotland the principal were, the Earl of Lowdon, the Lord Chancellor of Scotland, and the Marquis of Argyle. The King's propositions were in substance the same with those he had given at Oxford, without any alteration as to the sense. The Parliament's were not much different from the Oxford ones, but more large and full. However, it was soon found impracticable to come to any agreement. After a negotiation of eighteen days, the King's commissioners desired, that his Majesty's propositions, particularly those concerning the cessation of arms, and the King's return to the Parliament, might be considered. The other commissioners answered, that when the two Houses should see the treaty likely to succeed, they would consent to prolong it. The two remaining days were spent by the King's commissioners, in trying to obtain a prolongation of the treaty, but they could not prevail. It must be remembered, that the King's aim was to gain time, for two principal reasons. First, as he was persuaded, that as long as the people had any hopes of peace, they would not easily be induced to find the Parliament the necessary supplies for the continuation of the war, and so the preparations of the two Houses would be retarded. The second was, that he rightly judged, the Parliament would not seriously think of executing their project concerning the army, whilst there should be

* Whitelock, in his speech to the House, when accused by the Lord Savile, says, the King pressed very much the unreasonableness of the propositions, particularly those concerning religion and the militia; but he was told, that unless he would grant them, it would be in vain to treat of any peace.

† And told them, "What is the answer to you, who are but to carry what I send; and if I send the song of Robin Hood, and Little John, you must carry it?"

any expectation of peace. The two Houses perceiving the King's intention, avoided the snare, and the conferences broke off upon the expiration of the twenty days.*

The House of Commons, or rather, a new party which had been formed in the House, waited only for this rupture, to execute a project, of which it will be necessary to speak here somewhat largely, since the execution thereof served for foundation to all the events which afterwards happened.†

Before the Parliament was assisted by Scotland, the war had not been much to their advantage. The successes of the two first campaigns were so far from answering their expectations, that very probably, without the assistance of the Scots, they would have been forced to make such a peace as the King desired. If in the third, the King had lost all the north, he had made himself amends, by gaining almost all the western counties, and, after the second battle of Newbury, he was still at Oxford, in condition to withstand his enemies.

* Many of the King's friends, and particularly the Earl of Southampton, went post from Uxbridge to Oxford, to press the King again and again upon their knees, to yield to the necessity of the times; and by giving his assent to some of the most material propositions that were sent him, to settle a lasting peace with his people. The King was at last prevailed with to follow their counsel; and the next morning was appointed for signing a warrant to his commissioners to that effect. But when they came early next morning to wait on him, with the warrant agreed upon over-night, they found his Majesty had changed his resolution, and was become inflexible in these points. This alteration was occasioned by a confident letter, dated February 3, which his Majesty received, a few hours before he was to sign, from the Marquis of Montrose, giving an account of the Earl of Argyle's defeat, and dissuading his Majesty from treating with his rebel subjects; because, as the Marquis affirmed, "He doubted not, but before the end of the summer, he should be able to come to his Majesty's assistance with a brave army."

† The following interesting correspondence between Charles and his royal consort, which was found in his Majesty's cabinet at the battle of Naseby, fought a few months after, and which the Parliament ordered to be printed and published, will furnish the reader with a correct idea of the King's real feelings and wishes, on the subject of peace.

THE QUEEN TO THE KING.

Paris, Jan. 6. Dec. 27, 1644-5.

"I understand that the commissioners are arrived at London; I have nothing to say, but that you have a care of your honour, and that if you have a peace, it may be such as may hold; and if it fall out otherwise, that you do not abandon those who have served you, for fear they do forsake you in your need: also, I do not see how you can be in safety without a regiment of guards; for myself, I think I cannot be, seeing the malice which they have against me, and my religion, of which I hope you will have a care of both; but, in my opinion, religion should be the last thing upon which you should treat: for if you do agree upon strictness against the Catholics, it would discourage them to serve you; and if afterwards there should be no peace, you could never expect succours either from Ireland, or any other Catholic Prince, for they would believe you would abandon them, after you have served yourself."——

HIS MAJESTY'S LETTER TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, Dec. 1644.

"Know (as a certain truth) that all, even my party, are strangely impatient for peace, which obliged me so much the more, at all occasions, to shew my real intentions to peace; and likewise, I am put in very good hope, (some hold it a certainty) that if I should come to a fair treaty, the ring-leading rebels could not hinder me from a good peace: first, because their own party are most weary of the war, and likewise for the great distractions which at this time most assuredly are amongst themselves, as Presbyterians against Independents in religion, and General against General in point of command. Upon these grounds a treaty being most desirable, (not without hope of good success) the most probable means to procure it was to be used, which might stand with honour and safety. Amongst the rest, (for I will omit all those which are unquestionably concealable) the sound of my return to London, was thought to have so much force of popular rhetoric in it, that upon it a treaty would be had, or if refused, it would bring much prejudice to them, and be advantageous to me; yet, lest foolish or malicious people should interpret this, as to proceed from fear or folly, I have joined conditions with the proposition (without which this sound will signify nothing) which thou wilt find to be most of the chief ingredients of an honourable and safe peace. Then observe, if a treaty at London, with commissions for both sides, may be had without it, it is not to be used, nor in case they will treat with no body but myself; so that the conditions save any aspersion of dishonour, and the treating at London, the malignity which our factious spirits here may infuse into this treaty upon this subject. This I hope will secure thee from the trouble, which otherwise may be caused by false malicious rumours; and though I judge myself secure in thy thoughts, from suspecting me guilty of any baseness, yet I held this account necessary, to the end thou may make others know, as well as thyself, this certain truth, that no danger of death or misery (which I think much worse) shall make me do any thing unworthy of thy love.——I conclude, by conjuring thee, as thou lovest me, that no appearance of peace, nor hopeful conditions of mine, make thee neglect to hasten succour for him, who is eternally thine."

TO THE QUEEN.

Jan. 1, 1644.

"I shall now tell thee, that the rebels are engaged into an equal treaty,——and that the distractions of London were never so great, or so likely to bring good effects as now. Lastly, that assistance was never more needful, never so likely as now to do good to him, who is eternally thine."

TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, Jan. 2, 1644.

"——As for my calling those at London a Parliament, I shall refer thee to Digby for particular satisfaction; this is in general: if there had been but two (besides myself) of my opinion, I had not done it; and the argument that prevailed with me was, that the calling did no ways acknowledge them to be a Parliament. Upon which condition and construction I did it, and no otherwise, and according it is registered in the council books, with the council's unanimous approbation."——

TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, Jan. 22, 1644.

"——I believe thou wilt approve of my choice of treators; and for my propositions, they differ nothing in substance (very little in words) from those which were last.

"Now upon the whole matter, I desire thee to shew the Queen and ministers there, the improbability that this present treaty should produce a peace, considering the great strange difference, (if not contrariety) of grounds that are betwixt the rebels' propositions and mine, and that I cannot alter mine, nor will they ever theirs, until they be out of hope to prevail by force, which a little assistance by thy means will soon make them so; for I am confident, if ever I could put them to a defensive (which a reasonable sum of money would do) they would be easily brought to reason."

THE QUEEN TO THE KING.

MY DEAR HEART, Paris, Jan. 27, 1644.

"Tom Elliot, two days since, hath brought me much joy and sorrow; the first to know the good estate in which you are, the other, the fear I have that you go to London. I cannot conceive where the wit was of those who gave you this counsel, unless it be to hazard your person, to save theirs: but thanks be to God, to day I received one of yours by the Ambassador of Portugal, dated in January, which comforted me much to see that the treaty shall be at Uxbridge. For the honour of God, trust not yourself in the hands of these people; and if you ever go to London, before the Parliament be ended, or without a good army, you are lost. I understand that the propositions for the peace must begin by disbanding the army; if you consent to this, you shall be lost, they having the whole power of the militia, they have done and will do whatsoever you will. I received yesterday letters from the Duke of Lorraine, who sends me word, if his service be agreeable to you, he will bring you ten thousand men. Dr. Goffe, whom I have sent into Holland, shall treat with him in his passage upon this business, and I hope very speedily to send good news of this, as also of the money; assure yourself, I will be wanting in nothing you shall desire, and that I will hazard my life, that is, to die by famine, rather than not to send to you. Send me word always by whom you receive my letters; for I write both by the ambassador of Portugal, and the resident of France: above all, have a care not to abandon those who have served you, as well the Bishops, as the poor Catholics. Adieu."——

THE KING TO THE QUEEN.

Jan. 30.

"The treaty begins this day. I desire thee to be confident, that I shall never make a peace by abandoning my friends, nor such a one as will not stand with my honour and safety."

TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, Feb. $\frac{11}{21}$, 1644.

"As for our treaty, there is every day less hopes than other, that it would produce a peace, but I will absolutely promise thee, that if we have one, it shall be such as shall invite thy return; for I vow, that without thy company I can neither have peace nor comfort within myself. The limited days for treating are now almost expired, without the least agreement upon any one article; wherefore I have sent for enlargement of days, that the whole treaty may be laid open to the world; and I assure thee, that thou needest not doubt the issue of this treaty, for my commissioners are so well chosen, (though I say it) that they will neither be threatened nor disputed from the grounds I have given them, which, upon my word, is according to the little thou so well rememberest, and in this not only their obedience, but their judgment concur.

"In short, there is little or no appearance, but that this summer will be the hottest for war of any that hath been yet; and be confident, that in making peace, I shall ever shew my constancy in adhering mies. The Scotch army, which having subdued all the north, was advancing towards the middle of the kingdom, was therefore what made the balance incline to the Parliament's side, and what, probably, was to give them the superiority in the fourth campaign, for which both sides were preparing. This aid came very seasonably, to establish the affairs of the Presbyterians, who were then all-powerful in the Parliament, and disposed of every thing as they pleased. They were the men who had most conduced to engage the kingdom in a war, and called in the Scots, because they could not hope to execute their designs, unless the Parliament's arms were victorious. But before we proceed, it will be absolutely necessary to make known these Presbyterians, who till then seemed to make but one and the same party, though in reality they consisted of two, very different from each other, both in principles and interests.

It is difficult to discover precisely, the first rise of the Independent sect or faction. Thus much is certain, their principles were very proper to put the kingdom in a flame. With regard to the state, they abhorred monarchy, and approved only a republican government. As to religion, their principles were contrary to those of all the rest of the world. They not only were averse to episcopacy, and the ecclesiastical hierarchy; but would not so much as endure ordinary ministers in the church. They maintained, that every man might pray in public, exhort his brethren, interpret the Scriptures, according to the talents, God had endued him with; whereas very often ministers were ordained without proper endowments, whilst those of many lay-men remained useless for want of external ordination. So, with them, every one prayed, preached, admonished, interpreted the Holy Scriptures, without any other call than what he himself drew from his zeal, and supposed gifts, and without any other authority than the approbation of his auditors.*

The Independents, after having lent their utmost assistance to diminish the regal-power, in hopes thereby to attain their end, the destruction of the monarchy; perceived at last, they should not be able, without great difficulty, to accomplish their design. The reason was, because neither the English, nor the Scotch, Presbytarians, had any inclination to establish a commonwealth, and because their whole clergy, who had a great influence in that party, were of the same principles. They judged therefore, it would be very advantageous to them, to destroy the clergy's authority, by intimating them to be unnecessary, and their vocation established upon no good foundation. Then it was that the Independent sect began to be formed with regard to religion; for there are no signs of it, till about the end of the year, 1644.

It is no wonder therefore, that from the beginning of this Parliament, the Independents had earnestly contributed to put it out of the King's power to preserve his authority but by a war, and to ruin the church of England. It is rather to be considered, that this was the natural consequence of their principles, and a very proper means to lead them to their end. The humbling of the King, and the destruction of the church of England, were two points that were necessarily to be gained, before the establishment of a commonwealth was endeavoured. It was not therefore proper, they should separate from the Presbyterians, as long as these last concurred with them in their design to gain these two points. For that reason, they readily consented to call in the Scots, and made no scruple to approve of the covenant, and whatever else was required by the Scots. The business then was to be able to resist the King, who had acquired some superiority, by the happy success of his arms. This was the common interest of the Presbyterians and Independents, who would have been equally ruined, if the King's party had prevailed.

Meanwhile, the Scotch army, in strengthening alike the Presbyterians and Independents against the King, hering to Bishops, and all our friends, and not forget to put a short period to this perpetual Parliament. But as thou lovest me, let none persuade thee to slacken thine assistance for him, who is eternally thine."

---

C. R.

TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, Feb. 19, 1644.

"I cannot yet send thee any certain word concerning the issue of the treaty, only the unreasonable stubbornness of the rebels gives daily less and less hopes of any accommodation this way; wherefore I hope no rumours shall hinder thee from hastening, all thou may, all possible assistance to me, and particularly that of the Duke of Lorraine's, concerning which I received yesterday good news from Dr. Goffe, that the Prince of Orange will furnish shipping for his transportation, and that the rest of his negotiations go hopefully on.

"As for trusting the rebels, either by going to London, or disbanding my army before a peace, do no ways fear my hazarding so cheaply or foolishly; for I esteem the interest thou hast in me at a far dearer rate, and pretend to have a little more wit."

TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, March 5, 1644.

"Now is come to pass what I foresaw, the fruitless end (as to the present peace) of this treaty, but I am still confident, that I shall have very good effects of it: for besides that my commissioners have offered, to say no more, full-measured reason, and the rebels have stucken rigidly to their demands, which I dare say had been too much, though they had taken me prisoner, so that assuredly the breach would light foully upon them. We have likewise at this time discovered, and shall make it evidently appear to the world, that the English rebels (whether basely or ignorantly will be no very great difference) have, as much as in them lies, transmitted the command of Ireland from the crown of England to the Scots, which besides the reflection it will have upon these rebels, will clearly shew, that reformation of the church is not the chief, much less the only end of the Scotch rebellion.

"But it being presumption, and no piety, so to trust to a good cause, as not to use all lawful means to maintain it; I have thought of one means more to furnish thee with for my assistance, than hitherto thou hast had; it is, that I give thee power to promise in my name (to whom thou thinkest most fit,) that I will take away all the penal laws against the Roman Catholics in England, as soon as God shall make me able to do it, so as by their means, or in their favours, I may have so powerful assistance as may deserve so great a favour, and enable me to do it. But if thou ask what I call that assistance, I answer, that when thou knowest what may be done for it, it will be easily seen if it deserve to be so esteemed. I need not tell thee what secrecy this business requires; yet this I will say, that this is the greatest point of confidence I can express to thee, for it is no thanks to me to trust thee in any thing else but in this, which is the only thing of difference in opinion betwixt us: and yet I know thou wilt make as good a bargain for me, even in this, I trusting thee (though it concerns religion) as if thou wert a Protestant, the visible good of my affairs so much depending on it.

TO THE QUEEN.

DEAR HEART, Oxford, March 13, O. S.

"What I told thee the last week concerning a good parting with our Lords and Commons here, was on Monday last handsomely performed; and now if I do any thing unhandsome or disadvantageous to myself or friends in order to a treaty, it will be merely my own fault; for I confess, when I wrote last, I was in fear to have been pressed to make some mean overtures to renew the treaty, (knowing there were great labouring to that purpose;) but now I promise thee, if it be renewed, (which I believe will not, without some eminent good success on my side) it shall be to my honour and advantage, I being now as well freed from the place of base and mutinous motions, (that is to say, our mungrel Parliament here) as of the chief causers, from whom I may justly expect to be chidden by thee, for having, suffered thee to be vexed by them; Wilmot being already there, Percy on his way, and Sussex within few days taking his journey to thee."

* The Independents, called at first Congregationalists, owed their rise chiefly to Goodwin, Nye, Bridge, Sympson, and Burroughs, who transported themselves into Holland for liberty of conscience. From whence, upon the downfall of Episcopacy, they returned to England, and addressed the Parliament with an Apologetical narrative for disturbance and toleration. In this apology they declare, that "they consulted the Scriptures without any prepossessions: they look upon the word of Christ as impartially and unprejudicedly as men of flesh and blood are like to do in any juncture of time, they having no temptation to any bias." As to church government, they said, they confined themselves to Scripture, Precept, and Precedent, leaving room for alterations upon farther inquiry. Pursuant to these grounds they held a middle course between Presbytery and Brownism. The first they counted too arbitrary, the other too loose. Their main characteristic was, the disallowing parochial and provincial subordinations, and forming all their congregations upon a scheme of co-ordinacy. As to the manner of their service, they prayed publicly for Kings and all in authority: they read the Scriptures, and expounded the lessons upon proper occasions: they administered the sacraments: they sung psalms, and made collections for the poor every Lord's day, their public officers were pastors, teachers, ruling elders, (which were ecclesiastics) and deacons. As for church-censures, they had none but admonition and excommunication. The five above-mentioned independents, were all or most of them members of the assembly of Divines. Rapin seems to confound them with the Brownists. They were called Independents, from their declaring against the dependency of the churches. Which, as is said above, was their main characteristic.

confirmed withal to the first, the superiority they had for some time employed. As long as the superiority lasted, it was almost impossible for the Independents to attain their ends. They judged it therefore absolutely necessary, to undermine the great power of the Presbyterians, not openly, for fear of being oppressed before they had laid their measures, but secretly, and by artifice. To that purpose, the leaders of this party, as Vane, Cromwell, Tate, Haslerig, and some others, began to make themselves very popular, and to express a great zeal for the public, in order to gain the goodwill of the people. They had their emissaries every where, who diligently aggravated the faults committed since the beginning of the war, as well in the administration of the government, as in the military actions, and insinuated, they were entirely to be ascribed to the private views of members of Parliament, who, possessing all the places and offices, were very unmindful to put an end to the troubles. That some of the Generals had designedly missed opportunities of fighting with advantage, and that, in a word, the greatest part dreaded nothing so much as a decision, either by arms or a good peace.

In support of these rumours which were spread abroad, Cromwell came to the Parliament at the end of the campaign, and publicly accused the Earl of Manchester, of not having done his duty at the battle of Newbury, and the affair of Dennington castle; insinuating a too speedy end of the war. The Earl answered by a memorial, which he presented to the Lords, and Cromwell thought not fit to prosecute his accusation, which was properly a preparative only to begin the execution of a greater project.

This public proceeding of Cromwell raised a suspicion, that he was one of the principal authors of the rumours which tended to render the people jealous of the Parliament. There was even a conference held at the Earl of Essex's, where it was considered, whether he should be arrested. But as the proofs appeared not sufficiently clear, it was resolved to wait till he should have laid himself more open. Probably, some of those who were present at this conference informed him of it, which made him hasten the execution of the project formed by himself and his friends.

This project was to exclude all the members of Parliament from enjoying any office or command military or civil. It is certain, that from the beginning of the war, the Parliament, in the distribution of posts, had not forgotten their own members, or rather, to say the truth, all the principal posts were possessed by the members of one or the other House. Hence sprung two great inconveniencies. The first, that as, since the breach with the King, the two Houses had ruled with an absolute sway, the members who had posts in the army, had so great influence there, that no man durst oppose their sentiments, or take notice of their faults and misdemeanors, which by that means were always unpunished. This had at length bred at the end of the last campaign those great dissentions between the Generals, which proved so prejudicial to the common cause. The second inconvenience was, that it was undeniably the particular interest of the members of Parliament to prolong the war; since the end of the troubles, whether it happened by a decisive battle or treaty, would strip them of their employ. This project was therefore founded upon reasons very plausible, and apt to make impression on the people. But withal, it was of great advantage to the Independents, in that the power of the Presbyterian party would be considerably lessoned, and they had so well laid their measures, that they were almost sure, the vacant posts would be filled with men of their party. This was the more feasible, as hitherto the Independents not having yet pulled off the mask, it was not easy to discover who were so, since they were still confounded with the Presbyterians.

To execute this grand project, the leaders of the Independents resolved to move two things in the Parliament. The first, to put the army under a new model; that is, to form new regiments of horse and foot out of the present troops, so that these would be still the same officers and soldiers, but new bodies otherways composed than before. The second, that the Parliament should pass an ordinance excluding the members of either House from enjoying or executing any office or command civil or military. The first was founded upon the necessity of putting an end to all factions and cabals, which might be formed in the several bodies of the army; the second, upon the necessity of demonstrating to the people, that the Parliament was not influenced by private views, but preferred the public good to the interest of their own members. But the Presbyterian members thereby lost at once all their posts and credit in the army. This was the true reason of the proceedings of the Independents, which however they carefully concealed. The other reasons were so plausible, that they did not question they would be very agreeable to the people, who were already disposed to approve them. And therefore it was thought, several members would not venture to contradict them, for fear of raising a suspicion of their acting from motives of interest.

On the 9th of December 1644, these motions were made in the House of Commons, at the time when the treaty of Uxbridge was preparing. The managers of the affair,* moved to take into consideration the state of the kingdom, the reasons why the war lasted so long; and the consequences of the treaty of Uxbridge, should it prove unsuccessful. This motion being approved, the House voted themselves into a grand committee, to debate upon these points. A general silence being kept for some time, Oliver Cromwell stood up at last, and spoke briefly to this effect:

"That it was now a time to speak, or for ever to hold the tongue: the important occasion being no less than to save a nation out of a bleeding, nay, almost dying condition, which the long continuance of the war had already brought it into; so that, without a more speedy, vigorous, and effectual prosecution of the war, casting off all lingering proceedings like soldiers of fortune beyond sea, to spin out a war, we shall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a Parliament. For what do the enemy say? Nay, what do many say that were friends at the beginning of the Parliament? Even this, that the members of both Houses have got great places and commands, and the sword into their hands, and what by interest in Parliament, and what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themselves in grandeur, and not permit the war speedily to end, lest their own power should determine with it. This I speak here to our own faces, is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any; I know the worth of those commanders, members of both Houses, who are yet in power; but if I may speak my conscience without reflection upon any, I do conceive, if the army be not put into another method, and the war more vigorously prosecuted, the people can bear the war no longer, and will enforce you to a dishonourable peace. But this I would recommend to your prudence, not to insist upon any complaint or oversight of any commander in chief upon any occasion whatsoever; for as I must acknowledge myself guilty of over-sights, so I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs; therefore waving a strict enquiry into the causes of these things, let us apply ourselves to the remedy which is most necessary. And I hope, we have such true English hearts and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother-country, as no members of either House will scruple to deny themselves, and their own private interests, for the public good; nor account it to be a dishonour done to them, whatever the Parliament shall resolve upon in this weighty matter."

Cromwell was seconded by others who spoke, like him, in a general manner, without making any particular

* The exclusion of the members from all offices, was moved first by Mr. Zouch Tate, who brought it in with a similitude of a boyle upon his thumb; and was set on by that party, who contrived the turning out of the Earl of Essex. He was seconded by Sir Henry Vane and others.

ticular proposition. At last Zouch Tate and Sir Henry Vane moved expressly to have all members of Parliament excluded from commands and offices. This motion was long debated, and at length approved by a majority of voices, and a committee was appointed to prepare an ordinance to that purpose. Two days after, this ordinance was brought into the House, and it was resolved, that the 18th of the same month should be set apart for a fast, to implore a blessing on this affair, as well as on the intended new model of the army, which had been also voted, though we could not find the day. The 14th of December this ordinance was again taken into consideration, and canvassed in a grand committee very seriously on both sides. The 18th the fast was kept, and the 19th the ordinance passed the House of Commons. It was called "The Self-denying ordinance," because the House in passing it, renounced their own advantages.

The affair however was not finished till the Lords had approved of the ordinance, to which they were by no means inclined. On the contrary, at a conference with the Commons, they urged several reasons against it. Whereupon, the 13th of January, the whole House of Commons went up to the Peers with a message to press them to pass the self-denying ordinance. Nevertheless they rejected it that same day.

Notwithstanding this, the Commons proceeded in forming a new model of the army, which they voted should consist, in the whole, of one-and-twenty thousand men, namely, six thousand horse, one thousand dragoons, and fourteen thousand foot: that the horse shall be divided into ten regiments; the dragoons into ten single companies; and the foot into ten regiments of at least twelve hundred men each. After that, they appointed Sir Thomas Fairfax to be general, son to the Lord Fairfax who commanded in the north. This done they passed an ordinance for raising money for the maintenance of the army which was to serve under the command of the new General, and on the 28th of January sent it up to the Lords for their concurrence.* The Lords scrupled to consent to several articles concerning the nomination of the principal officers. But as there were but few Peers, they were told, they would do themselves unspeakable prejudice if they pretended to oppose the resolutions of the Commons, and in short, that their concurrence was not necessary. In all appearance, this at length made the Lords pass the ordinance, without any amendments.

The 19th of February Sir Thomas Fairfax, being conducted to the House by four members, was complimented by the Speaker. After that, he delivered a list of the Colonels he had appointed, by virtue of a clause in his commission, among whom there was not a single member of Parliament. There was also upon this occasion some difference between the two Houses. But after several conferences, the Lords approved of the list the 18th of March.

A. D. 1645.] Thus the new model was compleated, and though the self-denying ordnance had been thrown out by the Lords, the Commons had now obtained, by empowering the general to nominate the officers of the army, the exclusion of the members of Parliament from all military posts. This made them hope, it would not be impossible to cause their ordinance to pass. And indeed, they resumed the debate of it, March 24, and on the 31st, it was sent up to the Lords for their consent, though they had already refused it. Then, the Earls of Essex, Denbigh, and Manchester perceiving it would be in vain to strive against the stream, and that their House was not in condition to withstand the Commons, surrendered their commissions, and received the thanks of both Houses.† The next day, the 3d of April, the Lords passed the self-denying ordinance; and thus ended this affair, which had been depending four months.‡

As soon as Sir Thomas Fairfax had received his commission from the Parliament, he came to Windsor, his head quarters, and from thence sent commissioners wherever there were troops, to form the new regiments, and disband the supernumerary officers. No doubt, these commissioners, who were mostly general officers, they were either to continue or break, and Cromwell had framed in great measure these instructions, though he did not appear to be concerned. The Parliament undertook this reform in a very dangerous season. It was in April, when the King was preparing to take the field. If, unhappily, they had met with resistance in the troops, as many were apprehensive, and if this change had occasioned revolts, which might easily have happened by the instigations of the disbanded officers, they would have been without an army, at the beginning of a campaign, and consequently unable to withstand the King's forces. But they heard with pleasure, that every thing was effected with great tranquillity, and their orders every where perfectly obeyed.

The General remained at Windsor all April, not being able sooner to finish what was to be done, to prepare the army for action. During this time, he received a letter from the committee of both kingdoms, informing him, that the King had sent to Prince Rupert, to come and join him with two thousand horse. Wherefore, he was ordered to dispatch a party of horse towards Oxford to hinder this junction. And as the self-denying ordinance was not to take place till after

* This was to be done by the monthly sum of 44,955*l.* to be raised by assessment proportionably throughout the kingdom, every county being rated at a certain sum.

† And to sweeten the Earl of Essex, (as Whitelock expresses it,) an order was made for the better payment of 10,000*l.* per annum, formerly granted to him out of delinquents estates. Here ended (says Whitelock) the first scene of our tragic civil wars, in the exit of this brave person Essex, who being set aside, and many gallant men his officers with him, the King's party looked upon the new army, and new officers, with much contempt, and the new model was by them in scorn called the new Noddle.

‡ When it is considered, with what earnestness the Commons proceeded in the self-denying ordinance, we are apt at first to believe, either that the number of the Independents was very superior in the House, or that the members were very disinterested. But neither of these was the case. The Presbyterians ever preserved a superiority of number, which became still greater by the members excluded from their posts, who not being employed in the army or elsewhere, increased their party in the Parliament. As to the disinterestedness of the members, it is not to be imagined, that men who had till now expressed such a greediness, as to monopolise, and ingross to themselves all the places of trust and profit, should thus suddenly change from black to white, and sincerely desire to relinquish them. But the case was, they were attacked on their weak side, and so could vindicate themselves only by showing a disinterestedness, which might at least make it doubtful, whether it was through selfishness that they had engrossed to themselves all the offices and posts. The Independents, before they discovered their design, had taken care to prepossess the people with plausible reasons, that the Parliament was in danger of being entirely deserted, if they undertook to justify their conduct, and maintain their partiality. This certainly was what caused the ordinance to pass, though it was manifestly designed to ruin the Presbyterian party. For though their superiority of number in the Parliament did not cease, the Independents knew, that by having the army on their side, it would be in their power to obey the Parliament no farther than they pleased. Accordingly to this they bent all their endeavours, as soon as things were regulated as they had projected. The new general was reckoned a zealous Presbyterian, and by that the Parliament had been allured to chuse him. But Cromwell had such an influence over him, that he made him do whatever he pleased. He had artfully persuaded him, that his sole view was the welfare of religion, and the good of his country, and thereby prepared him to receive his counsels, and place an entire confidence in him. For though the Independent party began to show themselves very openly, they did not yet pretend to form a separate party from that of the Presbyterians, and it was more than a year before they appeared entirely unmasked. Cromwell especially, more than any other of this party, put on the appearance of a rigid Presbyterian, and seemed to intend only the firm establishment of Presbyterianism. This was necessary to preserve the confidence of the new general, and make him act according to his views, without discovering the end to which he meant to conduct him. But it was not yet time to make known his designs. There were then but two things absolutely necessary for the advantage of his party. The first, in new modeling the army, to order it so, that the officers, whom the Independents thought they could confide in, might keep their commissions, and those whom they considered as their enemies, might be cashiered. For as three armies were to be reduced into one, many officers would of course be dismissed. The second thing was, to prosecute the war more vigorously than hitherto, and endeavour more strenuously to disable the King to maintain it. It is evident, the designs of the independents could be executed but by the King's destruction. This was necessarily to be supposed, and consequently all risques were to be run to put a speedy conclusion to the war, as nothing could be more prejudicial to them than its continuation.

forty days, namely, on the 13th of May, the charge of this service was by the committee particularly recommended to Lieutenant-General Cromwell.

Cromwell departing from Windsor the 24th of April, met, near Islip-bridge, with a brigade of the King's horse, consisting of the Queen's, and three other regiments, and utterly routed them.* Then he marched to Sir Thomas Coggin's at Blechington, where Colonel Windebank, Secretary Windebank's son, kept a garrison for the King, and summoned the Colonel with a sharp message, who immediately surrendered. The King was so incensed at his cowardice, that he caused him to be condemned by a council of war, and afterwards shot to death. Cromwell gained some other advantages in those parts, but was repulsed in an assault upon Farrington.

After the Earl of Essex's disaster in Cornwall, the Parliament was very weak in the western counties. They had in Dorsetshire only Pool, Lyme, and Weymouth; in Devonshire, Plymouth alone, and that besieged, and in Somersetshire, only Taunton, closely invested by Sir Richard Greenvil, and in great distress. The Parliament, fearing to lose this important place, sent express orders to the General to march with his whole army, and raise the siege, not considering that the midland counties would be left defenceless, just as the King was going to take the field. Meanwhile, Fairfax, in obedience to the orders, began his march, the 30th of April, and on the 7th of May was beyond Salisbury.

The committee of both kingdoms having intelligence, that the King was on the 7th of May to head his army, perceived their error in sending all their forces into the west, and leaving the middle of the kingdom defenceless. Wherefore they dispatched with all speed an order to the general, which reached him at Blandford, to return, and send only a party to relieve Taunton. The General immediately obeyed, and detaching Colonel Welden with about five thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse to Taunton, returned back to Newbury, where he stayed some days to refresh his troops.

At the approach of the party sent to Taunton, Sir Richard Greenvil raised the siege of that place, where relief could not come more seasonably, so much was it pressed. But shortly after, General Goring came into Somersetshire with three thousand horse, given him by the King, when he heard Fairfax was marching to the west. Then, Greenvil joining him, they went together and laid siege again to Taunton, where the party that relieved the town were shut up.

During these motions of the Parliament forces, the King, on the 7th of May, took the field, and marched with about eight thousand men towards Chester, to relieve the place, besieged by Sir William Brereton. But he heard by the way, the siege was raised; and having nothing more to do there, marched to Leicester, which he took by storm the 30th of May.

Meantime, the Parliament perceiving the King was marching towards Chester, sent orders to General Fairfax to besiege Oxford. Accordingly Fairfax approached the city, and began the siege. But within a few days, the Parliament having intelligence of the taking of Leicester, were apprehensive, the King's design was to enter the associated eastern counties, and therefore ordered their General to raise the siege of Oxford, and follow the King. Fairfax therefore marched away on the 7th of June. As, very likely, a battle would quickly ensue, he wrote to desire the Parliament to dispense with Cromwell's absence from the House, and to order him to march to the army, and command the horse, which was readily granted. Thus, Cromwell who had been one of the most forward to pass the ordinance for the exclusion of the members of Parliament from all offices and posts, civil and military, was the only person that kept his seat in Parliament, and his command in the army. This would be a very honourable distinction for him, were there not room to suspect, it was owing to his own intrigues.

Meanwhile, the King was very uneasy. He was informed of the siege of Oxford, but did not yet know it was raised, and that the enemy was marching directly towards him. This made him resolve to move towards Oxford, in order to relieve a city of so great importance to him. To that end, he encamped at Harborough, whence he sent an express to General Goring, to order him to come and join him with all possible speed. Here it was he received intelligence, that Fairfax was drawn off from Oxford, and had been repulsed with great loss, in an assault upon Borstal house. His troops, as was usual with them, were so elated at this news, that they imagined the enemies to be in the utmost consternation, which ought to be improved by immediately giving them battle. The King himself was prepossessed with this notion, which made him contemn his enemies, and unfortunately induced him to advance to Daventry in Northamptonshire, in a belief it would always be in his power to fight when he pleased, and that his enemies would never dare to attack him. Otherwise, he might have retired to Leicester, and there quietly expected the three thousand men, Colonel Gerrard was to bring him from Wales, and Goring's three thousand horse from the west. As to Goring, an accident happened, which very much conduced to hasten a battle. Fairfax had sent a man to Oxford, who pretending to serve the King, had managed so artfully, that secretary Nicholas had entrusted him with a packet to General Goring, who was before Taunton. This man having discharged his commission, Goring thought he could not employ, to carry a letter to the King, a more trusty messenger than the person sent to him by Secretary Nicholas. He gave him therefore a letter for the King, wherein he told his Majesty, that he hoped to be master of Taunton in a short time, conjuring him not to engage, but to stand upon the defensive, for he did not question, in twelve or fourteen days to join him with the forces under his command. The King knew nothing of this letter which was brought to Fairfax. But it convinced the Parliament Generals of the absolute necessity of fighting, before this aid should come to the King.

Pursuant to this resolution, Fairfax continued to advance towards the King, who being better informed of the number and designs of his enemies, resolved to retire to Leicester. To that purpose, he began to march towards Harborough, where his van arrived, whilst the rest of the army was yet above two miles behind. That same night, he heard, the enemies were within six miles of Harborough, and indeed General Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, had now fallen upon some of the King's quarters, and taken several prisoners. Whereupon it was resolved at a council of war, held in the night, to march back and meet the enemy, considering the impossibility of going to Leicester, without exposing the rear to certain destruction. So, the King returning in the morning, the 14th of June, met the Parliamentarians, who upon news of his march, had drawn up near Naseby. Here was fought the fatal battle which decided the quarrel between the King and the Parliament.

Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the King's army, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left. Sir Jacob Astley † led the main body of the foot, and the King was at the head of the reserve of horse. On the Parliament's side, the right wing of horse was commanded by Cromwell, the left by Ireton. General Fairfax, and Major-General Skippon, were both at the head of the main body, the first on the right, and the other on the left.

Prince Rupert began with charging the left wing, commanded by Ireton, and after a long conflict, wherein he met with great resistance, broke that body of horse, put them to flight, and chased them almost to Naseby town.‡ In his return, he lost some time in trying to become master of the Parliament's artillery. He even summoned the train, but, they being well defended with fire locks, and a rear guard, and he without foot, he could not execute his design.

* Her Majesty's standard was taken, with two hundred prisoners.

† Lately created Lord Astley of Reading.

‡ Ireton had his horse killed under him, was run through the thigh, wounded in the face with a pike, and made prisoner, but found means to escape upon the turn of the battle.

At the same time, Cromwell was engaged in a very obstinate fight with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, but at length the King's horse took to flight, and were pursued about a quarter of a mile. After that, Cromwell leaving a party of horse to oppose the King's, in case they should rally, returned with speed to the field of battle, where his assistance was very much wanted by his friends.

The Parliament's foot were engaged with the King's, and began to be pressed in such a manner, that they were in great disorder. Cromwell, who was returned victorious, changed the face of the battle, by charging the King's infantry in flank, who could not stand so vigorous an attack. Fairfax and Skippon took advantage of this assistance to rally their troops, who had been roughly used at the beginning of the battle,* and at last, the King's foot were so routed, that there was no possibility of rallying them.

In the meantime, the Prince not being yet returned from the chace, the King was, with his reserve of horse, unable to charge Cromwell, who was stronger than himself, and was also re-joined by the party he had left behind. As soon as Prince Rupert was returned with his victorious horse, and had joined the reserve, the King used his utmost endeavours to persuade them to charge once more the enemy's horse, not questioning, that if he could put them to rout, he should afterwards easily vanquish the foot. But he could not prevail with them to make a second charge.† Fairfax, Skippon, and Cromwell, without losing time in pursuing the King's dispersed infantry, had speedily rallied their troops. They faced the King's horse, and prepared to receive, or to charge them. So, to renew the fight, the King must, with one single wing of horse, and his small body of reserve, have fallen upon the enemies army, which wanted only the wing that was routed. This the cavaliers clearly perceived, and was what hindered them from obeying the King's orders. At the same time, an accident happened, which induced them to take to flight, or furnished them with a pretence. The Earl of Carnewarth, seeing the King, notwithstanding the unwillingness of his own troops, bent upon charging the enemies, rode up to him and said, "Sir, will you go upon your death in an instant?" And withal, laying hold of the King's bridle, turned his horse to the right. The King's cavalry seeing his Majesty's horse turned, without knowing the cause, took occasion to disband, and rode upon the spur without looking behind them. So, the King was also forced to retire, and leave his enemies masters of the field.‡ All his infantry were so dispersed, that the enemies took as many prisoners as they pleased. He lost his whole train of artillery, all his bag and baggage, with his cabinet, wherein were his most secret papers and letters, which the Parliament were so cruel, as to print and publish, particularly his letters to the Queen concerning the treaty of Uxbridge, of which the reader has seen some extracts. After this, he was never more able to bring a considerable army into the field. It is said, there were not slain on the King's side above six hundred men, but amongst them were more than one hundred and fifty officers; and besides, the enemy took above five thousand prisoners.

The King, and Prince Rupert, that same day retreated by Leicester to Ashby de la Zouch, whence, after a few hours' refreshment, they continued their march with their horse in very great disorder to Hereford, where they parted. Prince Rupert hastened to Bristol, to prepare the city for a siege, there being great likelihood, it would quickly be attacked. The King retired into Wales, and made some stay at Ragland castle, not despairing of being able to form another army in those parts. The reason is unknown, why he was bent, contrary to all appearance, upon raising a new army in Wales, and the neighbouring counties, instead of marching into the west with his horse, where he had a strong body of troops, under the command of Goring and Greenvil, with which he might have long continued the war.

Meanwhile, Fairfax advanced towards Leicester, which surrendered by capitulation, four days after the battle of Naseby. Then, he marched with all speed to the west, where it was very necessary to lead the army, as well to relieve Taunton and the party there shut up, as to reduce to the obedience of the Parliament the western counties, which were all for the King. At the approach of the army, Goring raised the siege of Taunton, and in a few days was defeated by Fairfax at Langport, who killed many of his men, took twelve hundred horses, and fourteen hundred prisoners.§ This victory was followed with the taking of Bridgewater, Bath, and Sherburn, after which, Fairfax laid siege to Bristol.

It was universally expected, Prince Rupert would, according to custom, perform wonders in the defence of this city, which was strongly garrisoned and well stored with provisions and ammunition. The Prince himself had sent the King word, he hoped to hold out at least four months. Yet, the Parliament army approaching the lines drawn about the place, and repulsing several sallies, the Prince, upon the first summons, agreed to capitulate. Fairfax came near the lines the 23d of August, and the capitulation was signed the 10th of September, before the besiegers had approached the walls. When the King heard, Prince Rupert had surrendered Bristol in this manner, he was so enraged, that he ordered him by a letter to depart the kingdom, and revoked all his commissions. The Prince published a manifesto in vindication of his conduct. But he did not sufficiently demonstrate the necessity of surrendering so quickly a place of such importance.‖

Immediately after the taking of Bristol, Fairfax marched again to the west, as well to relieve Plymouth, which was still invested, as to subdue all those counties to the Parliament. But to prevent the mischiefs incurred by the Earl of Essex the last year, for want of an open communication with London, he ordered Cromwell, with a party of horse, to take such places as might hinder this communication. He also detached Colonel Rainsborough to besiege Berkley castle, the only garrison the King had between Gloucester and Bristol. He went himself to Bath the 17th of September, where he remained till his orders were executed.

Cromwell with his party appeared before the castle of the Devizes in Wiltshire. The governor, Sir Charles

* Fairfax had his helmet beaten off, but however, he rode up and down bare-headed. Whereupon, Colonel Charles D'Oyley told him, he exposed himself to too much danger, and offered him his helmet, but he refused it, saying, "It is well enough, Charles." Then he ordered him to charge a body of the King's foot, which stood unbroken in the front, whilst he would do the same in the rear, and meet him in the middle. Which was done accordingly. In this charge Fairfax killed the ensign, and one of D'Oyley's troopers took the colours, bragging, he had killed the ensign, for which D'Oyley chiding him, Fairfax said, "Let him alone, I have honour enough, let him take that honour to himself." Skippon being wounded in the beginning of the fight, was desired to go off the field, but he answered, "He would not stir as long as a man would stand."

† Here the Lord Clarendon makes the following remark. This difference, says he, was observed all along in the discipline of the King's troops, and of those under Fairfax and Cromwell, that though the King's troops prevailed in the charge, they seldom rallied themselves again in order, nor could be brought to make a second charge the same day. Whereas the other troops, if they prevailed, or though they were beaten, presently rallied again, and stood in good order, till they received new orders. The same thing, he says, was not observable in the forces under Essex and Waller.

‡ Whitelock says, that on the Parliament's side were wounded and slain above a thousand officers and soldiers; and, that the King showed himself this day a courageous General, keeping close with his horse, and in person rallying them to hot encounters. This battle was fought in a large fallow field, on the north-west side of Naseby, about a mile broad: there are now no signs of a fight remaining, excepting some few holes, which were the burying places of dead men and horses. This town is said to stand upon the highest ground in England. June 17, the day after the Parliament received the news of this victory, both Houses were feasted by the city of London at Grocer's Hall, and after dinner they sung the 46th Psalm, and so parted.

§ Whitelock says, there were nineteen hundred prisoners, and two thousand horse taken.

‖ He came afterwards to the King at Newark, to vindicate himself. And in November, obtained a pass from the Parliament to go beyond sea.

Lloyd made a show of defending himself, but capitulated on the morrow. The same day Cromwell detached Colonel Pickering, who became master of Laycock house, where was a garrison of the King's kept by Colonel Bovile. After that, Pickering re-joined the army, as did Colonel Rainsborough, Berkley castle having been surrendered upon articles.

September the 26th, the General called a council of war, where it was resolved that the army should march farther westward. But as the Prince of Wales, the King's eldest son, was in those parts with Goring's, Greenvil's, and some other troops, which altogether made a considerable body, the General was apprehensive of meeting many difficulties in this expedition, and therefore thought it incumbent upon him to secure the communication with London. To that purpose, he deached Cromwell once more with orders to endeavour to take the castle of Winchester, and then Basing house, which had been twice besieged in vain.

Cromwell, with his wonted activity, marching directly to Winchester, took the city and castle upon articles. A complaint being made by some of the garrison that they were plundered at their marching out, he caused strict inquiry to be made after the offenders, of whom six were found and condemned to die. After lots cast for their lives, he, whose lot it was, was executed; and the other five were sent to Sir Thomas Glemham, Governor of Oxford, to be punished as he pleased. But the governor sent them back with an acknowledgement of Cromwell's justice and civility.

From Winchester, Cromwell advanced to Basing, the house of the Marquis of Winchester, which he having fortified, kept garrison there for the King.* As he refused to surrender, he was so suddenly and briskly assaulted, that the place was carried by storm, and himself taken prisoner and sent to London. After that Cromwell took Langford house near Salisbury which surrendered upon articles.

In the meantime, Fairfax pursuing his march into the west, came before Tiverton. It was resolved at a council of war to storm the town; but whilst they were consulting how to order the attack, a round shot happened to break the chain of the draw bridge, which falling down, the soldiers, without waiting for orders, possessed themselves of the town.

After that, the army marched towards Exeter, the capital of Devonshire. But as this place was strong and well garrisoned, and the season not proper for so important a siege, it was resolved to block it up till it could be invested in form.

Whilst the General was employed in ordering the blockade, which held till December, and in building necessary forts on the east side of the Ex, the Prince of Wales had time to assemble all the King's forces in those parts, with the militia of Cornwall, and form an army of eight thousand men. Fairfax hearing, the enemies were preparing to march against him, resolved to prevent them, by advancing towards them. He made such speed that he surprised a brigade of their horse, commanded by the Lord Wentworth, and took between three and four hundred horses. This obliged the King's Generals to proceed with more caution, raise the blockade of Plymouth to strengthen their army, and pass the Tamar, in order to retire into Cornwall.

The Prince's retreat into Cornwall gave Fairfax opportunity to attack Dartmouth, a sea port of great consequence, which he took by storm, the season not allowing him to besiege it in form.

After all these advantages, Fairfax returned to Exeter, and finished the blockade of that city. Shortly after, he left the command of it to Sir Hardress Waller, and went himself to meet the Lord Hopton, who was marching to the relief of Exeter, at the head of seven or eight thousand men. General Goring being withdrawn into France, the Prince of Wales had given the command of his army to the Lord Hopton. Fairfax approaching the enemies, heard the Lord Hopton was intrenched in Torrington, to oblige him either to attack him thus advantageously posted, or to keep the field in a very rainy season, in a country where there were few villages to shelter his army from the weather. Fairfax having weighed the inconveniences of leaving the enemies thus intrenched, resolved to attack them. To that end, he advanced within a mile of Torrington, and possessed himself of some posts, with a design to engage on the morrow. But in the night Hopton's troops attempting to dislodge the Parliamentarians, and these last receiving assistance from the army, the battle began insensibly, and held almost the whole night. In short, after a long conflict in the dark, the Lord Hopton's intrenchments were forced, and himself obliged to retire with his horse, and only four or five hundred of the four thousand foot, he had before the battle. Thus all his infantry were slain or taken, or so dispersed, that it was not possible for those that escaped to re-join their General, who had retired into Cornwall.

After this fresh victory, Fairfax judged, his main business was, utterly to destroy the enemies' horse that escaped from Torrington, consisting of three thousand, and to hinder them from joining the King. Instead therefore of returning to Exeter, he resolved to march into Cornwall with his whole army. He set out the 23d of February, and seizing the passes of the river Tamar, left there strong guards, as also in all places where he thought the enemies might try to pass, in case they intended, as was very likely, to join the King. The Lord Hopton finding, Fairfax was advancing towards him, and not being able to fight him, quitted Bodmin, where he had posted himself, and retired farther westward. Meanwhile, Fairfax still advanced, taking all possible care to guard all the passes by which the enemy might escape him.

The approach of the Parliament army caused the Prince of Wales to resolve to secure his person by retiring into Scilly, where he safely arrived.† Meanwhile, the Lord Hopton was extremely embarrassed, and the more, as the people of the county who before were devoted to the King, began to alter their minds, and even voluntarily offered themselves to General Fairfax, to block up the passes, and hinder the King's forces from escaping. At last, the Parliament army approaching Truro, where Hopton had his head quarters, Fairfax sent and offered him honourable terms if he would capitulate. Whilst he waited for an answer, he still advanced towards the enemies, and beating up one of their quarters, took three hundred horses. At length Lord Hopton seeing himself surrounded on all sides, and despairing to escape, agreed to capitulate. By the treaty, signed the 14th of March, it was agreed, that all the forces under the command of the Lord Hopton, should within six days be disbanded, with leave to go beyond sea, or to their homes. That all the horses and arms should be delivered to General Fairfax, and upon performance thereof, each trooper should receive twenty shillings, or his horse. That passes should be given to such as desired to go beyond sea, upon their promising not to bear arms any more against the Parliament of England.‡ The Lords Hopton and Culpepper retired to Scilly before the treaty was signed. Thus the King's army in the west was entirely dispersed. After this, Fairfax returned before Exeter, which was surrendered upon articles the 9th of April, 1646. With the taking of this city, Fairfax ended his western expedition, which could not be more glorious to him, or more advantageous to the Parliament, since the King had neither towns nor forces left in the country.

* He had withstood several sieges, declaring, that if the King had no more ground in England but Basing House, he would adventure as he did, and hold it out to the last extremity. For which reason the house was called Loyalty.

† The King his father, ordered him, as soon as he should find himself in probable danger of falling into the enemy's hands, to retire into Denmark, or some other place beyond sea. The Prince, on April 16, 1646, embarked for Jersey, where he landed the next day, and from thence passed into France.

‡ Those that stayed in England, as well foreigners as others, were to bind themselves for ever; but those that went beyond sea only for three years, not to bear arms against the Parliament.

It is time now to see what passed in the rest of the kingdom, whilst the Parliament army was employed in reducing the western counties.

The Scotch army having taken Newcastle in October 1644, divided themselves into two bodies, one whereof besieged Carlisle, which surrendered upon articles in June 1645.

The other part of the army durst not engage in a siege, because the Marquis of Montrose, who served the King in Scotland, having had great success there, it was to be feared, the King would think of sending him reinforcements. Wherefore the Scots always kept in readiness to oppose it. This became still more necessary after the battle of Naseby, there being great likelihood of the King's resolving to join the Earl of Montrose with his cavalry. Besides, the Scots by keeping thus in the middle of the kingdom, prevented the King from making new levies in those parts. At last, after the taking of Carlisle, the two bodies being re-joined, they besieged Hereford about the end of July. But after having in vain carried on the siege above a month, they raised it in the beginning of September.*

After the siege of Hereford was raised, the Scotch army retired into Yorkshire, complaining openly of being entirely neglected. Whereupon, the Parliament assigned them thirty thousand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark upon the 1st of November, and ordered that the eastern association should pay them fourteen hundred pounds a week. The Scots agreeing to these terms, the siege of Newark was begun about the end of October 1645, and lasted till May 1646.

In July, Pontefract castle was surrendered to the Parliament, and four days after, that of Scarborough capitulated also, having maintained a long siege under Sir Hugh Cholmley, in which Sir John Meldrum was killed.

We left the King in Wales after the battle of Naseby, where he was employed in seeking means to raise a new army. As to the disposing of his person, it was hardly possible for him to come to any resolution, before he knew what his enemies intended to do after their victory. But when he saw General Fairfax, with his army, engaged in the western counties, he departed from his retreat with his cavalry, consisting of three thousand horse. As the Parliament had but very few forces in the midland parts, the King came without danger to Lichfield, and from thence, entering the associated eastern counties, took Huntingdon, where he met with a great booty, after which he came to Oxford. From thence he departed in three days, taking with him what forces could be spared, and marched to Cambden.

The Parliament, thinking the King's design was to relieve either Bristol or Hereford, which were both besieged at the same time, gave orders to Major-General Pointz and Colonel Rossiter to assemble what forces they could, and diligently attend the King's motions. Accordingly they drew together about two thousand horse, and posted themselves between the King and Oxford. But at the same time, the Scots having raised the siege of Hereford of their own accord, the King marched thither, where he continued till the 20th of September. Here he received the news of the surrender of Bristol.

About the same time, Colonel Jones, with Adjutant-General Louthian, who served the Parliament, besieging Beeston castle, drew off thence on a sudden a party of thirteen hundred men, and went to surprise Chester, in which they partly succeeded. But as they had not sufficient forces to become masters of the rest of the city, they were content to keep what they had got, expecting Sir William Brereton, who was to bring them a supply. As the King then expected a body of troops from Ireland, which could land but at Chester, this city was of so great consequence to him, that he immediately marched to dislodge the enemies from the part which they had in their power. He was no sooner on his march, but Pointz closely followed him, and overtook him on Routon heath within two miles of Chester, which obliged him to turn against his pursuers. The fight at first was rather obstinate, but as the King had five thousand, and Pointz only two thousand men, Pointz was briskly repulsed, and thrown into great disorder. Just as the King thought himself entirely victorious, Jones and Louthian came from Chester with eight hundred men, and falling upon the King's rear, forced them to turn against them. This gave Pointz time to rally his men, and then charge the King's army, who finding themselves at once attacked before and behind, were at last utterly routed, with the loss of six hundred men, and a thousand prisoners. The Earl of Lichfield, and some other officers of quality were killed. It was with great difficulty that the King, with the remains of his army, got into Denbigh castle in Wales, where he continued some time; after which, with a party of about three thousand men, he came to Newark in Nottinghamshire. He stayed in that town, till fearing to be besieged by the Scots, who were approaching, he went away by night, and safely arrived at Oxford the 6th of November, there being no other remedy left than to make a peace with the Parliament.†

But this peace was not easy to be made. The King would have willingly granted, in the present situation of his affairs, something of what he had before refused, but did not like to yield all. The Parliament, on their side, were willing to make peace, like conquerors, and by aggravating the terms instead of rendering them more tolerable. They deigned not to make the least reply to several of his messages, in which he desired a passport for commissioners. At last, after reproaching him with the blood spilt during the war, they told him, that they were preparing bills for him; and his passing them would be the best pledge of his inclination towards peace: in other words, he must yield at discretion. He desired a personal treaty, and offered to come to London, upon receiving a safe conduct for himself and his attendants. They absolutely refused him admittance, and issued orders for the guarding, that is, the seizing of his person, in case he should attempt to visit them. A new incident, which happened in Ireland, served to inflame the minds of men, and to increase those calumnies with which his enemies had so much loaded him, and which he ever regarded as the most grievous part of his misfortunes. After the cessation with the Irish rebels, the King was desirous of concluding a peace with them, and obtaining their assistance in England: and he gave authority to Ormond, Lord-Lieutenant, to promise them an abrogation of all the penal laws enacted against Catholics; together with the suspension of Poining's statute, with regard to some particular bills which should be agreed on. Lord Herbert, created Earl of Glamorgan (though his patent had not yet passed the seals) having occasion for his private affairs to go to Ireland, the King considered, that this nobleman, being a Catholic, and allied to the best Irish families, might be of service; he also foresaw, that farther concessions with regard to religion might probably be demanded by the bigoted

* The Earl of Leven, their General, published, on this occasion, an apology, wherein, among other things, he said, that for six or seven months past, they had received but one month's pay. That they had been promised to be supplied with all things necessary for a siege; in which they had been extremely disappointed, since they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty ball to each; that they had but few horse, and being informed the King was marching towards them with three thousand horse, it was impossible to continue the siege. Lastly, that General Lesley was obliged to go into Scotland with his whole party of horse and dragoons, to oppose Montrose.

† After all these repeated disasters, there remained only one body of troops, on which fortune could exercise her rigour. Lord Astley, with a small army of 3000 men, chiefly cavalry, marching to Oxford, in order to join the King, was met at Stow, by Colonel Morgan, and entirely defeated; himself being taken prisoner. "You have done your work," said Astley, "and may now go to play, unless you chuse to fall out among yourselves." It was the same Astley who, before he charged, at the battle of Edge-hill, made this short prayer, "O Lord! thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget thee, do not thou forget me." And with that rose up, and cried, "March on boys!" There were certainly much longer prayers in the Parliamentary army; but we doubt if there were so good a one.

Irish; and that, as these concessions, however necessary, would give great scandal to the Protestant zealots in his three kingdoms, it would be requisite both to conceal them during some time, and to preserve Ormond's character, by giving private orders to Glamorgan to conclude and sign these articles. But as he had a better opinion of Glamorgan's zeal and affection for his service, than of his capacity, he enjoined him to communicate all his measures to Ormond; and though the final conclusion of the treaty must be executed only in Glamorgan's own name, he was required to be directed, in the steps towards it, by the opinion of the Lord-Lieutenant. Glamorgan, bigoted to his religion, and passionate for the King's service, but guided in these pursuits by no manner of judgment or discretion, secretly, of himself, without any communication with Ormond, concluded a peace with the council of Kilkenny, and agreed, in the King's name, that the Irish should enjoy all the churches, of which they had ever been in possession since the commencement of their insurrection; on condition that they should assist the King in England, with a body of ten thousand men. This transaction was discovered by an extraordinary accident. The Archbishop of Tuam, president of Connaught, going into Ulster about some affairs, met with a body of Irish troops marching to besiege Sligo, and joined with them.* When they came near Sligo, the garrison made a sally, charged the troops that were come to besiege them, utterly routed them, and killed the Archbishop of Tuam. In his pockets it was that authentic copies, attested and signed by several Bishops, were found, of the fore mentioned treaty, and of the King's warrant to the Earl of Glamorgan, which were sent to the Parliament.

The Marquis of Ormond, the Lord Digby, then in Ireland, and some others, having soon heard that the secret was discovered, to clear the King, arrested the Earl of Glamorgan, for having, in a presumptuous manner, worthy of severe punishment, exceeded his orders, and concluded a treaty with the Irish.† This is what the King also insinuated in his message to both Houses of the 19th of January 1645-6.‡

Whilst the King was in this state, the court of France sent Montreuil into England, on pretence of procuring a peace between the King and the Parliament: but their real intention was, that Montreuil should endeavour a private agreement between the King and the Scots.§ This could not be done without the King's entirely forsaking the Bishops, and consenting to the establishment of the Presbyterian government in the church of England. The court of France and the Queen of England hoped, this project would succeed the more easily, as it was agreeable to good policy, and the King's interests. The King would thereby have gained not only the Scots, who had a strong army in England, but also the city of London, and the majority of the members of Parliament, who, for the most part, insisted upon the other points in dispute, only to obtain this the more easily. This was properly the sole means of balancing or surmounting the great power of the Independents, who were in a manner masters of the army. If the King had taken this course, it is evident, it would have turned greatly to his advantage: whereas, at the time it was proposed to him, he was entirely without remedy. But his zeal for episcopacy would not suffer him to accept of such an overture, and he told Montreuil, he would never consent to it. About the same time the Queen sent Sir William Davenant to persuade the King to join with the Presbyterians, as the only means to free himself from his sad condition. The moment Davenant offered to speak to him, he commanded him to hold his tongue, and never more appear in his presence.

Meanwhile, Montreuil, at his arrival in England, being possessed with the notion, that the King would not refuse the course, which was to be proposed to him, had made some overtures to the Scotch commissioners residing in London, and found them inclinable to treat with the King: but after he had spoken and written to his Majesty several times, he found him immoveable. The Scots, on their part, being no less inflexible, constantly refused to promise the King any assistance, unless he consented to the abolition of episcopacy.

Whilst this affair was delayed by this difficulty, and Montreuil gone to the Scotch army before Newark, to try to find some medium favourable to the King, Fairfax was advancing with his army, so that the King was in danger of being inclosed in Oxford. The King's principal concern then was to deliver himself from this imminent danger. Though he had till that time demurred upon going to the Scotch army, on account of the fore-mentioned difficulty, he saw no other remedy when the danger approached. The Scotch officers had made him some general promises, founded probably upon their hopes of his consenting at last to their demands. He sent them word of his intention to come to the army, and they promised to receive him and provide for his safety. The King having no time to lose, that he might not be invested in Oxford, departed privately, and came to the Scotch army, the 5th of May, 1646.‖

The King had, on the 13th of April, imparted by letter to the Marquis of Ormond his design to throw himself into the arms of the Scots, in these words: "Having lately received very good security that we and all that do or shall adhere to us, shall be safe in our persons, honours and consciences in the Scotish army; and that they shall really and effectually join with us, and with such as will come in to us, and shall employ their armies and forces to assist us to the procuring of a happy and well grounded peace———If it shall please God that we come safe thither, we are resolved to use our best endeavour, with their assistance, and with the conjunction of the forces under the Marquis of Montrose, and such of our well affected subjects of England as shall arise for us to procure, if it may be an honourable and speedy peace."

The Marquis of Ormond sent a copy of this letter to General Monroe, who commanded the Scotch troops in Ireland, and Monroe communicated the same to the commissioners of the Parliament in Ulster, by whom copies of the letter, as printed at Dublin, were sent over to both Houses, and it was read in the House of Commons on Saturday June the 9th. Whereupon, on

* He attended the army at this time to visit his diocese, and put in execution an order for the arrears of his Bishopric, granted to him by the council of Kilkenny.

† The King's protestation to Ormond ought to have the greatest weight. His words are these:—"Ormond, I cannot but add to my story, that, upon the word of a Christian, I never intended Glamorgan should treat any thing without your approbation, much less without your knowledge. For besides the injury to you, I was always diffident of his judgement (though I could not think him so extremely weak as now to my cost I have found,) which you may easily perceive in a postcript of a letter of mine to you."

‡ Rushworth has inserted in his collections two intercepted letters of the Earl of Glamorgan, one to his Countess dated in January, acquainting her that his imprisonment did not give him much uneasiness. In the other of the 26th of February, directed to the King, he told him, that he was at Waterford providing shipping to transport six thousand foot immediately, and that four thousand more were to follow them by May. These troops came not however into England, probably by reason of the change in the King's affairs, which were in a melancholy situation after the battle of Naseby.

§ Lord Clarendon affirms, that the Scots were under terrible apprehensions of being disappointed of all their hopes, by the prevalence of the Independent army, and therefore wished for nothing more, than an opportunity to make a firm conjunction with the King.

‖ According to Lord Clarendon, the King was not resolved, when he left Oxford, whether he should go to London or the Scotch army. He says, the King went away the 27th of April, attended only by John Ashburnham, groom of his bed chamber, and one Mr. Hudson a divine, who understood the by-ways. It was nine days after his leaving Oxford before it was known where the King was. It seems, the King had wasted that time in several places, purposely to be informed of the condition of the Marquis of Montrose, and to find a secure passage to get to him, which he exceedingly desired. Hudson, upon his examination, said, that the King crossed the country, was at Henley, Brentford, and Harrow on the Hill, where he stayed some time, and was almost persuaded to come to London; and then he went to St. Albans, and so to Harborough in Leicestershire, where the French agent was to have met him with some horse, to conduct him to the Scots army, but came not; from thence the King went to Stamford, where he lay one night; and from thence to Downham in Norfolk, where he stayed at a petty ale-house, from April 30, to May 4; that he passed sometimes by the name of Hudson's tutor, sometimes doctor, and sometimes as Ashburnham's servant.

the Monday following, the Scotch commissioners delivered a declaration to the House of Peers, positively denying, that their army had made any treaty with the King to assist him. Thus we see on one side, the King affirming he had received very good security that the Scots would declare for him; and on the other, the commissioners of Scotland denying that their army had made any treaty with the King to assist him.

In all probability the Scotch commissioners and the general officers of their army had given Montreuil hopes, they would declare for the King, but on condition he would renounce episcopacy; without which condition, it is not easy to conceive, that the commissioners or officers should have made such a promise, which was not in their power; since they could not engage contrary to the express tenour of the covenant, and without positive orders from those who governed Scotland. However this be, Montreuil was recalled and disgraced, and, as there is reason to believe, it was for engaging the word and honour of the King his master and the Queen Regent upon so trifling a foundation. Lord Clarendon says, this envoy's disgrace was an artifice of Cardinal Mazarin, who had a mind to conceal the insincerity of the court of France.

The King being come to the Scotch army,* which had been before Newark ever since November, the General represented to him, that it would be proper, for the safety of his person, for the army to march northward, near the borders of Scotland. But as this could not be done before the taking of Newark, he desired him to order the town to surrender. The King, persuaded by this reason, gave orders to the Lord Bellasis the governor to surrender Newark, which was done accordingly; and immediately after the army began to march, and came with the King to Newcastle.

May the 18th, the King sent a message to both Houses, recommending to them the speedy settling of religion, and the taking to that end the advice of the divines of both kingdoms assembled at Westminster. Concerning the militia, he agreed that the two Houses should name all the commissioners for that trust for the space of seven years, and after the expiration of that term, a regulation should be made by the King and both Houses.

He offered the like for the kingdom of Scotland.

Concerning the wars in Ireland he said in general, he would do whatever was possible for him to give full satisfaction therein.

In a postscript, he offered to disband his forces at Oxford, and consent that the fortifications of that city should be demolished, provided honourable terms were granted to the garrison, which done, he would give the like order to the rest of his garrisons.

The next day, the King wrote to the city of London, to acquaint them, that he was ready to comply with the Parliament in every thing.

June the 10th he pressed the two Houses by another message to send their propositions for peace, that he might give them all just satisfaction; and desired again the liberty to come to London and treat in person with them.†

The 25th of the same month, the Scotch commissioners presented a memorial to the Parliament, whereby they consented, that the propositions for peace, which had been communicated to them, should be sent to the King, with protestation however, that they were not all agreeable to their sentiments. They desired also, that money might be sent to their troops both in England and Ireland, their accounts stated, and all armies speedily disbanded.

Meanwhile, the Scotch army at Newcastle, understanding, it was reported at London, that they had made a treaty with the King to assist him against the Parliament, published a declaration, protesting, it was always their intention to maintain the covenant between the two kingdoms, and that they abhorred all public and private ways tending to violate the same, or to create a misunderstanding between the two nations. At the same time, they presented a petition to the King, beseeching him to take a speedy course for settling of religion in England, according to the example of the best reformed churches, and for establishing the privileges and liberties of his kingdoms; expressing their great grief for his not having yet authorised and signed the covenant. They also prayed him to comply with the counsels of his Parliament. The King returned to this petition a general answer, without entering into particulars.

The general assembly of the kirk of Scotland wrote likewise to the Parliament of England, the city of London, the assembly of divines, to desire them to promote the work of reformation, according to the tenor of the covenant.

July the 6th the House of Commons voted, that England had no further need of the Scotch army, and that the commissioners of Scotland should be desired to withdraw their forces.

Some days after, the two Houses sent propositions for peace to the King at Newcastle, which were little different from those debated at Uxbridge.‡

The Parliament's commissioners presented the propositions to the King the 24th of July, and as they declared to him, they were limited not to stay above ten days at Newcastle, the King gave them his answer the 1st of August.

" That the propositions tendered to him did import so great alterations in government, both in the church and kingdom, that it was very difficult for him to return a particular and positive answer to them, before a full debate; wherein those propositions, and the necessary explanation, true sense, and reasons thereof, were rightly weighed and understood; which he found the commissioners were not authorised to admit, nor able to give him. That he desired to come to London with freedom, honour, and safety, where he might have those doubts cleared, and those difficulties explained to him. ' That he assured them, that as he could never condescend to what was absolutely destructive to that just power, which, by the laws of God and the land, he was born unto, so he would cheerfully grant and give his assent to all such bills, as should be really for the good and peace of his people, not having regard to his own in particular.' "

* The Parliament received on May 6, intelligence of the King's repairing to the Scots army, and thereupon immediately voted, that his Majesty should be sent to Warwick castle.

† The Parliament, in their debates about the propositions for peace to be sent to the King, voted, that Sir Thomas Fairfax should be made a Baron, and have 5000*l.* a year settled on him; and his father made an Earl. Oliver Cromwell a Baron, with 2500*l.* per annum. The Earls of Northumberland, Essex, Warwick, and Pembroke, be made Dukes. The Earl of Salisbury and Manchester, Marquisses. The Lords Roberts, Say, Willoughby of Parham, Wharton, and Howard, Earls. Mr. Holles, a Viscount. Sir Henry Vane, senr. a Baron. Sir William Wall, a Baron, with 2500*l.* per annum. Sir Arthur Haslerig, and Sir Philip Stapleton, Barons, with 2000*l.* per annum each. Sir William Brereton, to have 1500*l.* and Skippon, 1000*l.* per annum.

‡ The thirteenth article, being an addition to the former claims of both Houses with respect to the militia:

" That during the space of twenty years, the two Houses of Parliament alone, shall have power to arm, train, and discipline, the militia; and that neither the King, or his successors, shall, during the said space of twenty years, exercise any power over them.

" The like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the estates of the Parliament there shall think fit.

" That moneys be raised for the maintenance of the said forces for land service, and of the navy, as the Lords and Commons shall, during the said space of twenty years, think fit; and that the said forces be employed, ordered, and disposed, as the two Houses shall appoint, and not otherwise: that they shall have power,

" I. To suppress all forces raised without their authority and consent.

" II. To suppress all foreign forces, who shall invade any of the English dominions.

" III. To conjoin the forces of England with those of Scotland.

" That after the expiration of the said twenty years, no person, under any pretence whatsoever, shall any way dispose of the English forces, without the consent of both Houses.

" That after the said twenty years, if any bills are passed by the Lords and Commons, for the safety of the kingdom, and the royal assent is not given to them within such time as the House of Peers shall judge convenient; that such bills shall nevertheless be as valid to all intents and purposes, as if the royal assent had been given thereunto."

Before

Before the King delivered his answer to the Parliament's commissioners, the Earl of Loudon, Lord Chancellor of Scotland, made a speech to him, to persuade him to accept the propositions. His reasons were the stronger and more pressing, as drawn from the necessity the King was in. But his Majesty was not pleased to take his advice. This answer being read in the Parliament the 12th of August, was the cause of great joy to those who wished not for peace.*

The same day, the Scotch commissioners presented a memorial to the Lords, offering to send their army into Scotland, upon reasonable satisfaction for their pains, hazards, charges, and sufferings. They also said, since his Majesty had not agreed to the propositions presented to him, it was necessary to consult with them what was to be done, as well concerning the King's person, as the peace and safety of the two kingdoms. Both Houses returned them thanks, and appointed a committee to examine their accounts.

Some days after, they delivered in an account of arrears, amounting to two millions. The Parliament disputed several articles, and deducted such sums as the Scots had received. The Scots allowed the justice of some of these deductions, but could not agree to others.† At length, it was agreed to allow them four hundred thousand pounds, one half to be paid upon their removal out of the kingdom, and the other at certain times. This is the fatal bargain, whereby the Scots are considered to have sold the King to the Parliament of England, as indeed they delivered him up some months after.

The thing that has chiefly rendered odious this pretended sale of the King's person, is the tragical death of that Prince, of which it was the occasion. But it must be considered, it was so only by accident. Nothing was at that time farther from the thoughts, both of the Parliament and the Scots, than putting the King to death. The Independents, mortal enemies of the King, Scots, and Presbyterians, were the men who twice took away the King from the Parliament, by means of the army, and cut off his head, at the very time the Parliament and Scots were labouring to restore him, as will hereafter appear. If therefore this pretended sale was the occasion of the King's death, it was the innocent occasion, and its effects ought not to be imputed to the Parliament, such as it was at that time, since it is certain, neither the two Houses, nor the Scots, did then carry their views so far, nor could possibly foresee what afterwards happened.

In the beginning of September, the Duke of Hamilton, who had been released out of Michael's Mount in Cornwall, upon the Parliament's taking that place, came to Newcastle with some other Scotch commissioners, and earnestly pressed the King to accept the propositions for peace. If the Scots had bargained, by a secret treaty, to give up the King to the Parliament, this proceeding seems to have been prejudicial to them, since the King's compliance would have voided their bargain with the English, and deprived them of the promised sum.

The King answered the Duke, and the other commissioners, "That he only desired to be heard, but could not obtain his desire. That he did not give a denial to the propositions, but only desired to be rightly informed of what was demanded, and that his reasons might be heard."

In another answer given them in writing the next day, he said, "He should be content to restrain Episcopal government to some few dioceses, as Oxford, Winchester, Bristol, Bath and Wells, and Exeter; leaving all the rest of England fully to the Presbyterian government, Papists and Independents. In a postscript, he required them to give a particular account of this offer to the General Assembly in Scotland; assuring them, that he would punctually make good his last letter to them. And hoped, that they, as church-men, would not press him to comply with what was against his conscience, till he should have leisure to be better informed."

Some time after, he sent a letter to the Duke of Hamilton, who had retired, finding the King immovable, telling him, that the two Houses thought of getting him into their hands, by saying, they did not intend to make him a prisoner, but only to give him an honourable guard; but for his part, he would not be left in England, when the Scotch army retired, without a visible force upon his person. Probably therefore, when he demanded leave to come to London to treat in person with both Houses, he meant, that he should remain at perfect liberty.‡

At last, on the 18th of September, it was voted, that the King's person should be disposed of as both Houses of Parliament should think fit. But as he was not properly in their power, they appointed a committee to confer with the commissioners of Scotland upon that head.

In one of these conferences, the Lord Loudon, chancellor of Scotland, endeavoured to show, that one of the two kingdoms had no more right than the other, to dispose of the King's person, because he was equally King of both, and that, besides, they were united in the same interest by their covenant. The English commissioners answered, that the King being in England, it belonged to the English to dispose of his person, and though he had retired to the Scotch army, this army being only auxiliaries, and in the pay of England, it was the same as if he had retired to the Parliament's army, whereof the Scotch forces were a part.

In another conference, the same Lord strenuously continued to prove, the principle advanced by him in the former, that the disposing of his Majesty's person did belong to both kingdoms, and therefore, that he ought not to be disposed of by any one of the kingdoms, but by the joint advice of both. His Majesty's going into Scotland being of most dangerous consequence to both kingdoms, he offered to their Lordships' consideration, his Majesty's coming to London, or some of his houses thereabouts.

Nothing seems more apt to confirm the suspicion of the Scots being engaged to deliver the King to the Parliament, than this artifice of the Lord Loudon to that end. For though he supposed, the King would be in one of his houses with honour and safety, he knew the contrary, and that the Parliament would always be master of his person. Consequently it was the same thing as delivering him to the Parliament, the condition that he should be there with honour and safety, being only dazzling terms, to which the Parliament might

* After his arrival at Newcastle, the King was particularly attentive to the behaviour of their preachers, on whom all depended. It was the mode of that age to make the pulpit the scene of news; and on every great event, the whole scripture was ransacked by the clergy for passages applicable to the present occasion. The first minister, who preached before the King, chose these words for his text: "And behold all the men of Israel came to the King, and said unto him, why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away, and have brought the King and his household, and all David's men with him, over Jordan? And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, because the King is near of kin to us; wherefore then be ye angry for this matter? Have we eaten at all of the King's cost; or hath he given us any gift? And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, we have ten parts in the King, and we have also more right in David than ye: why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had, in bringing back our King; and the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel." But the King found, that the happiness chiefly of the allusion had tempted the preacher to employ this text, and that the covenanting zealots were nowise pacified towards him. Another preacher, after reproaching him to his face with his misgovernment, ordered this psalm to be sung:

Why dost thou, tyrant boast thyself,
Thy wicked deeds to praise?

The King stood up, and called for the Psalm which begins with these words,

Have mercy, Lord, on me, I pray;
For men would me devour.

The good natured audience, in pity to fallen Majesty, shewed for once greater deference to the King than to the minister, and sang the Psalm which the King had called for.

† They acknowledged the receipt of 700,000l. in monies, provisions, assessments, quarters, and otherwise.

always give what sense they pleased. But the commissioners of Scotland having caused an account of what passed at these conferences to be printed, with the speeches to prove that England had no more right than Scotland to dispose of the King's person, the Commons were so offended at it, that they ordered all the copie to be siezed, and the printer committed. They made likewise a long answer to the account of the Scots, and sent it to the Scotch commissioners, who refused to receive it, because it came only from one of the two Houses; but the Commons ordered it to be printed and published.

The dispute, real or feigned, hindered not the Scotch army from preparing to return home. But as they were to be paid two hundred thousand pounds, before they began their march, they might yet have staid several weeks in England, had not the city of London engaged to advance that sum. It was however upon two conditions: the first, that the lenders should have 8l. per cent. interest for their money; and that the payment of the principal should be secured out of the receipts of the grand Excise, and the sale of Bishops' lands.* For this reason both Houses made haste to sequester these lands, and appoint a committee to expose them to sale.†

The 16th of December, the Parliament of Scotland took into consideration what was to be done with the King's person. After great debates, it was at length resolved, that the commissioners residing at London should demand of both Houses, from the Parliament of Scotland, that the King might return to London with honour and safety. That they should declare to them, that the Parliament of Scotland was resolved to support monarchy in the person of the King and his just title to the crown of England.

But the next day the commissioners of the General-Assembly presented to the Parliament a paper, intituled, "A solemn and seasonable warning to all estates and degrees of persons throughout the land," wherein, they represented the heinous crime of forsaking the covenant, and endeavouring a breach with England. They maintained, that such projects were infused into some by the devil, and that they who attempted to sow division between the two nations, and violate the covenant, which was their chief strength, could not but be enemies to the state. Then, as to the disposal of the King's person, they said, that so long as his Majesty did not approve in his heart, and seal with his hand, the league and covenant, he could not be received in Scotland without exposing the kingdom to fresh troubles. That, on the other hand, to dispose of the King's person without the consent of the Parliament of England, was openly breaking the covenant, and incurring the guilt of perjury. That it was very true, they were engaged by the covenant to defend the King's person, but it was no less true, that the end of the union between the two nations, was to settle religion in both kingdoms, according to the tenor of the covenant, and that these two engagements could not be separated. That for these reasons they desired, that fresh endeavours might be used to prevail with his Majesty to give satisfaction to both kingdoms, that he might return to his Parliament of England, as a reconciled Prince to satisfied subjects, in order to establish a happy peace.

This paper being read in the Parliament, the matter was again taken into consideration, and at last after a great debate it was resolved, "That his Majesty should be desired to grant the whole propositions; and in case of refusal, the certifications given to his Majesty should be put in execution, namely, to secure the kingdom without him;" and it was declared, "That the kingdom of Scotland cannot lawfully engage themselves for his Majesty: he not taking the covenant, satisfying as to religion, &c. Nor would they admit him to come into Scotland, unless he gave a satisfactory answer to the whole propositions lately presented to him in the name of both kingdoms."‡

The King having notice of this resolution from the Earl of Lanerick, sent a message to both Houses at Westminster, to desire again to come to London, or any of his houses thereabouts, upon the public faith and security of his Parliament and the Scotch commissioners, that he should be there with honour, freedom, and safety, in order to have his doubts cleared and his difficulties explained.§ Assuring them, that he would most willingly condescend to them in whatsoever should be really for their good and happiness. Praying them to consider, it was their King who desired to be heard, which if refused to a subject by a King, he would be thought a tyrant for it.

Upon this message the Lords voted, that the King might come to Newmarket, there to remain with such attendants about him, as both Houses should appoint: but the Commons voted, that Holmby-house in Northamptonshire would be the fittest place for his Majesty, to which the Lords consented. Then it was resolved, "That his coming to Holmby should be with respect to the safety and preservation of his Majesty's person, and in defence of the true religion, according to the covenant."

The 5th of January, 1646-7, a committee of both Houses was appointed to go down and receive the King from the Scots. For though both Houses had declared, he should be at Holmby with honour and safety, they meant not to leave the manner to his choice, and whatsoever expressions they might use, it was to be in effect a real imprisonment. January the 23d the Parliament's commissioners came to Newcastle, and on the 30th of the same month the King was delivered to them. That very day the Scotch army began to march towards Scotland, and the King arrived at Holmby the 16th of February.

Hitherto the Presbyterians and Independents had acted as in concert, because it was equally advantageous to them, or rather necessary, that the King should be disabled from hurting both. When the King was reduced to his present condition, in the hands of a Parliament consisting of two parties, which had equally plotted his ruin, these two parties who had till then seemed united, began to be openly divided, each plainly perceiving, this was the critical time to make the advantages gained in common upon the King, to turn to their own benefit. The Presbyterians were superior in the Parliament and in London: but the Independents were masters of the army, and by that their party was grown very considerable. The Presbyterians' grand affair was therefore to disband the army, under colour of its being unnecessary, since the war was ended; and the Independents' grand affair was, to binder this disbanding, which could not but be fatal to their party. It is certain, the Parliament, being almost wholly Presbyterian, seriously thought of discarding the Independents, and particularly the Generals and officers of that party. As they were obliged to send an army into Ireland, their project was to take for that service such soldiers out of the foot, horse, and dragoons, as should be willing to go thither, form them into companies, and give them officers, they could confide in. After that, their intent was to disband the rest of the forces, keeping only as many as should be necessary for the garrisons. Had

* The other condition was, that such as had formerly contributed upon the propositions for horse, moneys, and plate, might advance the like sum upon this proposition, and be secured as above. At the same time that the Bishops' lands were given in as security for the repayment of the foresaid sums, the whole order of Archbishops and Bishops was abolished, by an ordinance of October 9.

† Money came in so fast upon those securities, that the whole sum of 20.000l. was made up by the 27th of November. And on the 16th of December, it was sent out of London in thirty-six carts.

‡ It was carried but by two votes in the Scottish Parliament, that the King shou'd not come into Scotland.

§ Intelligence concerning the final resolution of the Scottish nation to surrender him, was brought to the King whilst he was playing at chess. Such command of temper did he possess, that he continued his game without interruption; and none of the by-standers could perceive, that the letter, which he perused, had brought him news of any consequence. The English commissioners, who, some days after, came to take him under their custody, were admitted to kiss his hands; and he received them with the same grace and cheerfulness, as if they had travelled on no other errand than to pay court to him. The old Earl of Pembroke in particular, who was one of them, he congratulated on his strength and vigour, that he was still able, during such a season, to perform so long a journey, in company with so many young people.

this project succeeded, the Independents' party would have been irrecoverably ruined. But the Parliament had to deal with men who were too wise to give them time to take all their measures. Oliver Cromwell, a person of uncommon valour, great parts, and profound dissimulation, was then at the head of the Independents, though he affected still to pass for a rigid Presbyterian. He was present at the sermons of the Presbyterians with a seemingly extraordinary devotion. He made use of certain Scripture-expressions after the manner of the Presbyterians, and spoke not a word which might betray him to be Independent, either as to religion or policy. In short, he had found means to persuade General Fairfax, that his sole aim was to promote the glory of God, and the welfare of religion and the kingdom. He had in the army a great number of officers who acted by his directions, so that when he did all, he seemed to do nothing. Among these officers were his son-in-law, Ireton, Rainsborough, Fleetwood, Lambert, Harrison, and several others, who took care to strengthen the Independent party, by means of many subaltern officers, who endeavoured to make proselytes among the soldiers, and were so many emissaries in every regiment. Cromwell was member of Parliament for Cambridge, and withal Lieutenant-General of the army, notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance, from which he had been exempted. After the war was over, he constantly attended the House, and thereby might be informed of the project against the army, or rather against the Independent party in general. He seemed to approve of the measures designed by the Commons, namely, of forming an army for Ireland,* and disbanding the rest of their forces. But at the same time, by means of his emissaries, he raised in the army a spirit of discontent and mutiny. This was the more easy, as the officers and soldiers perceived, they were going to be discarded, as the most were little able to return to their old professions, after four or five years spent in war. There were in the army many officers, who before the wars had been only tradesmen, and saw with great regret they were going to be reduced to quit their employ which gave them authority, and resume their former trades, to be mixed as before, with the meaner sort of people. These men, as well as those gained by the Independents, were ready for any undertaking, not to be obliged to alter a course of life they had now led for some years. Cromwell therefore, and the officers of his party, improving this disposition, diligently inspired the army with discontent against the two Houses, wherein they succeeded but too well.†

The first spark of this flame appeared in March 1647, at the time when the Parliament was seriously thinking of executing the fore-mentioned project. The Commons had notice, that some officers of the army had prepared a petition to be presented to the General, and communicated to the House. In the petition was described, the unhappy condition, most of the officers and soldiers would be in, when the army should be disbanded. The articles desired, were: "Indemnity for actions as soldiers; satisfaction for arrears; no pressing for horse or foot; relief of widows and maimed soldiers; pay till disbanded." This petition flew from regiment to regiment, and there were officers very diligent to procure subscriptions. Whereupon, the Commons sent an order to the General, to make strict inquiry after the authors of this petition, and put a stop to the conferences held in the army, to sow discord and division. The General answered, that in obedience to the order of the House, he had assembled the officers, and questioned them about the petition: that they had expressed a very deep sense of their unhappiness, in being misunderstood in their clear intentions, which, as they had protested, were no other than, by way of petition, to represent to him, their General, those inconveniencies, which would necessarily befall most of the army after disbanding; but withal had assured him, they would wholly acquiesce in whatsoever he should judge reasonable to offer, or the House to grant on their behalf. The General added, that the House might be better informed, he had sent Lieutenant-General Hammond, Colonel Hammond, Colonel Lilburn, Lieutenant-Colonel Pride, and Lieutenant-Colonel Grimes, who, he hoped, would give a full and candid account of the whole matter.

Accordingly, these officers were examined before the House; after which, the Speaker, in dismissing them, told them what sense the Houses had of the petition, and desired their care for suppressing the same, or any other of the like nature for the future. The same day, the House ordered the General to publish a declaration, at the head of every regiment, importing, that the petition tended to put the army into a mutiny, and obstruct the relief of Ireland, and that the promoters thereof should be proceeded against as enemies to the state, and disturbers of the public peace.

The Commons could not do any thing more agreeable to those, who had formed the project of sowing division between the army and the Parliament. This declaration gave occasion to the officers and soldiers to complain openly, "that though they had fought for the liberty of the subjects of England, they were denied the liberty of the subject to petition, even to their General, and merely in things relating to them as soldiers, meddling neither with church nor state-affairs, and withal, submitting it to the General's judgment for approbation or correction, as he saw cause."

Meanwhile, the two Houses intending to execute their resolution, of sending forces into Ireland in the manner they had projected, appointed a committee for that purpose, and gave them power to form the regiments of this army, and commission such officers as they should think fit. At the same time, they resolved to encourage those that voluntarily offered to serve in Ireland, and ordered the commissioners speedily to execute their discharge.

The commissioners ‡ repairing to Saffron Walden, the General's head-quarters, gave notice to the officers to assemble the next day. Then the Earl of Warwick, head of the committee, made a speech, exhorting them to accept of the terms offered by the two Houses. When he had done speaking, Colonel Lambert answered in the name of all the officers, and desired to know, what satisfaction should be given them concerning four articles, namely, arrears, indemnity, maintenance in Ireland, and conduct? Sir John Clotworthy replied, that the Parliament had taken care of all, except the point of indemnity, for which an ordinance would be ready in a few days. The officers demanded, what Generals were to command them in Ireland? It was answered, Skippon and Massey, were named for General and Lieutenant-General; but for other commanders, the Parliament had not yet come to any resolution. Then the officers cried out with one voice, that if the command was given to Fairfax, Cromwell, and Skippon, they were ready to march. The commissioners seeing, the officers insisted upon a thing not agreeable to the intentions of the Parliament, desired such as would enlist in the service of Ireland, to come to their lodgings in the town, where they would give them farther satisfaction; but there came very few. At the same time, the rest prepared a declaration, which was presented to the commissioners, wherein they said, "They had reason to complain, that they had received no positive answer to their desires: that however, those who in their own persons did not engage for Ireland, would be ready to promote the service: that if the same conduct under which the army had been so prosperous in England, was continued, it would conduce much to their personal engagement in the service of Ireland: that this was the general sense of the officers of the army."

† The Earl of Essex's death, which happened on the 14th of September, 1646, made it easier for Cromwell to carry on his designs. For doubtless, had he lived, he would have given some check to the fury that was about to prevail. Lord Clarendon says, it was reported he was poisoned; and that Cromwell and his party were wonderfully exalted with his death. On the 27th of November following, the Earl's horse and effigies were cut to pieces and defaced in Westminster Abbey; and the like barbarous action was done to Camden's tomb there.

The General, who hitherto seemed very desirous to serve the Parliament, ordered the officers who had a mind to serve in Ireland, to draw out as many of their men as would engage in that service. But the number was very small, and the Parliament was informed, there were officers who took great pains to dissuade the soldiers from this service, and cherish the discontent of the army.

A. D. 1647.] At last, their boldness was such, that some of the principal officers scrupled not to appear at the head of the mutineers, in a declaration presented to both Houses. This declaration was signed by Thomas Hammond, Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance, seven Colonels, seven Lieutenant-Colonels, six Majors, and one hundred and thirty officers, Captains, and Subalterns.

The same day this declaration was presented to the House, the Commons voted, that the army should be disbanded, and the soldiers have six weeks pay when dismissed.

Some days after, Major-General Skippon, who was come to command in Ireland, and being returned from Barnstable had taken his seat in the House, notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance, which was no longer regarded, reported, that a letter was presented to him the day before by some troopers, in the behalf of eight regiments of horse, and produced the same, which was immediately ordered to be read. These regiments complained of the many late scandals, and false suggestions, against the army, and their proceedings, and alledged the reasons why they could not engage in the service of Ireland, under the conduct of the intended Generals. The troopers, who brought the letter, were called in and examined, concerning the meaning of some expressions in the petition: to which they replied, that the letter being a joint act of those several regiments, they could not give a punctual answer, being only agents, but if they might have the queries in writing, they would carry them to the regiments, and return their answers.

Though the declaration of the officers was in itself very reasonable, it seemed more like an insolent accusation against the Parliament, than an humble apology. This convinced the Commons, that the evil was greater than was at first imagined; wherefore they passed several votes to give some satisfaction to the army, and to hinder the increase of their discontent. At the same time, Skippon, Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood, were ordered to go and acquaint the army with what the House intended to do for the troops, and that a considerable sum was preparing for their pay, before they were disbanded.

The Generals sent by the Parliament being come to the army, and calling the officers together, read to them the votes passed in their favour; after which, Skippon made a speech, to engage them to serve under him in Ireland. The officers answered, as this affair concerned the soldiers as well as the officers, it was necessary to inform them of it, in order to know their resolution.

Meanwhile, the Parliament ardently desiring to disband the army, after that which was to serve in Ireland was formed, ordered, that before they were disbanded, a fortnight's pay should be added to the six weeks, formerly voted, and that six weeks' pay more should be given to those who would engage for the service of Ireland.

The troopers and soldiers being informed of what the Generals, sent by the Parliament, had reported to the officers, answered, that as the whole army was concerned, they desired to discuss the affair, in a committee chosen by themselves, out of every company and troop, who should report the desires of each regiment to a committee of General officers; to be by them contracted into a method, and if general, communicated to both Houses, as the sense of the army. It is easy to perceive in this answer, a secret direction of some of the leading mal-contents, who intended by this means to be masters of the soldiers' resolutions, and compose in the army, a sort of Parliament, in opposition to the two Houses. This demand, of which, perhaps, the consequences were not by many foreseen, being granted, the soldiers chose two out of every company, who were called Agitators, to debate upon the matters which were to be brought to the council of officers, called the council of war, consisting of Generals, Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, and Captains. Among the Agitators there were few or none above the degree of an Ensign. These two councils were afterwards continued, to the great prejudice of the Parliament and great advantage of the heads of the Independent party, who easily found means to admit only such as were devoted to them, or not of sufficient ability to discover their designs.

The two Houses persisted in their resolution to disband the army, excepting those who would engage to serve in Ireland. To effect this the more easily, it was ordered, that their arrears should be speedily audited, and good security given them, for so much as should not be paid off upon disbanding: that none that had voluntarily served in the wars, should be pressed for any service beyond sea: that an ordinance should be drawn for providing for widows, maimed soldiers, and orphans. After that, the two Houses settled the manner of disbanding the army, namely, that the regiments should be disbanded at different times and places, and that the money to pay them what was promised, should be sent to the several rendezvous. But the army openly complained of the intention to pay them but two months' arrears upon disbanding, when there was no less than fifty-six weeks' due to them.

Shortly after, the General called a council of war at Bury, at which were present above two hundred officers; and communicated to them the votes of both Houses, advising them to a compliance with the order of Parliament. But the officers answered, they did not think these votes satisfactory to the soldiers;

I. Because eight weeks' pay was not a considerable part of what was due to them.

II. Because no visible security was given for the arrears.

III. Because nothing was done for their vindication, and they being declared enemies, and sent home, might hereafter be proceeded against as enemies, unless the declaration were recalled.

At the same council a petition was produced and read, which had been that morning presented to the General, in the name of the private soldiers of the army, complaining, "that it was intended to disband them without redressing their grievances, and in a strange, unheard of manner, one regiment apart from another, which posture could not but render them suspicious to the kingdom. And therefore they desired the General would be pleased to appoint a rendezvous for the army, and use his utmost endeavours, that they might not be disbanded before their grievances were heard, and fully redressed, which if not done, they should be necessitated, though unwillingly, to do things that might be prevented, by granting their just desires."

The council of war having examined this petition, believed, or feigned to believe, it was absolutely necessary to take notice of it, for fear, if they saw all their desires rejected, they should have a rendezvous without their officers. It was therefore resolved, that the quarters of the army should be contracted to prevent disorders, and for the greater readiness to suppress them. It was manifest, the design of the petition, and the council of war's resolution, was, to break the Parliament's measures. It had been resolved to separate the army, and disband them at different times and places, in order to do it the more easily; and the army, on the contrary,

contrary, had contracted their quarters, so that they could rendezvous in a very short space, without any possibility of being prevented by the Parliament.

The General failed not to acquaint the two Houses with the result of what had passed in the council of war, intreating them to proceed with caution, that the army might not be incensed, and a breach made, which could not but be very dangerous. He wrote the same day to the Speaker of the House of Commons, that he was extremely uneasy concerning the disposition of the army, and heartily wished some means could be found to appease the distractions, which was not in his power. That he was forced to yield to many things to prevent wórse inconveniences.

Whereupon, the two Houses recalled the commissioners, who were now gone to disband the army, and sent for the money which had been lodged in several places for the payment of the soldiers. But three thousand five hundred pounds, carrying to London, was stopped by Colonel Rainsborough's men at Woodstock. It was very evident, the army was unwilling to be disbanded; and the Parliament, not being in a condition to command obedience, were forced to stay till a more convenient season. Their intention was to divide the army, under colour of the necessity of sending forces into Ireland, and, the better to engage the soldiers to leave the army, it was voted, that a month's pay should be given to those that would quit their regiments, and serve in Ireland. They hoped by this means to form an army equal or superior to that which refused to obey, wherein they were greatly mistaken. Meanwhile, to give some satisfaction to the army, it was ordered by the Commons, that the subordinate officers and soldiers should have all their arrears deducted for free quarters according to the usual rules of the army. That the commission-officers should have one month's pay more added to the two months' arrears formerly voted. Lastly, that the declaration against those that drew up the first petition should be razed out of the Journal of the House. But all this was not capable of contenting the army.

It was easy to perceive, that every thing tended to a breach between the Parliament and the army. The Parliament accused the army of mutiny and sedition,* and the army pretended, that the Parliament, under colour of sending forces into Ireland, thought of forming a new army, to become masters of the kingdom, when the old one should be cashiered, or to kindle a fresh war, in case the troops refused to obey. But they were far from being upon an equality. The army had the sword in their hands, and though some officers and soldiers had quitted their regiments for the service of Ireland, their number was inconsiderable: all the rest remained united, and were supported by most of the Generals, who being against the Parliament, privately cherished the discontent of the officers and soldiers. The Parliament had no forces to compel the army to obedience, and therefore were terribly embarrassed. They durst not drive the army to extremities; and on the other hand, they plainly perceived, that the discord was fomented by the leaders of the Independents, who sought the destruction of the Parliament, for fear the Parliament should destroy them, as indeed both Houses intended.

This therefore was a critical season, the point being to know who should be master, the Parliament or the Independent party. But the latter had the army on their side, and that alone balanced the power and authority of the Parliament. They had so well laid their measures, by means of the agitators, that the army was become a sort of republic, where the suffrages of the common soldiers were upon a level with those of the Generals; the soldiers even did not think themselves obliged to follow or to ask the advice of their officers. Hence sprung confusion, which was suffered to prevail. Every thing was done in the name of the army, a loose term, which signified, sometimes the council of war, alone, sometimes the council of agitators, now both councils together, and now, the agitators of some particular regiments. In this last sense must be understood the enterprize performed, in the name of the army, by the agitators of some regiments of horse, of carrying away the King by force from Holmby-house to Newmarket.†

To execute this design, they chose Cornet Joyce, one of the agitators of his regiment, who, from a taylor before the war, was become an officer, and had signalized himself for his bravery. Joyce being put at the head of fifty horse, marched directly to Holmby, and came there in the night, after the King was in bed. Having secured the avenues, he went up with two or three more to the King's chamber, and caused the door to be opened. The King, rising, asked him what he meant. Joyce answered, he intended to carry him to the army, for they had received certain advice, there was a design to convey him away by force. The King asked him, whether he had the General's orders? He replied, no, but that he was authorized by the army, and, as he held a pistol in his hand, sufficiently intimated, it was by that he was chiefly empowered.‡ The Parliament's commissioners who were at Holmby to take care of the King, would have opposed this violence: but the King's guards refused to make any resistance, and the troops that were in the neighbouring villages to relieve the guard every day, would not come. At last, after many disputes, all the King could obtain was to stay till the morning. That same night he wrote a note, which he intrusted with the Earl of Dumfarling, to acquaint the two Houses, he was carried away from Holmby against his will, and that they should not give any credit to what he might afterwards write whilst under restraint. The next morning he went into the coach, and was conducted by Joyce, who carried him that night to Colonel Montague's, and the next day to Newmarket.

Whilst these things passed, the General having appointed a rendezvous of the army at Newmarket, for the 4th and 5th of June, the several regiments presented a petition to him, complaining of the votes passed in Parliament the 21st and 25th of May, as not being satisfactory. The next day, June the 5th, the officers and soldiers subscribed a paper, which they called, A Solemn Engagement, whereby they consented to disband, when required by the Parliament, but on condition, "That they should first have such satisfaction in relation to their grievances, and such security as to their persons, as should be agreed unto by a council to consist of those general officers (who had concurred with the army) with two commission officers, and two soldiers to be chosen for each regiment; and declared, that without such satisfaction, and such security, they would not willingly disband, nor suffer themselves to be disbanded or divided."

This engagement was seconded with petitions from the inhabitants of the counties of Essex, Suffolk and Norfolk, intreating the General, not to suffer the army to be disbanded till every thing relating to the government was settled.

June the 7th, both Houses received a letter from the General, acquainting them, that the soldiers at Holmby had brought the King thence by consent, having thought proper to secure his person, from an apprehension of forces gathering to fall upon them and force him out of their hands. That as soon as he knew it, he sent Colonel Whaley's regiment to guard the King; after which, for prevention of danger, he had sent two regiments more to reinforce Colonel Whaley. That Whaley had desired the King and the commissioners,

* Some moved, that the petitioning soldiers might be declared traitors. Others resolved to secure Cromwell, but he being advertised of it, went to the army.

† Ludlow gives this reason for seizing the King: that the agitators were afraid, those who had shewed themselves so forward to close with the King, out of principle, upon any terms, would, for their own preservation, receive him without any, or rather put themselves under his protection; that they might the better subdue the army, and reduce them to obedience by force.

‡ The King requiring Joyce to show his commission, he showed the soldiers that attended him. Whereupon the King said, "Believe me, your instructions are written in a very legible character." There being five hundred proper men on horseback.

in his name, to return to Holmby, but that his Majesty was not willing to go back. That upon this, he had sent Sir Hardress Waller, and Colonel Lambert, to desire the commissioners to think of returning to Holmby, but that the commissioners refused to act in disposing of the King. He affirmed moreover, that neither himself, nor the officers about him, nor the body of the army were concerned in removing the King, protesting that it was his as well as the army's desire, to study to settle a firm peace. That they had no intention to oppose Presbytery, or set up the Independent government, but to leave all to the wisdom of Parliament, without advancing any particular party or interest.

It was strange, that the King should be removed from Holmby by fifty troopers, without any orders from the General or the officers about him, and without the consent of the body of the army; and that the general officers should suffer him to be in the centre of the quarters of the army, without enquiring after those who gave, or those who executed, such an order. This showed, there was some mystery in it, which it was not thought proper to discover to the Parliament, and that Joyce knew he should be protected if called to an account. On the other hand, though the King had sent word to both Houses, that he was unwillingly removed, it appears by the General's letter, that his Majesty consented to it, and was unwilling to return to Holmby, when it was in his power. What followed makes it conjectured, that some of the general officers believed it to be absolutely necessary for their interest to have the King in their power, at a time when they thought there was reason to fear, the Parliament would come to an agreement with him, and that they caused him to be taken away from Holmby by persons without warrant, well-knowing, they should be powerful enough to hinder the affair from being strictly examined. The King appeared, for some time, much more at ease in the hands of the army, than when he was in the Parliament's power.

The Commons seeing the army master of the King's person, and unwilling to disband, resolved at least to show the public by their votes, that the imputations laid to their charge by the army were groundless, and that they were not swayed by self-interested motives. So, June the 10th, they confirmed the self-denying ordinance, and "declared to be void all places held by the members of Parliament." They voted, "that the lands and estates of all members of the House should be liable to the law for payment of their debts." They appointed a day to hear informations against members, and ordered that no member should hereafter receive any reparation for damages, till the public debts were first satisfied.

Nevertheless the army began to march, and advanced to St. Albans, within twenty miles of London. At the same time, the General sent to both Houses the result of the late council of war at Newmarket, and intreated them to think of some way to satisfy the troops.

The approach of the army threw the Parliament and city into great consternation, and an ordinance was passed to enable the committee of the militia of London to raise horses. They seemed to intend to put themselves in a posture of defence against the army. Within a few hours after, the city received a letter signed by the General, and all the other general officers, complaining, there were certain members of Parliament who endeavoured to engage the kingdom in a new war, as having no other way to protect themselves from the punishment they justly deserved. Adding, that they desired no alteration of the civil government, nor in the least to hinder the settling of Presbyterianism, neither did they intend any evil to the city, if they appeared not to assist that wicked party, who would embroil them and the kingdom. That they were ready to remove at a farther distance, if they were assured, that a speedy settlement of things was in hand. That if, after all, the city should be seduced to take arms against the army, ruin and destruction would ensue.

This letter was communicated to the Parliament, who wrote to the General, to desire that the army might not come within twenty-five miles of the city; but it was already advanced to St. Albans. The same day, the Commons ordered, that the sum of ten thousand pounds should be paid to such officers and soldiers as should leave the army and engage in the service of Ireland, with which the army was highly displeased, plainly perceiving, the Parliament's design was to divide them.

The next day, upon a false rumour of the army's near approach to the city, the militia of London ordered all the trained-bands to be raised on pain of death. But presently after the order was revoked. However, soldiers were enlisted by order of Parliament.

In this interval, the Common-Council of London sent an answer to the General and officers, wherein they said, the city intended no evil to the army, but only to defend the Parliament and themselves against any unlawful violence. That they did not take arms with intent to hinder the obtaining of the army's just demands. That on the contrary, they had presented their addresses to the Parliament for the obtaining thereof; and only requested, they would demand no more than what should be just and reasonable.

The same day, the Parliament sent commissioners to the army, to know what were their desires. The General answered, in letters to both Houses, that the army offered, for a month's pay, not to draw their quarters nearer London, without first giving notice of it to the Parliament's commissioners.

Meanwhile, the army continued to render themselves formidable, as well by their nearness, as by their demands which daily rose higher. At first, they protested, they would not meddle in any thing not immediately relating to themselves, and that their intention was to leave the care of the government to the wisdom of the two Houses. But when they found, the Parliament gave way, and wanted power or resolution, they advanced one step farther, and by a declaration presented to both Houses, demanded:

That the Houses might be purged of such members, as for their delinquency, or for corruptions, or undue elections ought not to sit there; that those persons who had appeared against the army, might speedily be disabled from doing the like; and for that purpose, might be made incapable of being the soldiers' judges, when disbanded; that some determinate period of time might be set for the continuance of that and future Parliaments, beyond which none should continue; that the members of the House might not have the temptation or advantage of an unlimited power to perpetuate injustice or oppression, but might be in a capacity to taste of subjection as well as rule; that Parliaments might not be adjournable or dissolvable, any other ways, than by their own consent; that the right and freedom of the people to present petitions to the Parliament might be cleared and vindicated; that the large powers given to committees or deputy-lieutenants, might be taken away, or regulated; that the kingdom might be righted and publicly satisfied in point of accounts, for the sums that had been levied and paid; and that after public justice was first satisfied by some few examples on delinquents, a general act of oblivion should be passed."

After these demands, the army protested, "That their design was not to overthrow Presbytery, and establish the Independent government. But they only desired, that there might be some effectual course taken, that such who upon conscientious grounds differed from the established forms, might not for that be debarred from the common rights, liberties, or benefits belonging equally to all, while they lived soberly and inoffensively towards others, and peaceably and faithfully towards the state."

Cromwell and his associates used all their endeavours to countermine the artifices of their enemies, by inspiring the army with discontent, and cherishing it in the forementioned manner. In short, having tried the Parliament, they thought themselves strong enough to strike a bolder stroke, in using always the army's name, which they had moulded to their purposes. To this end, they caused it to be resolved in a council of war, that that the army should prefer a charge against the ablest and most powerful members of the commons, who in a manner governed and directed the House. These were the men the Independent party had most to fear. This resolution being taken, the army deputed some officers to carry in their name, to the Parliament, a charge against eleven members, namely, Holles, Stapleton, Lewis, Clotworthy, Waller, Maynard, Massy, Glyn, Long, Harley, and Nicholas.*

The very next day, the army sent proposals to the Commons, wherein they desired:

"That the persons impeached might be forthwith suspended from sitting in the House; that there might be a month's pay immediately sent to the army; that if the officers and soldiers of the army who had engaged for Ireland, or those who had deserted the army and come to London, had since then received more than a month's pay, there might be so much more money sent down to the army; that during the debate and transaction betwixt the Parliament and the army, about raising and listing new forces, the Parliament would not suffer any new forces to be raised within the kingdom."

The two Houses thought proper to appease the impending storm, by giving satisfaction to the army. It was therefore resolved, that the order for listing of forces, and the permission given to the committee of the militia of London to augment the trained-bands should be void: that the army should have a month's pay, and the General be required to remove it forty miles from London. Some days after, a month's pay was also granted to the forces in the north; and to let the army see there was no design to disband them, the Parliament passed an ordinance for raising sixty thousand pounds a month for the maintenance of the army, and for the service of Ireland.† Lastly, the House of Commons wrote to the General, that they were ready to receive from him any particular charge against the eleven accused members.

This condescension might have produced peace between the Parliament and the army, if peace had been what the army desired. But instead of being obliged to the Parliament for this compliance, they were rather incensed at it, as being sensible, the design of it was only to break their measures, by taking away all pretence of complaint. They were afraid the Parliament, by endeavouring to gain time, would privately take measures, the effects whereof would not appear perhaps till it should be too late to prevent them. Wherefore, far from being contented, they presented a remonstrance to the Parliament, whereby they sufficiently discovered their inclination to an agreement. This remonstrance contained the following complaints of the officers and soldiers:

"That they had received no answer or resolution about the eleven accused members; that it was industriously published, that his Majesty was kept a prisoner in the army, and babarously and uncivilly used; but all suggestions of that sort were most false, and that, they should be enforced, by the Parliament's affected delays, to take extraordinary courses to put things to a speedy issue, unless by Thursday night next they received assurances and security on the following articles:

"I. That the declaration, inviting men to desert the army, be recalled and annulled.

"II. That the army may be presently paid up, equally to those that have deserted it.

"III. That his Majesty's coming to Richmond may be suspended; and in the mean time, no place may be appointed for his Majesty's residence any nearer to London, than the Parliament will allow the quarters of the army to be.

"IV. That the members charged may be forthwith suspended the House.

"V. That those who have deserted the army may be instantly discharged, and receive no more of their arrears till the army be first satisfied.

"VI. That both Parliament and city may be freed from those multitudes of reformadoes, and other soldiers that flock together about London.

"VII. That all listings, or raising of new forces, may be effectually suppressed.

"VIII. That the perplexed affairs of the kingdom, and those concerning the army, may be put into some speedy way of settling and composure.‡"

Meanwhile, the Commons voted, "That by the law no judgment can be given to suspend the eleven members from sitting in the House, upon the papers presented from the army, before the particulars be produced, and proofs made." But an expedient was found to soften this refusal, namely, that the parties accused should, of their own accord, desire leave to absent themselves from the House, which was granted, and the army remained satisfied.§

About the same time, the army drawing a little near London, probably, with design to awe the Parliament, the General wrote to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, that they had nothing to fear from the army, who had no ill intention against the city. And indeed, it was resolved in a council of war, that there should be no farther advance of the army than to Uxbridge.

It is certain, there were many in the city and Parliament, that wished to see a breach between the two Houses and the army. Some doubtless, imagined, such a breach would be very advantageous to the King, and that one or other of the two parties would join with him, and be directed by him. The King even flattered himself with these hopes. The army showed great regard for him, and some of the officers even hinted to him, they were labouring for his restoration. For this reason the two Houses thought it necessary to avoid a breach. They therefore voted, that they considered the army commanded by General Fairfax, as their army, and would make provision for their maintenance. It was farther ordered, that they should have a month's pay, and no officer or soldier should leave the army without licence from the General; that all reformadoes should remove from the city, and the King reside no nearer London than the army. These votes being communicated to the army, they seemed so well pleased with them, that they resolved to remove from London, to show they intended to use no force upon the Parliament, and the head-quarters were appointed at Wickham.

Whilst the Parliament was endeavouring to content the army, a plot was forming in London, to compel the

* The general articles of the charge were:

"I. That the persons above-named had, in an arbitrary and violent manner, infringed the rights and liberties of the nation, and endeavoured by indirect and corrupt practices to delay and obstruct justice.

"II. That the army being, until the middle of March last, in an orderly condition, and ready, either quietly to have disbanded, or else to have engaged in the service of Ireland, those members had endeavoured by false informations to beget misunderstandings and jealousies in the Parliament against the army.

"III. That whereas the Parliament might have had out of the army, an entire force for the reduction of Ireland, those persons had attempted to pull the army in pieces, and to put the kingdom to the trouble and expence of raising a new force for that service.

"IV. That they had diverted the forces engaged for the service of Ireland, and endeavoured to apply them to carry on desperate designs of their own in England; and had also raised new forces under pretence to guard the Parliament, and privately listed officers and soldiers, for embroiling the kingdom in a new and bloody war.

"V. That they had invited and encouraged divers reformadoes and other officers and soldiers, tumultuously to gather together at Westminster to affright and insult the members of Parliament."

† This monthly sum was raised, by rating each county at a certain sum. Essex paid the sum of 4547*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*

‡ In these declarations and transactions of the army, Colonel Ireton was chiefly employed, or took upon him the business of the pen. And having been bred in the Middle-Temple, and learned some grounds of the law of England, and being of a working and laborious brain and fancy, he set himself much upon these businesses, and was therein encouraged and assisted by Lieutenant-General Cromwell, his father-in-law, and by Colonel Lambert, who had likewise studied in the inns of court, and was of a subtle working brain.

§ Denzil Holles, Sir Philip Stapleton, and Walter Long, went together in a ship to France, where Stapleton, that gallant English gentleman (says Whitelock) died within two or three days landing at Calais, as some suspected of the plague. Others of the eleven members went into other parts, and some of them retired into their countries, and there lived privately; Mr. Holles continued in Bretagne till the Restoration.

two Houses to take other measures, and oppose the army. The Presbyterians were not pleased to see the Independents gain so much ground, and censured the Parliament for thus meanly complying with the army. The Magistrates of London came into this plot, as well as the most zealous Presbyterian members of Parliament, who had not been able to hinder the late votes for preventing a breach with the army. The authors of this plot had sent private agents into Scotland to desire assistance. It was even whispered in London, that Scotland was going to declare against the army.

The first step taken by the conspirators, was to present to the Parliament, a petition from the Common-council of London, wherein they expressed some suspicion of their conduct. This was doubtless, in order to have a pretence to complain more openly afterwards, and to begin to lessen the people's prepossession in favour of the Parliament.*

To incense the Londoners against the army, it was rumoured, that they designed to declare for the King. A pamphlet was even dispersed in London, intituled, "Heads presented by the army to the King's Majesty." But the army disowned it by a public declaration.

The Parliament having empowered their commissioners † to treat with the army, they nominated on their part, Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, Rainsborough, Harrison, Sir Hardress Waller, Rich, Lambert, Hammond, and Major Rainsborough; all Independents, and heads of the party in the army. It appears by memoirs, inserted in Rushworth's Collections, that the army's commissioners would not begin to treat, before the Parliament should have granted some things they demanded, and really performed them. The Parliament's commissioners endeavoured on their side to avoid having these points considered as granted preliminaries, and insisted upon their making part of the negotiation.

Meanwhile, the project of raising forces in London to oppose the army still continued, though with the utmost secrecy, and the agents in Scotland caused much to be expected from the Scots, as being concerned to support the Presbyterian party. But the authors of this project could hardly flatter themselves that the assistance of Scotland could be ready in time, since the Parliament and army were upon terms of accommodation. They found therefore, they were either to break off this accommodation, or resolve to see all their hopes vanish, and suffer Presbyterianism to be trampled upon by the Independents. To succeed in the design of preventing a peace between the Parliament and army, they found no better way than to excite the people, to force the Parliament to alter their measures. They got therefore the apprentices, and London mob, to present petitions, that the Presbyterian government might be firmly established: the insolence of sectaries curbed: the army paid off and disbanded; and other things of the like nature destructive of the projected agreement.

On the other hand, the forces in the north, and the horse quartered at Nottingham, published declarations of their adherence to the army commanded by General Fairfax.

About the same time, the Parliament, at the army's request, ordered the four regiments that came from the army, under pretence of engagement for Ireland, but remaining still in the kingdom, to be disbanded. They permitted likewise the eleven accused members to go beyond sea for six months, insinuating to them by this permission, that they would do well to take this course of their own accord.

Meanwhile, the army hearing, something more than ordinary was contriving in London, and that succours from Scotland were talked of, sent a petition to the Parliament, with these farther demands: "that a declaration be published against the bringing in of any foreign forces: that the army be paid up equal with the deserters thereof, and put into a constant course of pay: that the committee of the militia of London, that had been changed by ordinance of the 4th of May last, be restored, and the militia of the city speedily returned into those hands who formerly gave large testimonies of their fidelity to the Parliament and kingdom." Whereupon the Parliament declared, that whosoever should bring in foreign forces without the consent of both Houses, should be deemed traitors. It was voted likewise, that the militia of London should be restored to the old commissioners, and an ordinance was passed for that purpose.‡

The Presbyterian-party, who had great credit in the city, and possessed all the posts, could not, without extreme regret, behold the Parliament's condescension to the army, that is, to the Independents. They saw that party daily increase, and in condition to give law to the Parliament itself. For this reason, the rigid Presbyterians, seconded by the Common-council of London, formed an engagement to assist one another, and oppose the army to the utmost of their power, upon a supposition, that the army intended to subvert what had been hitherto done to settle the peace of the kingdom.

The two Houses had no sooner advice of this engagement, but they published by beat of drum, and sound of trumpet, a prohibition to sign it. On the other hand, the General loudly complained to the Parliament's commissioners, and desired them to put a speedy stop to the agitations in London, which tended to rekindle the war. At the same time, he ordered a strict inquiry to be made in the army after all cavaliers, who had borne arms for the King, or were suspected to be of his party, with a command to dismiss them forthwith.

For two or three days there was a great commotion

---

* In this petition, the city complained of the arbitrary power exercised by the Parliament's committees, as well as of the ill-management of the public money, and desired:

"I. That present command be given, that no officer of war, or soldier, do enter London, under pretence of receiving their arrears.

"II. That such officers and soldiers as are already paid, if their usual habitation and employment have been within London, be enjoined forthwith to betake themselves to their calling; and such as have dwellings in the country, be required to depart within two days after publication.

"III. That all who have been in arms against the Parliament, be enjoined upon pain of imprisonment, within twenty-four hours after publication, to repair to their several habitations.

"IV. That such commanders and soldiers as have come in from the army, and received their monies, may be otherwise disposed of as the Parliament should think fit.

"V. That all persons whosoever that are possessed of any monies or goods belonging to the public, may be enjoined to bring the same, within one month after publication, into some public treasury.

"VI. That all public revenues be managed under such commissions, and by such persons, as, notwithstanding any privileges of Parliament, may be held to such rules as are or shall be prescribed therein.

"VII. That the Parliament would for the present lay aside all businesses of lesser consequence, and improve their time and utmost endeavour, that such laws may be prepared for his Majesty's concurrence, as may settle the government of the church, secure the people from all unlawful and arbitrary power whatsoever in future, and restore his Majesty to his just rights and authority, according to the covenant.

"VIII. And that the people may be the better secured to enjoy the intended effects of such laws, as shall be so made with the royal assent, that especial care be taken, that all officers of state, and ministers of justice, may be persons of honour, of considerable interest, and of known integrity.

"IX. That the Parliament would please to provide for the carrying on of the affairs in Ireland.

"X. That by just and good means the correspondence with Scotland may be maintained and preserved.

"XI. That the House of Commons would please to give order for a speedy examination of all unlawful elections and returns of the members thereof.

"XII. That some speedy course may be taken for the deciding of all causes formerly determinable in the court of admiralty.

"XIII. That satisfaction being made by delinquents, an act of oblivion may be passed."

† They were the Earl of Nottingham, Lord Wharton, Skippon, Sir Henry Vane, Junior, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Colonel White, Thomas Scawen, and Thomas Povey, Esqs.

‡ To understand this article, it must be observed, that in the beginning of May last, both Houses perceiving some motions in the army, thought proper to secure the militia of London, and put it into such hands as they could confide in. To that end, they passed an ordinance the 4th of May, for chusing a new committee of the militia of London, by which means none were admitted into this committee, or any office of the militia, but Presbyterians, entirely devoted to the party. This change it was, that both Houses repealed, at the army's request, and restored the former commissioners.

in

in London: assemblies were held, soldiers were listed, and orders given them to be ready on the first notice. The Common-council received two petitions, one from a great number of substantial citizens, the other from the young men and apprentices, to desire, "That the militia might be continued, and settled by ordinance of the 4th of May." The Common-council presented to the Commons a petition accordingly.

The Parliament was not a little embarrassed, considering the impossibility of contenting at the same time, the army and the city, whose desires were diametrically opposite.

July the 26th, a great number of young men and apprentices came to Westminster, and presented a petition to the House of Commons, desiring:

"That the ordinance of the 23d of July for change of the militia of London, be immediately repealed; that the city may be vindicated against a late pretended declaration, that those are traitors who shall act to get subscriptions, and that it may be revoked; and that both Houses do presently make an order, for calling in all absent members, especially the eleven late accused members, against whom there has been nothing proved to this day."

These demands were such, considering the present juncture, that it was no wonder much time was spent in debating by both Houses. But the people without, growing impatient, and perceiving, these debates were intended only to amuse them, made a great noise in the outer rooms. Some knocked at the door of the House. Others threw in stones at the windows of the House of Peers. In a word, they very plainly showed they would not suffer the two Houses to rise, before they had received satisfaction. At last, both Houses seeing it would be in vain to resist the multitude, who threatened to tear them in pieces, voted, "that the ordinance of the 23d of July, for settling the militia of London, and the declaration of the 24th of the same intent, be null and void." This done the House of Commons adjourned till next day. But the multitude constrained the Speaker and members to resume their places, and desired them to vote, that the King should come to London; which was done accordingly. On the morrow both Houses being met, adjourned to the 30th.

On the 28th, the Common-council received a letter from the General, expressing his good affection and tender care of the city, but withal his great dislike of the petition, and the means used to promote it. At the same time, many young men and others attended the Common-council, declaring their readiness to support the just privileges of the city against all opposers. Whereupon a letter was sent by a messenger to the General, and six commissioners appointed to follow the next morning. In the letter, "they declared their inclination to peace, intreating him, that the army might not advance, nor intermeddle with the rights and privileges of the city, conceiving that the strengthening the city for the safety thereof, was no just cause to provoke the soldiers: and as for the petition, the Parliament had already declared their sense of it, and therefore it was needless for them to do it, and the rather for that it had never been formally presented to him."

The Common-council having received intelligence that the army was advancing towards London, orders were given for the trained-bands to go to their works, and for all that could bear arms to appear the next morning at several places.

Both Houses meeting the 30th of July, the two Speakers did not appear, which obliged them to chuse others in their room.* With the Speakers, a number of members of both Houses were also departed from London, without any one's knowing whither. The absence of these members, who were all friends to the army, rendered the contrary party so superior, that the Commons voted the same day, that the King should come to London: that the militia of the city should have full power to raise such forces as they should think fit, for the defence thereof: that they should chuse a commander-in-chief to be approved by the House, and such commander to present other officers, to be approved by the militia. After that the committee made choice of Major-General Massey to command-in-chief, and ordered, that all reformadoes and other officers should the next day appear to be listed in St. James's fields, and the forces already listed to be put into a regimental way.

The same day, the Common-council received a letter from General Fairfax, dated the day before, wherein he spoke very sharply of the tumult of the 26th, and of the violence upon the Parliament. He said, the guard sent from the city, not only neglected their duty, but that divers of the Common-council greatly encouraged the seditious. That they had not kept their word with the army, which, upon their assurance to secure the Parliament from any time, had removed to that distance from the city. That he could not but look on them as accountable to the kingdom, for the present interruptions of the hopeful way of peace and settlement of the nation, if by their care and industry the chief actors in the late tumults were not detected and given up to justice.

On the other hand, the city published an apology by way of declaration or manifesto, setting forth, "The army's surprising of the King at Holmby, without its being known by what authority; and under what pretences; and their keeping his royal person ever since, notwithstanding his surprisal was disowned by the general for himself and all the officers about him, and for the body of the army. That the privileges of Parliament had been violated by the army's causing the eleven members to withdraw, and by interposing in the militia of London, which was subject to no other cognizance but of the King and Parliament." There were several other things in this manifesto, which insinuated that the army's ill designs were but too evident.

Both Houses also wrote to the general, that though he had given them no account of the motions of his army, they understood, he had ordered his forces to march towards London, on pretence of defending the Houses from the danger of tumults; upon which account they thought fit to let him know, that as they could not but have a deep sense of the undue liberty which some apprentices and others had taken, to violate the freedom of Parliament, so they doubted not, but the sense of so great an offence would at last strike those that were accessary thereto with a detestation of any such practices for the future: and that as the Houses could not imagine, these disorders had the allowance of the city of London, so they had since received full satisfaction by the strict orders published by the Common-council for preventing and suppressing of tumults, and by their declaration, that they should sit with freedom and security from any disturbances for the future. And therefore they saw no cause to command the army to come to their assistance, but rather judged (by their distractions raised at the news thereof) that the army's approach was likely to produce great mischiefs, and cast the whole kingdom into confusion. That for prevention of these dangers, they had sent him an express to withdraw his army, requiring him to give exact obedience thereto.

The same day the Commons voted, that the eleven accused members should be received into the House: accordingly most of them came and took their places on the morrow.

On the 31st the two Houses published an ordinance, enabling the committee of the militia of London to punish such as did not repair to their colours, and to chuse a Major-General, or any other officer, for the forces raised or to be raised within the city of London; and Massey, Waller, and Pointz were employed in forming regiments and companies.

Though the Parliament and city made great preparations, the army were under no apprehensions. They knew, that two or three days were not sufficient to discipline an army levied in haste in the city, and enable it to withstand twenty thousand victorious troops, well supplied with arms, ammunition, and ordnance. They continued therefore their march to the general rendezvous at Hounslow-heath, within twelve miles of London. Meanwhile, the General delivered to the Parliament's commissioners, certain proposals to be negotiated between the Parliament and army, for settling the peace of the kingdom. At the same time, he put into their hands a declaration by the council of war, wherein the officers said, though the late violence done to the Parliament rendered all proceedings in the way of treaty vain and hopeless, till the Parliament should be restored to a condition of freedom, yet they had thought good to make this public tender of proposals to the consideration of the kingdom, wherein all men might see the integrity of their intentions, and the bottom of their desires.

Meanwhile, the two Speakers, and the rest of the members of both Houses who had absented themselves, to the number of sixty-six, came to the General, desiring his protection, and saying, that as there was no free sitting for them in the Parliament, they had quitted the Houses for fear of being torn in pieces by the mob. Nothing could be more agreeable to the army than this request, which authorised them, without their being forced to seek other pretences, to march to London to re-instate the members supposed to be driven from the Parliament by the populace. From that time, they would no more own the two Houses for Parliament, but paid to the speakers and members who attended them, the same respect as they would have done to the Parliament itself.

The army improved the desertion of these members to justify their advance towards London, and to show that their aim was only to prevent a new war, which the members at Westminster, and the Common-council of London, had a mind to excite. To this purpose, they published a long manifesto, containing the reasons of their marching to London. The next day, the army being drawn together on Hounslow-heath,* the Common-council of London began to fear the danger to which the city would be exposed, if the army should force the line, which was but too likely, and this apprehension caused them to take more moderate resolutions.† So, taking occasion from the army's late declaration, they wrote to the General, that understanding that the army's intention was only to restore the absent members to their places in the Parliament, the city was ready to concur with them in their design. That accordingly, he should find all ports and passes open, and for removing all misunderstanding, they had recalled their late declaration. The General answered, that he wished all the forts on the west side of the city were delivered to him, and he was immediately obeyed. After that, he wrote to the Common-council, that the preserving of the privileges of the Parliament, and securing the members from violence, had been the sole cause of his near approach to that city.

The 6th of August, the General, preceded by some regiments of horse, and attended by the two old speakers, and the members who had absented themselves, came to Westminster, and alighted at Sir Abraham Williams's house in New Palace Yard. He staid there some time, whilst the two speakers,‡ and the rest of the members repaired to their respective houses.

Presently after, the House of Peers passed an ordinance for making General Fairfax Constable of the Tower, with power to name a deputy, to which the Commons consented. After that, the General was desired to come to the Parliament, where he received the thanks of both Houses. The same day, the Parliament ordered, that the 12th should be a day of thanksgiving to God, for restoring the members of both Houses to their just privileges, without the effusion of blood, and that a gratuity of a month's pay should be given to the non-commissioned officers and soldiers for this great service. The following days were spent in approving and ratifying what the army had done. But this was not all. The Lords demanded two things, which the Commons very much opposed. The first was, the making null all acts, done from the 26th of July, to the 6th of August. The Commons were ready to give their consent, provided it was without declaring them illegal. This dispute held till the 20th, when the Commons passed at length the ordinance demanded by the Peers, but with this restriction: "That no person shall be impeached or punished, for his acting by, or upon, the said votes, orders, or ordinances, unless he shall be found guilty of contriving or abetting the visible force put upon the Parliament, or of entering into, or promoting the late engagement, for the bringing the King to the city, upon the terms and conditions expressed in his Majesty's letters of the 12th of May last."

The second thing desired by the Lords, was, that it should be declared, the Parliament was not free from the 26th of July, to the 6th of August, and that the members who assembled at Westminster, in the absence of the speakers, should be expelled the Parliament and punished. This question being debated a whole day in the House of Commons, was carried in the negative, but by three voices.§ The Lords insisted upon this point merely out of compliance to the army, who, by a remonstrance to the Parliament, had demanded the same thing, declaring, they could not suffer such members as sate and voted during the absence of the speakers, to intrude themselves into the Parliament before they had given satisfaction to their respective Houses. Nevertheless, this affair was carried no farther. Only seven Lords, with the Lord Mayor, several Aldermen, and some officers of the militia, were accused of high treason, for being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July, which was called, intending to excite a new war.

Whilst these things passed between the Parliament and army, the King was not only very quiet, but even entertained great hopes from this division, and flattered himself, that the army would declare for him. Their civility and complaisance to him seemed to promise him a happier state, than when in the hands of the Parliament. Four of his chaplains were allowed to come to him, and celebrate divine service, after the manner of the church of England, and all his old servants and domestics had liberty to see and speak with him. Berkley, Ashburnham, Capel, the Marquis of Ormond himself, who had at last surrendered Dublin to the Parliament, saw him as often as they pleased in public or private, and the two first were now in his service. The Scotch commissioners residing at London, frequently visited him, and expressed a great desire to serve him. As they knew, that the Independents were sworn enemies of their nation, they began to perceive, it was their interest to join with the King against their common enemies. Meanwhile, the civilities shown the King were but the effect of the policy of Cromwell and his associates. They were not ignorant how the Parliament and city of London stood affected to them, and were persuaded, that after all, the Presbyterians would chuse rather to agree with the King, than see the Inde-

* At this rendezvous were present the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, Kent; the Lords Grey of Werk, Howard, Wharton, Say, and Mulgrave, and others, about fourteen Lords; the Speaker, and about a hundred members of the House of Commons. The army, consisting of twenty thousand horse and foot, being drawn up in battalia, with reserves, the General, accompanied with these Lords and Commoners, and other Gentlemen, rode along, and took a view of the army, from regiment to regiment, who received them with great acclamations of the soldiers, crying, "Lords and Commons, and a free Parliament." The Prince Elector Valentine came also and viewed the army, being received by the General with great respect.

† When a scout came in, whilst the city militia and common-council were sitting, and brought news, That the army made a halt, or other good intelligence, they cried, One and all. But if the scouts brought intelligence that the army advanced nearer to them, then they would cry as loud, Treat, treat, treat. At last, they agreed to send the General an humble letter.

‡ The Earl of Manchester for the Lords, and Lenthall for the Commons.

§ The question put was, "Whether it should be declared, what was done from the 26th of July to the 6th of August to be forced, and that sitting no free Parliament?" Which was carried in the negative. The other part of the question, as put by Rapin, was not debated at this time.

pendents triumph. To prevent this union it was, that they had caused the King to be removed from Holmby, without either the general officers, or the body of the army appearing in it, to a place where his person was in their power. On the other hand, the King was extremely caressed by them, and even put in hopes of a speedy agreement with the army, as well to divert him from the thoughts of uniting with the Parliament, as to deprive the Presbyterians of the hope of such an union. In every declaration and remonstrance of the army, there was always something inserted to express their desire, that the King might be restored to his just rights. But it was ever with this restriction, "When the affairs of the government should be fully settled," that is, in the manner they desired, and they knew, it would then be easy to find occasion to quarrel with the King, and retract what they seemed to promise him.

The King was deceived by this policy. As he saw himself courted by both parties, he imagined, they could not be without him, and that he should quickly be able to incline the scale to which side he pleased. He even fancied for some time, that the two parties would accept him for mediator. In this imagination he expressed a regard for both, and told them by turns, though secretly, he would be guided by their counsels. Meanwhile, as he mortally hated the Presbyterians, he was much more desirous to join with the army, if they would but have granted him tolerable conditions, as they made him expect. Nevertheless, he listened to the proposals of the Scotch commissioners, to put himself under the protection of the Presbyterians and Scots, and thereby hoped to be safe, however the contests between the Parliament and army might end. In the mean time, he suffered himself to be amused by Cromwell, and Ireton, who, on pretence they were suspected by both Houses, seldom visited him, but however, acquainted him with their intentions, by means of some officers, who could converse more freely with him, or his confidents. Though he was used very civilly, he was narrowly watched, and at the very time he thought himself arbiter of the two parties, was really a prisoner. Since his removal from Holmby, he had followed the motions of the army, and resided sometimes in a town, and sometimes at a country house, according as the army thought fit. At last, when the army had their rendezvous on Hounslow-heath, in order to march to London, he was conducted to Hampton-court.*

The revolution, which happened within a few days, and which brought the Parliament in subjection to the army, proved fatal to the King. He had quickly cause to perceive, Cromwell and Ireton had only amused him with vain hopes. The army was no sooner master of the Parliament and city, but the King saw himself not only neglected, but even treated more hardly than ever. The same respect was no longer paid him, and his guards would scarcely suffer his servants to confer with him in private. In short, he was left a long while at Hampton-court, without mention of any accommodation, whilst his words, his actions, and the persons that came to visit him, were carefully watched. Even the Scotch commissioners were hindered from seeing him.

When the army resolved to oppose the Parliament's design to disband them, they pretended, they would meddle only in their own affairs, without concerning themselves with the government of church or state; but as soon as they had the King in their power, they pretended to a right of settling the government of the kingdom with the Parliament; and they actually nominated commissioners to treat upon that subject, with those of the Parliament.†

Since the army had thought themselves out of danger from the Parliament and city, their respect to the King was so diminished, that it was easy for him to perceive, he had nothing to expect from them, and that Cromwell had only amused him, the better to accomplish his own designs. Besides the visible alteration in the behaviour of those who had the custody of him, he had many other proofs of ill designs against him. In the first place, the army had sent him privately some propositions for peace, much worse than those presented to him at Newcastle; but he had rejected them with indignation, which the army very much resented. Secondly, Cromwell had very sharply reproached Ashburnham, who was then the King's confident, that notwithstanding the army's regard for his Majesty, he had secretly treated with the commissioners of Scotland to excite that kingdom against the army. This reproach inspired the King with the more dread, as it was true, that he had privately treated with the Scotch commissioners, though he had concluded nothing with them; and could not conceive how Cromwell came to know it. He was therefore apprehensive, the army would assassinate, or poison him, to free themselves from the fear of his agreeing with the Presbyterians. On the other hand, Major Huntington, who had been employed by Cromwell, to amuse the King with several private messages, finding at length he had been the instrument to deceive that unfortunate Prince, warned him, that Cromwell was not sincere, and would destroy him if he was not prevented. Shortly after he threw up his commission, and would serve no longer in the army. He even went farther; for after quitting the service, he offered to discover to the Parliament, Cromwell's ill practices, but they would not hearken to him. At last, the King received private notice every day, by indirect and extraordinary ways, that his enemies had ill designs, and he ought to take care of himself.‡

All these things made such an impression upon him, that he resolved, if possible, to escape out of the hands of the army. But it was not easy to determine where to retire. There was no safety for him in any part of the kingdom. The Parliament and city of London were at the army's command, and though the Presbyterians had been able to protect him, all he could expect from them was, that they would not attempt upon his life. So, probably, his intention was to transport himself beyond the seas. Ashburnham was his only confident, for though he believed Berkley faithful, he had not so good an opinion of his discretion, as to trust him with such a secret. This resolution being taken, the King withdrew very early to his chamber, feigning to be indisposed, and about one in the morn-

* June 24, he was removed from Newmarket to Royston; the 26th, he came to Hatfield-house in Hertfordshire; July 1, to Windsor; July 3, to Caversham, a house of the Lord Craven's, near Reading; July 22, to the Earl of Devonshire's house at Latimers; thence to Woburn, the Earl of Bedford's; and then to Stoke-pogey's and Oatland's. Whilst he was at Caversham, July 15, his children, now under the Earl of Northumberland's care, were permitted to dine with him at Maidenhead, and afterwards to go and stay with him two days at Caversham. Prince James had been in the Parliament's hands ever since the surrender of Oxford. This favour was denied him whilst he was at Holmby. Concerning this interview, Ludlow relates the following story. Cromwell meeting soon after Sir John Berkley, told him, that he had lately seen the tenderest sight that ever his eyes beheld, which was the interview between the King and his children; that he (Cromwell) wept plentifully at the remembrance thereof, saying, that never man was so abused as he, in his sinister opinion of the King, who, he thought, was the most upright and conscientious in the kingdom.

† Three other affairs also employed the Parliament and army for some time, and served for pretence to amuse. The first was, to settle what forces should be sent to Ireland; the second, how many troops were to be maintained in England; the third, to disband the supernumeraries. Upon the first article, it was resolved to send into Ireland six thousand foot, four thousand horse, and five hundred dragoons; and that the Parliament's commissioners should confer with the General concerning the sending these forces, and the officers that were to command them. Upon the second, it was ordered there should be maintained in England, seven thousand two hundred horse, eighteen thousand foot, and one thousand dragoons. It was pretended, these forces were continued in England to relieve those in Ireland in case of need. But it is likely, the army would not bear to be considerably lessened. Upon the third, it was resolved, that all the supernumeraries should be paid and dismissed. But these things were executed very slowly by reason of several unexpected affairs.

‡ The agitators suspected, that Cromwell, Ireton, &c. had carried on a private treaty with the King, and accordingly endeavoured to wrest him out of their hands. Of this Cromwell gave the King notice, who thereupon resolved to make his escape from Hampton-court. Lord Holles says, Cromwell was afraid the King should come to an agreement with the Levellers, and so advised him to fly, upon pretence that his life was in danger.

ing, went out by the back stairs, and came with Ashburnham and Legg, to the garden gate, where Berkley waited with horses. They rode all night with great speed, as well to escape all pursuers, as to get out of the quarters of the army, and in the morning, found themselves in the New Forest in Hampshire. Then the King asked Ashburnham, where the ship lay? Ashburnham riding before, as it were to get information, returned in some little time without any news of the ship; at which the King seemed very uneasy. Meanwhile, as it was not safe for him to stay in the high-ways he resolved to go to Titchfield, a seat of the Earl of Southampton, where the Earl's mother then lived with a small family. There he consulted with his three attendants, where he should go. It is said, Ashburnham was the first to advise him to retire to the Isle of Wight, and put himself into the hands of Colonel Hammond, the governor, who was reckoned a man of honour. He must however have known, that Hammond was Cromwell's creature, by whose advice he had married a daughter of John Hampden, and who had lately procured him the government of the Isle of Wight. Notwithstanding these reasons, which should have diverted Ashburnham from giving such advice, he ceased not to persuade the King, who after some objections consented to it, provided Hammond would faithfully promise not to deliver him up, though the Parliament or army should require him, but to give him his liberty to shift for himself, if he was not able to defend him. Pursuant to this resolution, Ashburnham and Berkley repaired to the Isle of Wight to talk with the governor, who seemed very much surprised when they told him, the King was escaped from Hampton-court, and was willing to trust his person in his hands, upon the forementioned terms. His answer was, he would do the King all the service that lay in his power; but as he was an inferior officer, he could not promise to disobey his superiors in what they should please to command him. After some fruitless endeavours to obtain a promise from him, he asked where the King was? They told him, he was not very far off, and at last, after some time spent in debate, it was agreed, he should go with them to the King. So they all three went together to Titchfield, and at their arrival, Hammond staid below, and Ashburnham went up to the King's chamber, to acquaint him, that Hammond was in the house, but had not made any promise. Whereupon the King cried out, "O Jack, thou hast undone me!" With which Ashburnham falling into a great passion of weeping, offered to go down and kill Hammond, but the King would not consent to it. In short, the King sending for Hammond, endeavoured to persuade him to promise not to deliver him up, but Hammond still persisted in his first answer. Then the King, not knowing where to go else, and considering there was now perhaps no possible way to get from him, as he had the command of the country, and could call in what help he pleased, resolved to go with him to the Isle of Wight. He was conducted to Carisbrook castle, where Hammond received him with his attendants, with all demonstrations of respect.*

When we consider all the circumstances of the King's flight, we can scarcely forbear thinking, he was betrayed on this occasion. Ashburnham is not satisfied with proposing to the King to trust himself with Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, who, according to Major Huntington's information, had resolved to destroy him, but even puts him under the necessity of confiding in him, though he refused to promise him protection. Yet Lord Clarendon says positively, he does not believe the King was betrayed by Ashburnham, nor did his Majesty ever entertain the least jealousy of it. All therefore can be said in favour of this confident of the King, is, what Lord Clarendon hints; namely, that he was outwitted by Cromwell, who by some one of his emissaries persuaded him, it should prove for his Majesty's benefit, and his business be the sooner done, that he should withdraw to the Isle of Wight.†

The Parliament was informed of the King's escape, by a letter from Cromwell, who gave the first notice of it, but without saying where the King was, though in all appearance he knew very well. He also sent a letter, which the King had left upon the table in his room, directed to both Houses. He said in this letter,

"That liberty being in all times the aim and desire of all men, he had endeavoured to obtain his. He called God to witness, with what patience he had endured a tedious restraint, among men who changed their principles with their condition; who were not ashamed openly to intend the destruction of the nobility, by taking away their negative voice, and with whom the Levellers' doctrine was rather countenanced than punished. That he thought he was bound, as well by natural as political obligation, to seek his safety, by retiring himself for some time from the public view, both of his friends and enemies; but should earnestly and incessantly endeavour the settling of a safe and well-grounded peace wherever he was. Finally, he desired to be heard with freedom, honour, and safety, and then he would instantly break through his cloud of retirement, and show himself ready to be Pater Patriæ."

The Parliament at first believed, the King was come to conceal himself in London, till he should find an opportunity to escape out of the kingdom. They even gave orders to search after, and stop his person. But this uncertainty did not last long. On the 15th of November, the Earl of Manchester, Speaker of the House of Lords, received a letter from Colonel Hammond, informing him, that the King, from an apprehension of his life being in danger at Hampton-court, was come into the Isle of Wight, to put himself under his protection.

The King, as may be observed, speaks in his letter of the principles of the Levellers, which it is necessary to explain. There had been for some time a new faction in the army, called Levellers, that is, men who declared, "That all degrees of persons should be levelled, and an equality established both in titles and estates, throughout the kingdom." This was a doctrine, much like that of Wat Tyler's followers in the reign of Richard II. This faction was grown so strong, that they began to make the general officers, and particularly Cromwell, very uneasy, who feared this new party would subvert all his projects if they were suffered to increase, though probably, this spirit was raised by himself. They consisted of private soldiers and agitators, whom we have already described. During the contests between the army and Parliament, the generals had put no restraint upon these men. They had allowed them to form a separate council, by means of their agitators, and the opinions of this council were received as being those of the army, because they were agreeable to the sentiments of the general officers. But as soon as the Parliament was subdued, the general officers believed it proper to suppress these councils, and send the agitators to their respective regiments. This was more easily enjoined than executed. The soldiers refused to obey, and continued their assemblies and conferences, in spite of their officers, and the General's orders. The assemblies of the Levellers produced sundry petitions; first, from the agitators of four regiments of horse, and afterwards of seven regiments of foot joining with them, wherein they made proposals for settling the government according to their humour, so that the general officers were not a little embarrassed. They were afraid the army would divide, at a time when their whole strength depended upon their union. For this reason, they at first bore in some measure with the Levellers; which only increased the evil. At last, the insolence of these men being grown to a monstrous height, Cromwell undertook, with the hazard of his life, to free the army and Parliament from them. To that end, having notice that the Levellers were to meet at a certain place, he came unexpectedly, attended with a chosen guard, and asking some questions of those whom he observed most active, and receiving insolent answers, knocked down two or three with his own hand, and briskly charging the rest, so dispersed them, that he took as many as he pleased, whereof he hanged some on the spot, and sent others to London. By two or three such notable encounters, he totally subdued that party, which began to grow very dangerous, and reduced the army to entire obedience. But this was not yet effected, when the King made this escape from Hampton-court, and therefore he mentions the Levellers in his letter, as a party subsisting.*

When the King wrote this letter to both Houses, he hoped to be quickly out of the power of the army and Parliament, and assuredly expected no answer, since he intended to keep himself concealed. Besides, this letter required no answer, as he did nothing more than express his desire of peace. But finding himself still, contrary to his expectation, in the hands of the army and Parliament, he conceived, his escape from Hampton-court might be prejudicial to him, and interpreted as a design to hide himself, only to avoid answering the propositions for peace, the Parliament had prepared. For this reason, he resolved to send a message to both Houses; in which he offered to resign, during his own life, the power of the militia, and the nomination to all the great offices; provided that, after his demise, these prerogatives should revert to the crown.

The Parliament took no notice of these offers. Suddenly, however, the House of Lords acquainted the Commons at a conference, that having more maturely considered the King's last message, they were disposed to admit him to a personal treaty, on condition he would give his assent to four preliminary propositions to be passed into acts before the rest should be treated on.

I. An act for settling the militia of the kingdom.

II. An act for calling in all declarations, oaths, and proclamations, against the Parliament, and those who adhered to them.

III. An act, that those Lords who were made after the Great-Seal was carried to Oxford, may be made incapable of sitting in the House of Peers.

IV. An act for impowering the two Houses of Parliament to adjourn as they shall think fit.

The next day, the Commons gave their consent to these propositions, and ordered, that the four bills should be drawn, and dispatched to his Majesty, after which a personal treaty with him should be entered into. All this was done with so great expedition, that it was not possible for the Independents to prevent what they were not prepared against. The Scotch commissioners, who had formed other projects, tried in vain to hinder the effect of this resolution. The 6th of December, the King sent a fresh message to both Houses, earnestly pressing for a personal treaty, as being the best means for settling a peace.

The 14th of the same month, the Commons, after passing the four bills, and approving the instructions for those that were to present them, named a committee to carry them to the King.

Then they answered the complaints of the Scotch commissioners, that the four bills were not communicated to them. They said, it was contrary to the rights and privileges of Parliament, to communicate bills to any person whatever, before they had received the royal assent, and that there was nothing in the treaty between the two kingdoms to the contrary: that they desired the Scotch commissioners to prepare such propositions as they should judge necessary for the kingdom of Scotland, that the committee might depart on the 20th.

That day, the Scotch commissioners presented to both Houses a long declaration, complaining in very high language, that the Parliament of England violated the covenant, in labouring for peace without the concurrence of Scotland. They insisted upon a personal treaty between the King, both Houses, and themselves, that peace might be settled with mutual consent; and declared, as they could not agree to the sending of the four bills to his Majesty for his assent, before any treaty upon the rest of the propositions, so they were unsatisfied with the matter of these new proposals lately communicated to them; and desired, that there might be a personal treaty with the King, upon such propositions as should be agreed upon, with advice and consent of both kingdoms.

This declaration gave great offence to both Houses. Their reply to it was answerable in terms, to the language used by the Scots; and it was ordered, that the printer of the declaration should be committed to prison.

In short, notwithstanding the opposition of the Scotch commissioners, the four bills were presented to the King the 24th of December. The next day, the Scotch commissioners came to the Isle of Wight, and delivered to the King, a declaration of their dissent to the propositions they had lately seen, and the four bills brought to his Majesty. After that, they had a conference with the King, wherein some things passed, which long remained secret, but which it will be necessary to relate, because on them turned the events mentioned hereafter.

Since the King had been in the power of the army, the Scots feared, he would unite with them. They knew they were mortally hated by the Independents, and consequently, this union could not but be very prejudicial to Scotland. The army's success against the Parliament and city of London increased their fear very much, and put them upon seeking means to prevent, as they thought, the impending danger. They found no properer means, than to join with the King, provided he could be persuaded to approve of the covenant, and abolish episcopacy in England. In their frequent conferences with him at Hampton-court, they intimated, that when he was delivered to the Parliament, it was not with the advice of all Scotland, but only by the Marquis of Argyle's credit, who tyrannized over the kingdom: that all the Scots were displeased with it, and ready to atone for the fault, by assisting him with all their power to recover his just rights. But they added, that to engage the Scots to employ their forces to this end, his Majesty was to give them satisfaction concerning the covenant, and the abolition of episcopacy in England, for otherwise, he could not expect the assistance of the English Presbyterians, which was absolutely necessary. In a word, they made him hope, that the Scots would enter England with a strong army which, by the junction of the King's party, and English Presbyterians, would become so superior to the army of the Independents, that he might almost be assured, nothing would be capable to oppose his restoration.

These overtures were the more agreeable to the King, as the Duke of Hamilton, after his freedom from imprisonment by the army, had declared to the King's friends, he was ready to do his Majesty all the service that lay in his power. On the other hand, the Marquis of Ormond had informed the King of his project to return into Ireland, join with the Lord Inchiquin, whom he had privately gained, with some of the heads of the rebels, and make war upon the Parliament, affirming, that France had promised to supply him with all necessaries. It was very probable, that the union between the King's party, the English Presbyterians, and the Scots, added to a diversion in Ireland, would very much embarrass the Independents, and disable them to withstand so great a force. But to execute this project, the King was to approve of the covenant, and consent to the abolition of episcopacy, which he could never resolve. These were the two stumbling blocks, which hindered him from concluding a treaty with the Scotch commissioners, before his flight from Hampton-court. He would never grant these two points, and in expectation that by his steadiness he should induce the Scots to desist from their desires, quitted Hampton-court, without any agreement with them. When therefore he so earnestly pressed for a personal treaty at London, with honour, freedom, and safety, it was in order to treat more commodiously with the Scotch commissioners, and consult with his friends, what could be expected as well from his own, as the Presbyterian party; and doubtless, in case he concluded a treaty with them, his design was to prolong the negotiation with the two Houses, till the Scotch army had entered England, and his old and new friends laid all their measures. It was very likely, this league would find the army so much employment, that they would not be able to subdue, a second time, the Parliament and city of London. Accordingly, this was the end the Scotch commissioners proposed to themselves, in their objections to the propositions, and in their demand of a personal treaty with the King, upon such proposals as should be agreed upon by both kingdoms, being well assured, it would be easy for them to prolong the time, till every thing should be ready.

* Though Cromwell totally subdued that spirit in the army, Lord Clarendon says, it continued and increased very much in the kingdom.

The method the two Houses took to procure the King's consent to the four bills, amongst which was that of the militia, before they admitted him to a personal treaty, convinced him, they had no design to relax upon any of the principal articles. He considered, that after passing these four bills, he should still be forced to treat on propositions much like those presented to him at Newcastle: that, after all, what both Houses called treating, was according to their ideas, consenting to their demands, and upon the least refusal to grant what should be proposed to him, he should be, perhaps, more closely confined, when he had past one of the most important points in dispute: that then, he should not be able to treat with the Scots, and by passing the four bills, should lose the present opportunity, which would never offer again. These considerations determined him to agree with the Scotch commissioners, at a second conference with them, the 25th of December. As there was no time to lose, the Parliament's commissioners having orders to stay but four days in the Isle of Wight, the Scotch commissioners had brought with them a treaty ready drawn, agreeably to the propositions they had made the King at Hampton-court. This treaty was signed by the King and the Scotch commissioners the next day, December the 26th, the King having had but few hours to resolve. He then delivered his answer to the commissioners of the Parliament, to this effect:

"That his Majesty had always thought it a matter of great difficulty, to comply in such a manner with all engaged interests, that a firm and lasting peace might ensue; in which opinion he was now confirmed, since the commissioners for Scotland did solemnly protest against the several bills, and propositions, which the two Houses of Parliament had presented to him for his assent; so that it was not possible for him to give such an answer as might be the foundation of a hopeful peace. That besides, the four bills as they were offered to him did not only divest him of all sovereignty, and leave him without any possibility of recovering it to him or his successors, but opened a door for all intolerable oppressions upon his subjects, he granting such an arbitrary and illimited power to the two Houses. That neither the desire of being freed from that tedious and irksome condition of life, which he had so long suffered, nor the apprehension of any thing that might befall him, should ever prevail with him to consent to any one act, till the conditions of the whole peace should be concluded; and then that he would be ready to give all just and reasonable satisfaction, in all particulars; and for the adjusting of all this, he knew no way but a personal treaty (and therefore very earnestly desired the two Houses to consent to it) to be either at London, or any other place they would rather choose."

The commissioners were no sooner gone, than Governor Hammond, by Sir Thomas Fairfax's order, caused all the King's servants to be put out of the castle, who till then had been permitted to be with him, and confined him so closely, that no man had liberty to go to him without express leave.

It was not in vain that the governor took these precautions, since, immediately after, one Captain Burley, an inhabitant of the island, who had been general of the ordnance in one of the King's armies, endeavoured to excite the people to rescue the King from his captivity. But he laid his measures so ill, that instead of executing his design he was apprehended, and afterwards condemned, and hanged, drawn, and quartered.

The King's answer being read in the House of Commons, several members spoke against the King with great warmth. Cromwell, among others, said, "That the King was a man of great parts, and great understanding, but that he was so great a dissembler, and so false a man, that he was not to be trusted. That whilst he professed with all solemnity that he referred himself wholly to the Parliament, and depended only upon their wisdom and counsel for the settlement and composing the distractions of the kingdom, he had at the same time secret treaties with the Scottish commissioners, how he might imbroil the nation in a new war, and destroy the Parliament. He concluded, that they might no farther trouble themselves with sending messages to him, or farther propositions, but that they might enter upon those counsels which were necessary towards the settlement of the kingdom, without having farther recourse to the King." This advice being strongly seconded by some other members, it was at length resolved after a long debate from morning till late at night, that no more addresses should be made to, or messages received from, the King, and that a declaration should be published to satisfy the kingdom of the reason of it. This declaration was prepared in a very short time. It contained all the reproaches cast upon the King in 1641, in the remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, and whatever had been complained of since that time, not without a direct insinuation that the King, when Prince of Wales, had conspired with the Duke of Buckingham against his father's life. They charged him with having openly betrayed the interests of the Protestant religion, by lending his ships to the King of France, who employed them against Rochelle. When this declaration came to be debated, it met with much opposition even in the House of Commons. But the contrary party to the King did what is daily practised in the Parliament. They suffered the opposers of the declaration to talk as much as they pleased, and then called for the question, which was carried by a plurality of voices; after which the declaration was sent to the House of Peers, where it passed without any difficulty.

The Scotch commissioners, before they returned home, communicated their designs to the King's party, the Marquis of Ormond, and some leading Presbyterians, and early preparations were made for accomplishing the project which was forming in favour of the King. The project was as follows:—

The Scots were to send an army into England to act against the Independents, and deliver the King: the Marquis of Ormond was to return into Ireland, where the Lord Inchiquin, who commanded the Parliament's forces in Munster, had promised to declare for the King, and several heads of the rebels who were displeased with the tyrannical proceedings of the Pope's nuntio, had engaged to join the Marquis with a strong body of their troops. At the same time, the King's friends in England were to rise in several counties. The generals and officers, discarded by the new model, had promised to assemble what forces they could, to countenance the design. The nobility, gentry, and burghers being dissatisfied that the army should govern the Parliament, and all offices be conferred on persons of their party, it was not doubted but the insurrections in several parts, would be supported and encouraged. On the other hand, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and Sir Philip Musgrave, who had great interest in Yorkshire and Cumberland, engaged to seize Berwick and Carlisle. The Presbyterian party being still very numerous in the Parliament and city, were preparing openly to oppose the army, as soon as they should see it employed in so many different places. Had all these projects been well managed, and executed at the same time, probably, Cromwell would have been extremely embarrassed. But of all those who should have acted at the same time, some were too hasty, others too slow, and by that means, the army crushed them with ease one after another.

The Independents designed to be masters of the kingdom, as they were already of the Parliament and city of London. But as they found, it would not be easy to succeed in this undertaking, by the same means they had employed to subdue the city and Parliament, their aim was to make use of the Parliament and govern in their name. It was therefore their interest, that the power they had acquired over the Parliament should not be too visible, for fear of causing both Houses to lose their authority, which they meant to make use of. Cromwell, who privately directed their affairs, had found means to keep his post in the army, and his seat in Parliament, though he had been the chief promoter of the self-denying ordinance, whereby the rest of the members were excluded from all offices military and civil. Since the conclusion of the war, he had also brought into the House many more of his faction, besides those who had been there from the beginning of the Parliament. Hence the Independent party was grown very considerable in the House of Commons, as well by their number as by the junction of several other members, who, through fear, or want of judgment, suffered themselves to be led by the Independents, on some occasions where their artifices were not easy to be discovered. So, when any leading Independent spoke with warmth in the House, he seldom met with opposition, because he was considered as the mouth of the army.

The principles of the Independents were inconsistent with monarchy, with episcopacy, and with presbyterian government, and their aim was to establish a commonwealth in the state, and abolish ecclesiastical authority in the church.

The nation's interest did not require that royalty should be abolished, or the King reduced so low as to be disabled from executing the laws and protecting his subjects. But the interest of the Independents required the first of these two things, and that of the Presbyterians, the second. Herein consisted the difficulty of the King's restoration. He was very willing to consent, that the ordering of the militia, and the nomination to the great offices, should be left to both Houses of Parliament for some time. This was sufficient for the interest of the nation in general, since the people would have been freed from their fears, with respect to the government for the future. If the Presbyterians had only intended the good of the public, they would doubtless, have been satisfied with the King's offers. But they had another interest, no less dear to them, and which distinguished their party from the rest of the nation, namely, the abolition of episcopal government, which was their greatest concern.

The Scots had the same interests and views with regard to the King. They knew, the King considered the favours he had granted them, as extorted at a time when he could not deny them without great inconveniences. On the other hand, they had not confidence enough in him, to believe he would be punctual to his promises, in case he remounted the throne of England with all his prerogatives. It was their interest therefore to hinder the King from becoming too powerful in England, and this had induced them to assist the Parliament.

The design of the royalists was, in jointly labouring with the Presbyterians and Scots, to restore the King to his former state, without subjecting him to the terms already proposed. Indeed there were among them some who would not have scrupled to consent to a toleration of the Presbyterian religion, rather than hazard the King's restoration. The Queen and the court of France were of this opinion: but the King was not. He was so possessed with the necessity of episcopacy, that nothing could move him. Unfortunately for him, he had none about him but men, who, like him, believed episcopacy so essential to religion, that without bishops neither the ordination of ministers, nor consequently the administration of the sacraments, could be valid. It must not therefore be thought strange, that the King had great scruples upon this point, since, according to his principles, he could not consider the Presbyterians as members of the Christian church.

As to the King's particular views, they can only be conjectured. He was like a man that is drowning, and catches at whatever he thinks able to save him, or at least, retard his fate. His accepting the service of the Scots and Presbyterians of England, was not because he expected much from their condescension. He had too often experienced their injustice to him, to imagine they would seriously think of restoring him, without imposing upon him intolerable terms. But as necessity obliged them to offer him their assistance, so necessity forced him to accept it, if not in expectation of obtaining his desires, at least, in hopes of delaying his ruin as long as possible. For he was told, and by one that was present, that in a council of officers at Windsor, it was moved to take away his life. He hoped, very likely, by the aid of the Scots and English Presbyterians, so to strengthen his own party, that they would be in condition to act alone, when once the Independent army was dispersed, and by that means he might be freed and enabled to make a peace upon more tolerable terms than those hitherto offered. Thus by a strange blindness, the King pretended to use the Scots and Presbyterians to recover his rights, and these last pretended to make the King and his party subservient to their own designs. The King might have another view in setting the Presbyterians and Independents at variance, namely, that the weakest party would join with him without terms rather than see their enemies triumph.

The Parliament consisted of Presbyterians and Independents, and, notwithstanding the efforts of Cromwell and his party, the Presbyterians were still the majority.* But this party was considerably weakened by the absence

* Many writers of this age have asserted, that Cromwell really intended to make a private bargain with the King: a measure which had the most plausible appearances both for his safety and advancement; but that he found insuperable difficulties in reconciling to it the wild humours of the army. Salmonet, Ludlow, Holles, &c. all, especially the last, being the declared inveterate enemies of Cromwell, are the more to be credited, when they advance any fact, which may serve to apologize for his violent and criminal conduct. There prevails a story, that Cromwell intercepted a letter written to the Queen, where the King said, that he would first raise and then destroy Cromwell. But, besides that this conduct seems to contradict the character of the King, it is, on other accounts, totally unworthy of credit. It is first told by Roger Cooke, a very passionate and foolish Historian, who wrote too so late as King William's-reign; and even he mentions it as only a mere rumour, or heresay, without any foundation. In the Memoirs of Lord Broghill, we met with another story of an intercepted letter, which deserves more attention, and agrees very well with the narration here given. It is thus related by Mr. Maurice, Chaplain to Roger, Earl of Orrery: "Lord Orrery, in the time of his greatness with Cromwell, just after he had so seasonably relieved him in his great distress at Clonmell, riding out of Youghall one day with him and Ireton, they fell into discourse about the King's death. Cromwell thereupon said more than once, if the King had followed his own judgment, and had been attended by none but trusty servants, he had fooled them all; and that once they had a mind to have closed with him; but, upon some thing which happened, fell off from that design. Orrery finding them in good humour, and being alone with them, asked, if he might presume to desire to know, why they would once have closed with his Majesty, and why they did not? Cromwell very freely told him he would satisfy him in both his queries; the reason (says he) why we would have closed with the King was this: we found that the Scotch and Presbyterians began to be more powerful than we, and were likely to agree with him and leave us in the lurch. For this reason we thought it best to prevent them, by offering first to come in upon reasonable conditions: but whilst our thoughts were taken up with this subject, there came a letter to us from one of our spies, who was of the King's bed chamber, acquainting us, that our final doom was decreed that very day; that he could not possibly learn what it was, but we might discover it, if we could but intercept a letter sent from the King to the Queen, wherein he informed her of his resolution; that this letter was sown in the skirt of a saddle, and sence of eleven of their chief members driven from the House of Commons by the army. From that time, the same vigour as formerly no more appeared in that House, because it was not directed as before the exclusion of these members. Besides, this example deterred the boldest Presbyterians. So, the Independents were masters; and though the Parliament was Presbyterian, as to number, they acted like Independents, because they could not do otherwise. As the army was near London, Cromwell had opportunity to be constantly in the House, where his presence alone made the balance incline to which side he pleased, in the debates where his party was concerned. The Lords were under no less constraint than the Commons, nor less exposed to the violence of the army, which had caused seven Peers to be impeached by the Commons of high treason, under colour of their being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July. The transactions therefore of both Houses from the 6th of August 1647, till June 1648, are to be considered as directed by the army, that is, by the leading Independents.

The city of London was no less concerned in what passed, than the rest of the kingdom, and could be of great service to the party they espoused. In this great city were men of all sects and parties; but in general, it was Presbyterian, and the common-council was of the same party. The army had done what lay in their power to lessen the number of their adversaries in that council, by causing the Lord Mayor, some aldermen, and several common-council-men, to be accused and imprisoned, for the tumult of the 26th of July: but the Presbyterian party was still superior in number. In expectation of the opportunity to declare openly against the army, and the Independents, the Presbyterian party so managed, that great difficulties constantly occurred, when it was proposed to advance money for the army. The city itself was much in arrears, with respect to the sums laid upon them for the payment of the troops. They did not want excuses to delay these arrears: but the true reason was, they thereby obliged the army to take free quarters, which made the people wish to be rid of them. The expectation of the revolutions, which the entrance of the Scots into the kingdom might produce, caused the magistrates of London to continue the same conduct, being ready to do, on all occasions, whatever was in their power to be revenged of the army.

The Lord Fairfax,* general of the army, was Presbyterian, and yet he suffered himself to be guided by Cromwell, the head of the Independents. What can be said in his favour, is, that he kept the command of the army to avoid a greater mischief, for fear, if he resigned his commission, it should be given to Cromwell, as it would certainly have been.

Since the two Houses had resolved to present no more addresses to the King, nor receive any messages from him, there seemed to be a strict union between the Parliament and army. The council of war had consented, that all the supernumerary forces, not upon the present establishment, should be disbanded. The Parliament on their part gave the army sufficient security for their arrears, and published a declaration, containing the reasons, why the army ought to be continued, though the war was over. In short, the army desisted from their pretension, to meddle with affairs of state, and left the Parliament free to settle the government as they should think fit. Thus the vote for no more addresses seemed to produce such an union between the Parliament and army, that they appeared to have the same views and interests, though hitherto they had been jealous of each other. Meanwhile, the Independents, who met with no more opposition in the two Houses, being willing to be still more assured of the Parliament, caused it to be ordered, that the general should be desired to take care and guard the Parliament. Pursuant to this request, the general sent a regiment of foot to Whitehall, and another of horse to the Mews, where the King's stables stood.

Though the Scotch commissioners departed not from London till the 24th of January, they had by their letters, promoted their affairs, as soon as their treaty with the King was signed, so that it was now resolved, at Edinburgh, the committee of estates should meet the 6th of February, and the Parliament the 10th of March. This resolution was taken, notwithstanding the Marquis of Argyle's opposition, who, though a Presbyterian, was of the same principles with the Independents as to the government of the state, and had contracted a fast friendship with Cromwell and Vane. But though he ruled in great measure the rigid Presbyterians, that is, those who would not depart from a single point of the covenant, the combination was so strong, that it was not only resolved to call a Parliament, but that also the elections of the members were agreeable for the most part to the wishes of those who were for levying an army. The Parliament of England, or rather the Independent party, by whom the two Houses were directed, doubted not that the aim of those who had procured this resolution, was to support the Presbyterians of England, who were upon the brink of ruin. Wherefore they resolved to send commissioners to Scotland, as well to endeavour to content the Scots, as to observe what should pass in the Parliament, and try to strengthen the party of those who were against war.†

A. D. 1648.] At the opening of the Parliament of Scotland, studied speeches were made by several of the members, to excite the people against the English. They represented, that the army of England kept the King in captivity, and the Parliament in such subjection, that nothing was done but what the army pleased. That, contrary to the tenour of the covenant between the two nations, the Parliament had refused to debate with the Scotch commissioners, the propositions sent to the King for peace, and rejected their protestation, as if Scotland had no interest in the King: that they had in reality deposed the King by divesting him of all his prerogatives, by voting he should be no more addressed, and by hindering the Scots from having access to his person, though he was as much King of Scotland, as King of England: that it was a manifest breach of the right of the Scots, and of the covenant between the two kingdoms, and that Scotland ought to resent this affront, or resolve to become subject to England: that for these reasons, their advice was, that speedy means might be devised to send an army into England, which should no sooner enter that kingdom, but all the English, except the army, would join with them, and by that means the Parliament being restored to freedom, would re-unite with Scotland, and the covenant be punctually observed.

the bearer of it would come with the saddle upon his head about ten of the clock to the Blue Boar in Holborn, were he was to take horse for Dover. The messenger knew nothing of the letter in the saddle, though some in Dover did. We were at Windsor (said Cromwell) when we received this letter, and immediately upon the receipt of it, Ireton and I resolved to take one trusty fellow with us and go in troopers' habits to that Inn. We did so, and leaving our man at the gate of the Inn, (which had a wicket only open to let persons in and out) to watch and give us notice when any man came in with the saddle, we went into a drinking stall. We there continued drinking cans of beer till about ten of the clock, when our sentinel at the gate gave us notice that the man with the saddle was come. We rose up presently, and just as the man was leading out his horse saddled, we came up to him with drawn swords, and told him we were to search all that went in and out there; but as he looked like an honest man, we would only search his saddle, and so dismiss him. The saddle was ungirt, we carried it into the stall were we had been drinking, and ripping open one of the skirts, we there found the letter we wanted. Having thus got it into our hands; we delivered the man (whom we have left with our sentinel) his saddle, told him he was an honest fellow, and bid him go about his business; which he did, pursuing his journey without more ado, and ignorant of the harm he had suffered. We found in the letter, that his Majesty acquainted the Queen, that he was courted by both factions the Scotch Presbyterians, and the army, and that those which bade the fairest for him should have him; but yet he thought he should close with the Scotch sooner than with the other. Upon this we returned to Windsor; and finding we were not like to have good terms with the King, we from that time vowed his destruction."

The

The Parliament thought not proper to take this important motion so speedily into consideration. But to facilitate the execution of what had been resolved before their meeting, a committee of twenty-four members was appointed, with power to provide for the safety of the kingdom, in case it should be in danger. For this reason, they were called the "Committee of Danger," in which care was taken, that the number of those who were for war, should be superior to those of the contrary party, and to make Duke Hamilton president.

This committee having examined the state of the kingdom, found it to be in danger, and that it was necessary to raise an army of forty thousand men, to put it in a posture of defence. It was not possible for the Marquis of Argyle, who was of the committee, to prevent this resolution. But he found means to actuate the commissioners of the general assembly of the kirk, who some days after presented to the Parliament certain demands, proper to prolong the affair. The Parliament answered these demands, and the commissioners replied.

The opposition of the kirk commissioners was not the only storm the resolution of levying an army drew upon the committee of danger. Eighteen Lords and forty other members of Parliament, entered a solemn protest against this vote, affirming, the committee had exceeded their power, which they did not in any manner consent to give them. There were moreover two other difficulties to surmount, before the Parliament could positively order the levying an army. The first related to the general, who was to have the command. Naturally this post belonged to General Lesley, now Lord Newark, who had commanded the last army, and of whom there was no occasion to complain. But he was not fit for their purpose who were for a war. That party's scheme was to make Duke Hamilton general, because he had privately declared for the King, and it was conceived he would be more proper than Lesley, to unite the royal party in England, with the army of Scotland. This difficulty was at length removed, Lesley being artfully prevailed with to quit his pretension, under colour of age and infirmities. Which done, Duke Hamilton had no other rival.

The second difficulty was much more considerable. Before the Scotch commissioners left London, they had intimated to several officers and others of the King's party, that when the Scotch army should enter England, they should be welcome to the Scots, and with them make but one body and party, for the deliverance of the King out of the hands of the Independents. They had given the same assurances to Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and Sir Philip Musgrave, and by that induced them to promise to seize Berwick and Carlisle. Upon these hopes a great number of royalists repaired to Edinburgh, to join with the Scots, or be employed in their army. Moreover, a troop of horse commanded by Captain Wogan, which was to have been disbanded, had retired into Scotland, to join the forces of that kingdom; and this troop, by the junction of several horse deserters, was become four hundred strong. Duke Hamilton had put Langdale and Musgrave in hopes that when the Scotch army should be in England, there would be no more said of the covenant, and the royalists might join with them and make but one body. But it was not in the power of those who made these promises to perform them. The obstacles, daily raised by the Marquis of Argyle, and the rigid clergy, were the reason the Parliament could not be so speedy as the authors of the project had expected. As the people of Scotland were strongly prepossessed in favour of the covenant and union with the English Presbyterians, the Parliament was obliged to publish a declaration to satisfy them upon that head. But the contrary party pretended there was no sincerity in this declaration, full of ambiguous expressions, which discovered the ill designs of those who were for a war. So, though the party who had caused the raising of forces to be ordered, was superior in the Parliament, no soldiers could be levied till the middle of May, and the army was not ready till the beginning of July, though the Scotch commissioners had given assurance that it should be in condition to act by the beginning of May. Moreover, this army, which was to consist of forty thousand men, was not above half that number, even after the junction of the English troops.

Wales was the place where the first scene was opened. In that country were three Colonels, namely, Langhorn, Powel, and Poyer, who had faithfully served the Parliament during the war, but unhappily found themselves by the new establishment, in the number of the supernumeraries who were to be disbanded, with which they were extremely dissatisfied. Having communicated their discontents to each other, they resolved to declare for the King, as soon as the Scotch army should enter the kingdom. Langhorn even sent a confident to Paris, to acquaint the Queen and Prince of Wales with this design, desiring a commission, with supplies of money and ammunition. The commission was readily granted, but the circumstances of the Queen and Prince allowed them not to send the desired supplies. Though these three officers had resolved not to declare before the Scots had entered England, they were obliged to it sooner. Poyer, being Governor and Mayor of Pembroke in South Wales, saw Colonel Fleming unexpectedly arrive with the General's commission to take the government of the castle. As this alteration could not but break the measures of the three Colonels, Poyer refused to obey, under colour it was unreasonable to deprive him of his government, without paying him his arrears. The Parliament was inflamed when they heard of this disobedience, and declared Poyer a traitor, if he did not deliver the castle within four-and-twenty hours after the first summons. Poyer contemned this ordinance, and even defeated Fleming, to whom some troops had been sent to put him in possession of Pembroke castle. Not only Langhorn and Powell joined with Poyer, but all South Wales declared for the King, whilst the Lord Byron was labouring to draw North Wales and the parts about Chester into a revolt.

During these transactions in Wales, there were commotions in Kent no less dangerous to the army. The King had always many friends in that country, but the neighbourhood of London and the army kept them in awe. Meantime, some gentlemen of the country having early information of the design of the Scots, took care to sow the seeds of revolt. The disposition of the people of Kent began to show itself in a great riot at Canterbury, the 25th of December 1647, about the keeping of Christmas day. The multitude wounded and abused the Mayor and others of the magistrates, and at last the cry was, "For God, King Charles, and Kent." The tumult being appeased, and some of the mutineers apprehended, the Parliament had a mind to punish them with death. But they found so many obstacles, that it was May before they sent down a commission to try them. The grand jury refused to find the bill, to the great astonishment of the commissioners.

Though the directors of the affairs for the King had resolved to delay the Kentish insurrection till the army was marched against the Scots, it was not in their power to defer it so long. Roger L'Estrange, a Norfolk man, * being in Kent, at the house of Mr. Hales, a young gentleman who was heir to a great estate, persuaded him to undertake something in favour of the King, and to sound the gentry and people of the country that frequented his house. Matters were so ordered in the county, that about the middle of May, the people rose, took arms, and owned Hales for their general; in which they committed two very great errors. The first, in putting themselves under the conduct of an unexperienced young man without authority. The second, in rising before the army was removed to some distance from London. As the general knew, the Scotch army was not yet ready, he detached Cromwell with part of his forces to reduce the Welsh to obedience, and then to march against the Scots at their entrance into England. For himself, he remained near London, as well to be ready to march against the Kentish men, as to prevent the like insurrection in London, which the army dreaded of all things. Besides that, he had no inclination, as it afterwards appeared, to act against the Scots.

* He had been taken prisoner by the Parliament, in December 1644, for attempting to betray Lynn in Norfolk to the King, and by a court martial condemned to die; but being kept in prison till the end of the war, was set at liberty. He afterwards translated Josephus, wrote the Observators, &c.

The number of the mal-contents in Kent being greatly increased, they were headed by the Earl of Norwich,* and Sir William Waller, and, in expectation that London would not fail to declare for them, advanced towards Blackheath. Then Fairfax speedily passed the Thames with his army over London-bridge, to give them battle. The Londoners being to wise to declare at such a juncture, the revolters thought fit to retire, some to Rochester, and others to Maidstone. General Fairfax attacked these last so vigorously, that he carried the town by storm, slew many of them, and took a great number of prisoners. At the first news of this defeat, those at Rochester quitted the city, and posted themselves on Blackheath, hoping still that London would send them assistance, or receive them into the city. These two refuges failing, and hearing moreover, that a detachment of the army was approaching, they took to flight, and were dispersed; but a great many were made prisoners. The Earl of Norwich found means to pass the Thames at Greenwich in boats, with five or six hundred men, and join his friends in Essex, who were upon the point of passing into Kent, if Fairfax had not been so diligent.

The county of Essex was in the same disposition as Kent. There had been for some time in that county, men, who were earnestly labouring to excite the people against the army, and only waited an opportunity to appear openly, as soon as the army should march to the north, not questioning but the approach of the Scots would oblige them to it. Of this number were Sir Charles Lucas, Lieutenant-Colonel Farr, Sir Bernard Gascoign; and at the same time, the Lord Chapel, one of the managers of the insurrections, was labouring the same thing in Hertfordshire. Though the Kentish insurrection had been unsuccessful, the Essex royalists were not discouraged. They still hoped, either that London would declare for the King, or the Scotch army make so great progress, that the army of England would not be able to withstand so many attacks from all quarters. For there was scarcely a county, but what was to have some insurrection, those especially, where the King's party prevailed during the war. So the Parliament having sent a general pardon into Essex, for such as should lay down their arms, most refused it by the instances of Sir Clarles Lucas, who was the most active royalist in those parts.

The General remained in Kent no longer than was necessary to raise the siege of Dover undertaken by Waller, and quiet the country, to which he granted very advantageons terms, considering their present circumstances. This done, he repassed the Thames and marched into Essex, where the number of the revolters was increased by the junction of the troops brought out of Hertfordshire by the Lord Chapel. Nevertheless, as they found themselves unable to keep the field before a victorious as well as a stronger army, they resolved to retire to Colchester. This was an open unfortified town: but they speedily cast up such works before the avenues, that they did not fear being stormed. Here they resolved to defend themselves, and wait the event of affairs in the other counties, and particularly in the north.

The principal men, who were in Colchester, were the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Chapel, Sir George Lisle, Sir William Compton, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir Bernard Gascoign, Lieutenant-Colonel Farr, and several other good officers, with a garrison of three thousand men, all bent to sell their lives dearly. This furnished the General with a pretence not to attack the town in form, but to block it up, and reduce the besieged by famine. His whole proceedings showed his unwillingness to fight with the Scots, though he always acted vigorously against the King's friends. However this be, he applied himself to the blockade, which began the 10th of June, and lasted till August.

We have already mentioned two of the projects against the army; the insurrection in Wales, which kept Cromwell employed till the beginning of July; and that of Kent, which by too great a precipitation, miscarried; there was also a tumult in London, which probably had been raised by some rash or inconsiderate royalists, who knew nothing of the projects that were formed. We must now speak of some others which were executed about the same time.

The first was the escape of the Duke of York the King's second son, from St. James's palace, where he was under the Earl of Northumberland's custody, and his retreat into Holland, to his sister the Princess of Orange. Thus to have his two eldest sons out of the power of his enemies, was no small advantage and satisfaction to the King.

Some days after, Langdale possessed himself of Berwick, and Musgrave of Carlisle. The Parliament had received some intelligence of the design to surprise these places, and might have prevented it by putting garrisons there. But as, by the late treaty with Scotland, they were to be left to the care of the inhabitants, the two Houses were unwilling by seizing them, to give the Scots so just an occasion to complain, at a time when they wanted pretences to send an army into England. They contented themselves therefore with ordering the Mayors, to take care and provide against a surprize, which however they either could not or would not provent.

As soon as Langdale was master of Berwick, all the royalists in Yorkshire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland came and joined him. By this means, he quickly formed a body of three thousand foot, and one thousand horse, which enabled him to go in quest of General Lambert, who commanded in those parts for the Parliament. But he received very express orders from Edinburgh not to engage in any action, what advantage soever he might thence expect, but to retire about Carlisle till the arrival of the Scotch army, which he obeyed. The reason of this order was, that as the rigid Presbyterians of Scotland were extremely jealous of the royal party, the directors of affairs were apprehensive, that the progress made in England for the King, would obstruct the levying an army in Scotland. And indeed, it was publicly said, the army was intended for the King's service, rather than for that of the English Presbyterians.

The loss of Berwick and Carlisle was followed soon after with another, which seemingly should have embroiled the affairs of the Independents. This was the revolt of part of the fleet about the end of May. The Parliament having ordered eight men of war to guard the seas during the summer, these ships lay in the Downs to take in provisions, which was done but slowly, because there was not much to be feared from the sea. While this part of the fleet lay in the Downs, some Kentish gentlemen, the King's friends, frequently came on board. Whether they found in the sailors an inclination to mutiny, or raised it themselves by conversing with them, it happened shortly after, that the service was not performed in the fleet with the same submission as before. The officers perceiving this great alteration, acquainted the Parliament with it, and immediately Vice-Admiral Rainsborough was ordered to repair to the fleet, and inquire into the causes of this disobedience. Rainsborough, naturally very severe, began to make strict inquisition on board the Admiral's ship; upon which all the men rose against him, and seizing on him, put him with some more of the officers into the boat, and sent them on shore. This was no sooner known to the rest of the ships, but they followed their example: as the fleet was not yet well victualled, they were obliged to stay some days longer in the Downs, during which the royalists supplied them with necessaries in the best manner they could; after that they sailed for Holland, and came to an anchor at the Brill, in order to put themselves under the command of the Duke of York, who was designed by the King to be Lord High Admiral, as soon as he should be of fit age for that post.

The Duke of York repairing to the fleet, then at Helvoet-Sluys, was received with great acclamations. He declared the Lord Willoughby of Parham, his Vice-Admiral, and appointed some other officers in the several ships, the sailors having kept very few above the rank of a boatswain or mate. As soon as the Prince of Wales, who was at Paris with the Queen his mother, heard of this revolt, he resolved to command the fleet himself, and employ it to the best advantage. But want of money detained him longer than he wished, Cardinal Mazarin not being very forward to supply him, any more than the Earl of Ormond, who waited in vain at Paris, for the performance of his promises concerning Ireland. The news that the Duke his brother was preparing to sail with the fleet, made him repeat his endeavours to procure money upon loan: he succeeded at last, and came to Calais, and from thence by sea to Helvoet-Sluys. He was received by the fleet with all the respect and joy that could be desired, and having provided what was wanting, by the Prince of Orange's assistance, sent back the Duke of York to the Hague. His design was to seize Yarmouth, to go from thence and head the Scotch army, when it should be in England, or to secure an entrance into the kingdom, when there shall be occasion. In sailing to Yarmouth, he took a ship of London, bound for Rotterdam, laden with cloth by the company of merchant-adventurers. It was said this ship was worth forty thousand pounds. He ordered the goods to be sealed up, and continued his course. But he succeeded not at Yarmouth as he expected, the town refusing to admit him, though great part of the inhabitants were for the King. Wherefore he resolved to enter the Thames, as well to intercept all outward and homeward-bound ships, as to support the King's party, and that of the Presbyterians in the Parliament and city; for he was not ignorant of the projects that were formed. Besides, the Queen his mother had enjoined him to court the Presbyterians, conceiving it was only by their means, that the King could be restored. For this reason also, he afterwards released the cloth-ship for twelve thousand pounds.

Whilst the Prince lay in the Thames, where he seized some other merchant ships, the Earl of Warwick, being well assured of the fidelity of the rest of the ships at Portsmouth, and elsewhere, assembled a fleet, and anchored in sight of the Prince; so that in all appearance the two fleets would not part without an engagement. But though the Prince seemed inclined to it, he was advised to avoid it if possible, and not without reason. His ships were fewer, and much smaller than the Earl of Warwick's; besides, the Earl expected others from Portsmouth every moment, which arriving the next day, rendered him very superior. So the Prince sailed back to Holland, and secured his fleet at Helvoet Sluys. The Earl of Warwick followed him, and appeared before that port, but to no purpose.

In the beginning of June, the King's friends found means to surprise Pontfract castle in Yorkshire, and put a garrison there. Shortly after Scarborough castle revolted from the Parliament, and declared for the King.

The Scotch army being at length upon the point of entering England, General Fairfax being still employed in the blockade of Colchester, and Cromwell in the siege of Pembroke, and as there were but two regiment in London, the Earl of Holland thought he could not have a fairer opportunity to execute his design in favour of the King. This design was so far from being a secret, that it was become the common talk of the city. It was known beforehand, what day the Earl of Holland was to depart, and the Parliament did not seem to regard it. It was not for want of information; but the scene of affairs was much altered since the army's removal from London. The Independents prevailed no more in the Parliament, and the Presbyterians began to hold up their heads. For this reason, the Independents did not think proper, at such a juncture, to take any steps that might induce the city of London to declare openly. On the other hand, the Presbyterian members were far from endeavouring to prevent the Earl of Holland's design, which they considered as flowing from the general combination for the delivery of the King out of the hands of the army. So, the Earl publicly departed from London, with about one hundred horse, and came to Kingston upon Thames, where the young Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Francis Villiers his brother, the Earl of Peterborough, and the family of the Earl of Northampton met him with some troops. As soon as they were joined, they sent a letter to the Lord Mayor and Common-council in London, declaring their intention was to join the forces of Surrey, Sussex, and Middlesex, to release his Majesty's person, to bring him with honour to his Parliament, and to settle peace in the kingdom: and desired their assistance no farther than their designs were really for the good and happiness of the King, Parliament, and kingdom, according to the covenant. But the Magistrates of London thought not fit to chuse for a leader, the Earl of Holland, who was in no great repute, or the Duke of Buckingham, an inexperienced youth, who had only the King's service in view, without any regard to the public, or the covenant; or in short, any of these Lords, whose principles were by no means agreeable to those of the Presbyterians. So, without answering this letter, they sent it to the Parliament, who immediately voted the Lords that had signed it, to be traitors, and their estates to be sequestrated.

The same day the letter was written, Colonel Levesey, with some companies of the two regiments that were quartered in Westminster, met these Lords near Kingston, and entirely routed them. But, Levesey's foot, which was left behind, not being yet arrived, and the Lords having sent theirs to Kingston, to secure their retreat, the horse only, on both sides, were engaged. Levesey briskly pursued them to Kingston, where the foot stood their ground, and hindered the enemies' horse from entering the town. That same night they quitted Kingston, and retired to St. Albans, with about four hundred men.

Meanwhile, General Fairfax hearing of this insurrection, sent from the blockade of Colchester, Colonel Scroop with a regiment of horse, to the assistance of the Parliament's troops. Scroop coming to Hertford, was informed, that the Lords who had been defeated at Kingston, were at St. Neot's in a negligent manner. Upon this intelligence, he marched thither in the night, and surprised them in that little town, killing some of their men, taking above a hundred prisoners, and dispersing the rest. The Lord Francis Villiers was slain. His brother the Duke of Buckingham, found means to escape, and the Earl of Holland was taken, conducted to London, and afterwards sent prisoner to Warwick castle. Thus ended this ill concerted enterprize.

At last, Duke Hamilton entered England at the head of the Scotch army, the 9th of July. The 11th of the same month, Pembroke castle surrendered to Cromwell, who immediately dispatched a body of horse to reinforce the army in the north, commanded by Major-General Lambert. He departed himself three days after, with the rest of his forces, which were already very much fatigued by the late siege, and of which the greatest part wanted shoes and stockings, though they undertook a long march, which probably would be followed with a battle. These difficulties discouraged not Cromwell. He pursued his march with all possible diligence, and yet could not join Lambert till the middle of August.

The Duke of Hamilton's conduct after his entrance into England, seems to afford very strong evidence, that he designed not to act in favour of the Presbyterians. If he had such an intention, he should not, it seems, have lost, as he did, forty days in the northern counties, but have marched directly to London. Lambert would not have been able to hinder his march, being much weaker than he. Cromwell was yet employed in Wales, and Fairfax in the blockade of Colchester.

As soon as Duke Hamilton entered England, he marched to Carlisle, whence he drew out the English, placed there by Musgrave, and put in a Scotch garrison. Some days after, Langdale joined him with about four thousand English foot, and seven or eight hundred horse.* But these troops remained separate, and in the marches Langdale was always a day before the Scotch army. This was to evade in some measure the order of the Parliament of Scotland, that the English who should refuse to take the covenant, should not be received into the army, nor act in conjunction with the Scots. Lambert, who was posted near the place where the two armies joined, or least approached each other, retired in such disorder, that probably he would have been defeated, had he been pursued; but Duke Hamilton did not think fit to improve this advantage. He continued some days at Carlisle, after which he marched to Kendal in Westmoreland, where he rested again, till finding not wherewithal to subsist his army, he was forced, as it were, to proceed to Lancashire with part of his army, leaving the rest at Kendal. At length, he advanced to Preston, where he halted.

Meanwhile, Cromwell having reached Yorkshire, Lambert instantly joined him, and they marched together directly to Preston. Langdale, who made the van of the Duke's army with his English troops, sent him notice that Cromwell was approaching with a resolution to give him battle, and consequently it was necessary to keep his army together. But the Duke regarded not this intelligence, believing it to be only some detachment of Cromwell's army. In short, Langdale was attacked by the enemies' horse, who drove him to Preston, where he brought with him some prisoners, who averred, that Cromwell's whole army was near. Whereupon the Duke sent him back to his troops, promising to send him assistance; but disappointed him. So Langdale being attacked, was forced to maintain a very unequal fight, which lasted however five or six hours; but at last he was entirely routed. Immediately after Cromwell's horse marched directly to Preston, where all was in such confusion that nothing was thought of but flight. The Duke himself found it proper to retire by the bridge, which he in vain endeavoured to guard, after passing it.

Retiring to Nantwich, and finding himself pursued by Lambert with a strong party of horse, he marched to Utoxeter, in Staffordshire, where Lambert was almost as soon as he, and where the Scots made not the least show of resistance. In a word, the Duke was taken, with all the officers about him; and of the whole army, the horse only escaped, who went and joined Monroe in Cumberland.

The defeat of the Scotch army was followed, within a few days, by the taking of Colchester. The besieged having been forced to surrender at discretion, the General called a council of war, where it was determined, that Sir George Lisle, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir Bernard Gascoigne should be shot to death.† The two first were executed, but the General hearing, Sir Bernard was a Florentine, saved his life, for fear the grand Duke should revenge his death on the English gentlemen, who frequently travelled into his dominions.‡

The Prince of Wales was at the Hague, when the news of the Duke of Hamilton's defeat arrived there. On the morrow, the Earl of Lauderdale waited on him with a letter from the Parliament of Scotland, inviting him to come into their country, and head their army in England. But the news he had received the day before being confirmed, he did not think fit to hazard his person to no purpose. So, the Earl was obliged to return alone.

Since the two Houses had voted no more addresses to the King, there was a perfect union between the Parliament and the army.

The 27th of April, before the army removed from London, upon information, true or false, brought to the Parliament, that some officers had plotted to disarm, and then plunder the city, the Common-council then presented a petition to the House of Commons, desiring that the chains of the city, which had been lately pulled down, might be set up again; the army removed to a farther distance from London; and Major-General Skippon appointed to command within the lines of communication, and the weekly bills of mortality. The House granted two of their requests, and took time to consider of the removal of the army.

The next day the House of Commons having taken into consideration the affair of settling the government, voted: that the government of the kingdom should be still by King, Lords, and Commons; that the groundwork for this government should be the propositions last presented to the King at Hampton-Court; and that any member of the House should have leave to speak freely to any votes, ordinances, or declarations concerning the King, &c.

These votes were directly contrary to the designs of the Independents, who meant to abolish regal power, and establish a commonwealth. But as their intention was yet a secret, or at least they had not declared it, they did not think proper to discover it too openly, by opposing these votes.

If the cavaliers, for so the King's party were called, had behaved with a little more policy, and less passion and heat, they might have done the King signal service. But they so openly showed, that their design was to restore the King without terms, that they obliged the Presbyterians to be upon their guard, and even to oppose them, instead of acting jointly with them, as the cavaliers expected.

Meanwhile, the Presbyterians were greatly embarrassed. The Scotch army was not yet come, and they were in no less danger from the King's successes, than from the army's. They could therefore join with neither of the parties, without labouring their own ruin. The designs of all three were so opposite, that which soever should prevail, the other two would be infallibly ruined. The Presbyterians therefore resolved at length to take advantage of the army's absence, of the number of their voices in the Parliament, and of the assistance of the city, to conclude a peace with the King. But in order to this peace, it was necessary, the King should consent to three conditions, without which they could not resolve to be reconciled to him. The first was, "that the militia of the kingdom should, for such a number of years, be put into the hands of both Houses." The second condition was, "That the Presbyterian government should be established by authority of King and Parliament." The third condition was,

* Duke Hamilton brought with him four thousand horse, and ten thousand foot.

† Sir Charles Lucas was first shot, and he himself gave orders to fire, with the same alacrity as if he had commanded a platoon of his own soldiers. Lisle instantly ran and kissed the dead body, then cheerfully presented himself to a like fate. Thinking that the soldiers, destined for his execution, stood at too great a distance, he called to them to come nearer. One of them replied, "I'll warrant you, Sir, we'll hit you." He answered, smiling, "Friends I have been nearer you when you have missed me." Thus perished this generous spirit, not less beloved for his modesty and humanity, than esteemed for his courage and military conduct.——Soon after, a gentleman appearing in the King's presence, clothed in mourning for Sir Charles Lucas, that humane Prince, suddenly recollecting the hard fate of his friends, paid them a tribute, which none of his own unparalleled misfortunes ever extorted from him; he dissolved into a flood of tears.

‡ The other prisoners taken at Colchester were, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Capel, Henry Hastings, Lord Loughborough, Sir William Compton, Sir Ab. Shipman, Sir John Watts, Sir Lodowick Dyer, Sir Henry Appleton, Sir Dennard Strutt, Sir Hugh Oriley, Sir Richard Mauliverer, ten colonels, eight lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, thirty captains, gentlemen sixty-five, lieutenants seventy-two, ensigns and cornets sixty-nine, serjeants a hundred and eighty-three, private soldiers three thousand and sixty-seven. They held out so long, that all the dogs, and cats, and most of the horses were eaten.

"That

"That the King should call in all his proclamations and declarations against the two Houses."

The resolution of treating with the King being taken by the leading Presbyterians, the question was, to put it in execution. General Fairfax departing from Windsor the 22d of May, to march into the north, though within a few days he was forced to take the Kentish route, the next day, the common-council of London, presented a petition to both Houses of Parliament, wherein they said:

"That they thankfully acknowledged the favour of the House, in granting their desires concerning the Tower, and militia of London; and in communicating to them several votes of both Houses of Parliament, wherein it was resolved, not to alter the fundamental government of the kingdom, by King, Lords, and Commons; to preserve inviolably, the solemn league and covenant, and the treaties between the kingdom of England and Scotland; and to be ready to join with the kingdom of Scotland, in the propositions agreed upon by both kingdoms. They further desired, that the Aldermen, the Recorder, and the rest of their fellow-citizens, then in the Tower, might be discharged and restored; and that in prosecution of their said votes, they would be pleased to improve all good opportunities in perfecting the speedy settlement of the peace of both kingdoms."

This petition was the first step taken by the city of London, to give the Parliament occasion to endeavour a peace. The members were for the most part Presbyterians, and yet the Independents prevailed, because they were supported by the army. So, from the 6th of August, 1647, to the end of May 1648, the Parliament must be considered as Independent, because the votes were directed by that party. But since the army's removal from London, the Presbyterians had exerted themselves, and no longer fearing the army, passed such votes as were most agreeable to their interest. From that time therefore, the Parliament is not to be considered as Independent, but rather as Presbyterian.

The petition above-mentioned being read in both Houses, they ordered the Recorder, and all the other prisoners to be released, except the three Aldermen, who had been impeached in form, but who nevertheless were also discharged after some days. They farther ordered, that the soldiers posted in the Tower to reinforce the garrison, should return to their regiments.

On the morrow, the Commons voted, notwithstanding the opposition of the Independent members, that, after his Majesty's assent to three bills, which should be offered to him, a treaty should be had with him upon the rest of the propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court. These three bills were for settling the militia, the Presbyterian government, and recalling all his declarations against the two Houses. These bills were ready the 30th of May, and sent to the Lords for their concurrence. The same day, the General having drawn out the troops that were in the Tower, at Whitehall, and the Meuse, to employ them in his expedition against the Kentish men, the House impowered the militia of London, to send guards to the Parliament, from time to time, as occasion should require.

The next day, the Commons ordered, that the eleven members of their House, and the seven Peers accused by the army, should be fully discharged, and Glyn, member for Westminster, who had been expelled, was received into the House.

As the two Houses perceived, that the several insurrections in the kingdom were wholly in favour of the King, they prohibited, on pain of death, to take arms without their authority. Meanwhile, as they had no army to protect their adherents against the attempts of the cavaliers, it was moved to raise forces and oblige the officers to take the covenant; but after some debates, this last point was ordered to be laid aside. It was also proposed to remove the King to Windsor. But nothing was determined.

In the present situation of affairs, the royalists conceived great hopes. Many cavaliers even scrupled not to pass for Presbyterians, and mixed with them, to strengthen the party of those who wished to force the Parliament to a peace. Among the Presbyterians many were apprehensive, that by a too long delay, the opportunity of treating advantageously with the King would be lost. Whilst they thus differed among themselves, the time passed away without any effectual endeavours for a peace. The blockade of Colchester was just at an end; Cromwell was upon the point of finishing the siege of Pembroke castle, and going to join Lambert; and Fairfax, after the taking of Colchester, was about to come once more and awe the Parliament. Besides this, the King's party was daily increasing in the north, where Langdale, whose forces were now above four thousand men, was preparing to join Duke Hamilton.

What has been said clearly proves, that the Scotch army came into England with design to restore the King without terms, under colour of delivering him from the Independents. It is no wonder, that the Parliament, where the King had few friends, should declare this army enemies of the kingdom, as soon as their entrance was known. Nevertheless, as the Presbyterians were yet persuaded, the Scots were come to support them, it was with a great struggle that this declaration passed the House of Commons. Fourscore and ten Presbyterian members opposed it to the utmost of their power, so far were they from imagining, the Scots had taken arms for the King's interest. But it was not long before they were undeceived.

The 28th of July, the Commons agreed at last, that the King should be treated with upon the Hampton-Court propositions without being obliged to sign the three bills before-mentioned. In all probability the Presbyterians were at length sensible, that by deferring the treaty, they were labouring for the Independents, who sought only to waste the time, till Cromwell, who was in the midst of his march, should have joined Lambert. But it was not possible to advance so far as would have been necessary to finish or even begin the treaty, before the revolution caused by Duke Hamilton's defeat.

Since the Commons had consented to treat with the King, without obliging him to sign the three bills, five days more had passed before the manner, place, and time of the treaty could be settled.* The King required that all persons might have access to him as when at Hampton-Court: that the Scots should be invited to assist at the treaty; and that the town of Newport in the Isle of Wight be appointed for the conference. The commissioners who had been sent to him, having reported his desires to the two Houses, the Lords, who were willing to dispatch this affair, two days after passed the following votes:

"That the votes of both Houses of Parliament, against no farther addresses and application to his Majesty, be recalled; that such persons as his Majesty shall send for, as of necessary use to him in the treaty, be admitted to wait on him; that his Majesty be in the same estate of freedom, as he was last in at Hampton-Court; that such servants as his Majesty shall appoint be sent to wait on him; that the place for the treaty be in Newport, in the Isle of Wight; that the Scots be invited to treat with his Majesty; that his Majesty be admitted to invite them; that the instructions given from both Houses of Parliament, to Colonel Hammond, Governor of the Isle of Wight, be recalled; that five Lords and ten Commoners be chosen commissioners, to treat with the King; that it be referred to the committee of Lords and Commons for peace, to prepare all things in readiness for the speeding of the treaty."

These votes being sent to the Commons, they did not think proper to pass them without some amendments. The question whether the Scots should be invited by the Parliament, to send commissioners to treat with his Majesty upon the propositions presented to him at Hampton-Court, was carried in the negative. But it was ordered, that if the King should think fit to send for any of the Scottish nation, to advise with him concerning the affairs of the kingdom of Scotland only, the House would give him a safe-conduct."

* Both Houses agreed, August 2, to treat with the King in the Isle of Wight; and the Earl of Middlesex, Sir John Hippesley, and Mr. Bulkley, were sent, August 4, to his Majesty, with the votes of the two Houses.

The next day the Commons ordered new instructions to Colonel Hammond, viz.

"That the King be removed to Newport, and be in the same condition and freedom there, as he was at Hampton-Court; that no person in the first exception out of mercy, nor under restraints of the Parliament, nor of late actually in arms against the Parliament, be admitted to the King; that no person that hath been in arms against the Parliament, &c. or of whom there is just cause of suspicion, be admitted into any fort or tower in the Isle of Wight; that no person of any foreign nation be admitted to come into the same Isle, without leave of the Parliament; that if the kingdom of Scotland send any to treat with his Majesty, they shall have a pass from both Houses, and be admitted; that his Majesty pass his royal word, not to go out of the Island during the treaty, nor twenty-eight days after, without the advice of both Houses of Parliament."

The next day, advice was brought of Duke Hamilton's defeat. The Independents thence hoped, they should hinder the conclusion of the treaty,* and the Presbyterians, that the King would grant every thing, since he had lost the assistance he depended upon, and was without any resource. Thus, this event, though of the greatest importance, caused no alteration in the disposition of the parties to treat. A few days after they received also news of the taking of Colchester.

The King having sent a list of the persons he desired to have about him, the Parliament excepted against three, namely, Ashburnham, Legg, and Dowcet, who were then in custody.

It was not only upon this point, but several others, where difficulties occurred, that they were forced to send expresses to the King. It suffices to say, that the Parliament's commissioners departed not from London to Newport, till the 13th of September, and the conferences began not till the 18th. It was agreed, they should continue forty days only.

The 11th of September, two days before the departure of the commissioners for the Isle of Wight, the Independents presented a petition to the Parliament, subscribed by several thousands, openly complaining of the Commons proceedings, which they said, flowed from the corruption of most of the members. They also gave them the reasons, why they first assisted them in this war with their persons and purses, and let them know, they expected other ways from them than a treaty with the King.

The same day the masters and commanders of ships presented a petition, complaining of the tyranny of the Parliament.†

Before we enter upon the particulars of the treaty at Newport, it is necessary to relate what passed in the north of England, and in Scotland.

Monroe, who was leading from Scotland three or four thousand men to Duke Hamilton, had entered a good way into England, when the Scotch army was vanquished and dispersed. After this victory, Cromwell, without losing time in pursuing the rest of the army which was not in condition to do any mischief, left Lambert with some troops to finish their destruction, and immediately marched in quest of Monroe. The English that were with this Scotch General used their utmost endeavours to persuade him to give Cromwell battle: but it was not possible to prevail with him. He chose rather to retire northward, and always kept at so great distance, that there was no overtaking him. Nevertheless Cromwell continued his march, and hearing that Lambert had destroyed the Scotch army, sent him orders to march to Carlisle, where Musgrave still remained with some troops, and after clearing those parts, to come and join him in order to enter Scotland together. When Cromwell came near Berwick, he wrote to the committee of estates to require them to call home Monroe, and deliver Berwick and Carlisle, otherwise they were to expect a war. A few days after he pursued his march towards Scotland, having left some regiments to block up Berwick.

Duke Hamilton's defeat, and Cromwell's threats, entirely changed the face of affairs in Scotland. The Marquis of Argyle, who had not been able to prevent the raising of an army, and had been forced to submit to the opposite party, became superior again, and was supported by all who were against the war. The committee of estates daily lost their authority, and were seconded only by Monroe, who had at length returned into Scotland. So, the Marquis of Argyle being assured of the approbation of most of the people, levied three or four thousand men to oppose Monroe, whom the Earl of Lanerick had joined, with some new raised troops. They had secured Stirling bridge, which hindered the Marquis of Argyle from making any progress, though his forces had been more numerous. But Cromwell broke all their measures, by not staying at Berwick, but marching directly to Edinburgh. He thereby forced the committee of estates to fly from thence, and disperse, for fear of being inclosed between the English, and the Marquis of Argyle's forces. Then the Earl of Lanerick and Monroe, being unable to continue the war, came to an agreement; that both the armies should be disbanded; that a Parliament should be called to sit before the 20th of January; that the settling of religion be referred to the determination of the General-Assembly, and all civil questions to the determination of Parliament, &c.

The face of affairs being thus changed, and the King's party dispersed, Cromwell repaired to Edinburgh, where he was received with great respect. He obtained the restitution of Berwick and Carlisle, and having concerted measures with the Marquis of Argyle, returned triumphantly into England. He left Lambert, however, in Scotland, with three or four regiments, at the request of the Scots, who believed they should want them, to awe those who might desire to raise new commotions.

Whilst Cromwell was in quest of Monroe in Scotland, and three days before General Fairfax came to St. Albans, the conferences for peace began at Newport.‡ Though the two Houses had desisted from the condition, that the King should sign the three bills before the treaty, they had not relinquished the thing itself. The very first day, the commissioners presented to the King, the draughts of the three bills. By the first, the Presbyterian government was established for ever in the church of England, episcopacy abolished, with the whole hierarchy, and the sale of Bishops' lands appointed. By the second, the King left the power of the militia for thirty years in the hands of both Houses. By the third, all the King's proclamations and declarations against the Parliament, or their adherents were recalled. The last of these bills began with these words, "Whereas the Parliament have been necessitated to make and prosecute a war in their just and lawful defence, &c." The King scrupled not to agree to the substance of the bill, but objected against the preamble, which charged him indirectly with having made war upon the Parliament, and desired it might be omitted, to which the commissioners would never consent, because they were, by their instructions, not to depart from a tittle of what was contained in the three bills. This dispute held seven days, and it was the 25th of September, before the King consented to pass the

* Cromwell wrote to his friends, that it would be a perpetual ignominy to the Parliament, if they should recede from their former vote of, no further addresses to the King, and conjured them to continue firm in that resolution.

† The House returned answer to the Independents' petition to this effect: "That the House gave them thanks for their great pains and care of the public good of the kingdom, and would speedily take their desires into consideration."

‡ They were held in Sir William Hodges's house. The commissioners were five Lords, viz. the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, Middlesex, Northumberland, and the Lord Say; and ten commoners, viz. Denzil Holles, Lord Wenman, Mr. Pierrepoint, Sir Henry Vane, junr. Sir Harbottle Grimstone, Mr. Brown, Mr. Crow, Recorder Glyn, Sir John Potts, and Mr. Bulkley.

bill,

bill, with the preamble. But it was on condition, that nothing should be binding, unless the whole were agreed on, and the treaty signed. This article being thus dispatched, they proceeded to the rest, on which were great debates, and particularly concerning religion. As the King saw the commissioners would not, or could not yield any thing, he hoped to shorten the negotiation, by showing the two Houses, how far he could comply with regard to the most important articles. He sent therefore a message to explain his intentions, and to make them certain offers.*

There is no doubt, that it was the interest, both of King and Parliament to finish the r treaty with all expedition; and to endeavour by their combined force, to resist, if possible, the usurping fury of the army. It seemed even the interest of the Parliament, to leave in the King's hand a considerable share of authority, by which he might be enabled to protect them and himself from so dangerous an enemy. But the terms on which they insisted were so rigorous, that the King fearing no worse from the most implacable enemies, was in no haste to come to a conclusion. And so great was the bigotry on both sides, that they were willing to sacrifice the greatest civil interests, rather than relinquish the most minute of their theological contentions. From these causes, assisted by the artifice of the Independents, the treaty was spun out to such a length, that the invasions and insurrections were every where subdued; and the army had leisure to execute their violent and sanguinary purposes.

Whilst both Houses were employed in the affairs of the treaty, the officers of the army, whose head-quarters were then at Windsor, met in a council of war, to endeavour to obstruct the peace. Cromwell was not yet come to the army, but remained about Pontefract, to order the siege of that place, which had been surprised by the King's party, and the garrison whereof kept the whole country in awe, and committed great violences. Colonel Rainsborough had been detached from the army, to command at the siege; but had been surprised in a neighbouring town by a party of the garrison, who had killed him, not having been able to carry him off.† Cromwell had ever loved and esteemed him, and therefore earnestly wished to revenge his death, besides that he was importuned by the committee of Yorkshire, to employ the forces, he was leading from Scotland, for the reduction of this place. This had detained him some time in those parts. But as he wanted not all his troops for that siege, because he had there already a detachment of the army, he sent part of his forces before, to join General Fairfax. This reinforcement being arrived, the army believed themselves able to execute what had been resolved. To that purpose, the 18th of November, which would have been the last day of the Newport conferences, if the Parliament had not continued them a week beyond the time at first

* He agreed that the Parliament should retain, during the term of twenty years, the power over the militia and army, and that of levying what money they pleased for their support. He even yielded to them, the right of resuming, at any time afterwards, this authority, whenever they should declare such a resumption necessary for public safety. In effect, the important power of the sword was for ever ravished from him and his successors. He agreed, that all the great offices during twenty years, should be filled by both Houses of Parliament. He relinquished to them the entire government of Ireland, and the conduct of the war there, he renounced the power of the wards, and accepted of 100,000*l.* a year, in lieu of it. He acknowledged the validity of their great seal and gave up his own. He abandoned the power of creating Peers without consent of Parliament. And he agreed that all the debts contracted in order to support the war against him, should be paid by the people. So great were the alterations made on the English constitution by this treaty, that the King said, not without reason, that he had been more an enemy to his people by these concessions, could he have prevented them, than by any other action of his life.—Of all the demands of the Parliament, Charles refused only two. Though he relinquished almost every power of the crown, he would neither give up his friends to punishment, nor desert what he esteemed his religious duty. The severe repentance, which he had undergone; for abandoning Strafford, had, no doubt, confirmed him in the resolution never again to be guilty of a like error. His long solitude, and severe afflictions had contributed to rivet him the more in those religious principles, which had ever a considerable influence over him. His desire, however, of finishing an accommodation induced him to go as far in both these particulars, as he thought anywise consistent with his duty.—The estates of the royalists being, at that time, almost under sequestration, Charles, who could give them no protection, consented that they should pay such compositions as they and the Parliament could agree on; and only begged that they might be as moderate as possible. He had not the disposal of offices; and it seemed but a small sacrifice to consent, that a certain number of his friend should be rendered incapable of public employments. But when the Parliament demanded a bill of attainder and banishment against seven persons, the Marquis of Newcastle, Lord Digby, Lord Biron, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Richard Granville, Sir Francis Doddington, and Judge Jenkins, the King absolutely refused compliance: their banishment for a limited time he was willing to agree to.—Religion was the fatal point about which the difference had arisen; and of all others, it was the least susceptible of composition or moderation between the contending parties. The Parliament insisted on the establishment of Presbytery, the sale of chapter lands, the abolition of all forms of prayer, and strict laws against Catholics. The King offered to retrench every thing he did not esteem of apostolical institution; he was willing to abolish Archbishops, Deans, Prebends, and Canons. He offered that the chapter lands should be let at low leases during ninety-nine years: he consented, that the present church government should be continued during three years. After that time, he required not that any thing should be restored to the Bishops but the power of ordination, and even that power to be exercised by advice of the Presbyters. If the Parliament, upon the expiration of that period, still insisted on their demand, all other branches of episcopal jurisdiction were abolished and a new form of church government must, by common consent, be established. The book of Common Prayer he was willing to renounce, but required the liberty of using some other liturgy in his own chapel; a demand which, though seemingly reasonable, was positively refused by the Parliament.—In the dispute on these articles, one is not surprised that two of the Parliamentary theologians should tell the King, "That if he did not consent to the utter abolition of episcopacy, he would be damned." But it is not without some indignation, that we read the following vote of the Lords and Commons. "The House, out of their detestation to that abominable idolatry used in the mass, do declare, that they cannot admit of, or consent unto, any such indulgence in any law, as is desired by his Majesty, for exempting the Queen and her family from the penalties to be enacted against the exercise of the mass. The treaty of marriage, the regard to the Queen's sex and high station, even common humanity; all considerations were undervalued, in comparison of their bigoted prejudices.——The King composed a letter to the Prince, in which he related the whole course of this transaction, and accompanied his narrative with several wise, as well as pathetical reflections and advices. The words with which he concluded the letter are remarkable. "By what hath been said, you see how long I have laboured in the search of peace; do not you be disheartened, tread in the same steps. Use all worthy means to restore yourself to your rights, but prefer the way of truth: show the greatness of your mind, rather to conquer your enemies by pardoning, than by punishing. If you saw how unmanly and unchristian the implacable disposition is in our ill wishers, you would avoid that spirit. Censure me not for having parted with so much of our right. The price was great; but the commodity was security to us, and peace to my people. And I am confident, that another Parliament would remember, how useful a King's power is to a people's liberty; of how much power I divested myself, that I and they might meet once again in a Parliamentary way, in order to agree the bounds of a Prince and people. Give belief to my experience, never to affect more greatness or prerogative, than what is really an intrinsically good of the subjects: not the satisfaction of favourites. If you thus use it, you will never want means to be a father to all, and a bountiful Prince to any, whom you incline to be extraordinarily gracious to. You may perceive, that all men entrust their treasure where it returns them interest; and if a Prince, like the sea, receive and repay all the fresh streams, which the rivers entrust with him, they will not grudge, but pride themselves upon making him up an ocean. These considerations may make you as great a Prince as your father is a low one, and your state may be so much the more established, as mine hath been shaken. For our subjects have learned, I dare say, that victories over their Princes are but triumphs over themselves, and so will more unwillingly hearken to charges hereafter. The English nation are a sober people, however at present infatuated. I know not but this may be the last time I may speak to you or the world publicly. I am sensible into what hands I am falling, and yet, I bless God, I have those inward refreshments, which the malice of my enemies cannot perturb. I have learned to be busy myself, by retiring into myself; and therefore can the better digest whatever befalls me, not doubting but God's providence will restrain our enemies' power, and turn their fierceness into his praise. To conclude, if God give you success, use it humbly, and be ever far from revenge. If he restore you to your right on hard conditions, whatever you promise, keep. These men, who have violated laws, which they were bound to preserve, will find their triumphs full of trouble. But do not you think any thing in the world worth attaining by foul and unjust means."

† Forty horse sallied out of Pontefract to Doncaster, where they killed the centinel; then three of them rode on to Doncaster, and asked for Colonel Rainsborough's quarters, and coming to his chamber, there called to him, and said, they had a letter from Lieutenant-General Cromwell. The Colonel rose and opened his door to them, (expecting such a letter that morning) and presently the three Pontefract soldiers fell upon him, shot him in the neck, another shot him through the heart, with other wounds, and left him dead, escaping without any alarm given.

fixed, Colonel Ewers, attended with some officers, presented to the Commons, from the army, a remonstrance, to this effect: they complain of the treaty with the King; demand his punishment for the blood spilt during the war; require a dissolution of the present Parliament, and a more equal representation for the future; and assert, that, though servants, they were entitled to represent these important points to their masters, who are themselves no better than servants and trustees of the people.

Three days after the Parliament had received the remonstrance, letters came from the commissioners at Newport, with his Majesty's answer concerning the Marquis of Ormond, and the Bishops' lands; namely, that he could not give any orders to the Marquis before the treaty was signed, but then would do as both Houses desired; and if the Marquis refused to obey, would take such measures against him as should be satisfactory to the two Houses. That as to the Bishops' lands, he persisted in his former offers. This answer afforded no great hopes of a speedy accommodation. However, as it was delivered the 16th of the month, two days before the presenting of the army's remonstrance, it was hoped the next news from Newport would be more satisfactory. But on the 25th, the Parliament was informed, by letters from the commissioners, that the King had positively refused to add any thing to his former answers.*

This was not all. They were acquainted at the same time, that the General had required Colonel Hammond to attend him at the head-quarters, and sent Colonel Ewers to take the command of his Majesty in the Isle of Wight, who kept the King under very strict custody. Thus the precautions taken by the Parliament, to hinder the King from coming to treat in person at London, for fear he should meet with too many friends, were the cause that they could not be master of his person, when it would have been most necessary. Two days after, the Commons received a letter from Colonel Hammond, with the General's order to him to repair to the army, and resign his command to Colonel Ewers. Whereupon the Commons voted, that Colonel Hammond should be required to stay in the Isle of Wight, and the General be acquainted with this vote. But Hammond was now gone to the army, and had resigned the custody of the King to Colonel Ewers.† Notwithstanding all this, the Parliament seems not to have despaired of agreeing with the King, since the Commons deferred the consideration of the army's remonstrance, till the first of December, in order to be better able to answer it when they should know the King's final resolution. The same day, the General received petitions from the forces in the north, and in Wales, agreeably to the army's remonstrance.

After the General had thus made himself master of the King's person, without the privity of the Houses, it was not very likely, he should be disposed to receive their orders. Nevertheless, the Commons told him in a letter from their Speaker, that his orders to Colonel Ewers were contrary to their resolutions, and Colonel Hammond's instructions, and that it was the pleasure of the House, he should recall his orders, and suffer Colonel Hammond to attend his charge in the Isle of Wight. But the General, and council of war, took no notice of this order.

The next day, the King, by command of the General, was removed by Lieutenant-Colonel Cobbet to Hurst castle in Hampshire, situated on a narrow piece of land, running into the sea, over against the Isle of Wight, and the Parliament was not informed of it till three days after.

Meanwhile, the army was not idle, being resolved to run all hazards to prevent the conclusion of the treaty. The same day, November the 30th, they published a declaration or manifesto, wherein they discovered their designs; and, after justifying this appeal, they admonished such members as were upright, to protest against the resolutions of the House, and withdraw, promising to look upon them as persons that had the chief trust of the kingdom remaining in them, and to adhere to them, and be guided by them, till the introducing of a more formal power, in a just representative, were speedily endeavoured. Then they declared, that they were ready to lay down their arms, if their remonstrance were answered; but that the little notice taken of their propositions made them sensible there was nothing to be hoped. And therefore the case being so extraordinary, and the danger so pressing, they were drawing up with their army to London, there to follow providence, as God should clear their way.

The first of December, the General wrote to the city, to inform them of the army's advance towards London, on account of the Parliament's contempt of their remonstrance: that they had no thought of plunder, or other wrong to the city, or so much as troubling the inhabitants with quartering any soldiers: but that for prevention of all violence, he desired forty thousand pounds might be provided by the next day.‡ The House of Commons agreed, that the city should send this sum to the army, and acquainted the General, that it was the House's pleasure he should not remove nearer London.

The second of this month, the House took the King's offers into consideration, but without coming to any conclusion. Whilst they were debating, the General, with several regiments, came and took up his quarters in Whitehall, St. James's, the Mews, and other places in the skirts of the city, which he judged convenient for his designs.

The 3d being Sunday, the Parliament did not sit. But on the 4th, the Commons resumed the debate of the King's concessions, which was interrupted by the news of the King's removal to Hurst castle; whereupon they voted immediately, that the carrying the King prisoner to Hurst castle, was without the advice and consent of the House. After that, they debated again the King's offers, and sat all the day and night, till five o'clock in the morning. At last, it was proposed, whether the question should be put, and carried by a hundred and forty, against a hundred and four. Then the main question being put, it was voted, by a majority of 129 against 83, that "his Majesty's concessions to the propositions of Parliament upon the treaty, were sufficient grounds for settling the peace of the kingdom."

Immediately after, the House appointed a committee to confer with the General, for the better procuring a good correspondence between the Parliament and the army; and then adjourned to Wednesday. The same day, several other regiments came and quartered in the suburbs of London, and the General caused a proclamation to be made, requiring all delinquents, who had not perfected their compositions, to depart ten miles from London, for a month, on pain of being proceeded against as prisoners of war.

Wednesday, the 6th of December, the General sent two regiments to Westminster, and the city trained-bands were discharged, who had been set there some months since, for guards to the Parliament. After the soldiers were drawn up in the court of requests, on the stairs, and in the lobby before the House, when the members offered to go in, Colonel Pride, having a paper of names in his hand, seized upon one-and-forty, and sent them into the court of wards,§ where they were kept under guard. The House having notice thereof, sent their Serjeant at Arms to acquaint these members, that they should forthwith attend the service of the House. But the officer of the guard answered, he had orders to secure them, which orders he was to obey before any other command.

* The King alone disputed upon the several articles, with the Parliament's commissioners, none of his attendants being permitted to speak.

† This measure having been foreseen, the King was advised to make his escape, which was conceived to be very easy; but having given his word to the Parliament not to attempt the recovery of his liberty during the treaty; and three weeks after; he would not by any persuasion, be induced to hazard the reproach of violating that promise. In vain it was urged, that a promise given to the Parliament could no longer be binding; since they could no longer afford him protection from violence, threatened him by other persons, to whom he was bound by no tie or engagement. The King would indulge no refinements of casuistry, however plausible, in such delicate subjects; and was resolved, that what depredations soever fortune should commit upon him, she never should bereave him of his honour.

December the 7th, the Commons, as they were repairing to their House, found the door within and without guarded by soldiers, who hindered many from going in. So from this day, the House of Commons is to be considered as consisting entirely of Independents. The Presbyterians had been superior from the beginning of the war, to the 6th of August, 1647. The Independents had prevailed from that day, till about the end of the year, 1648, when the army was forced to remove from London, after which the Presbyterians were masters again. At last, on the 6th and 7th of December this same year, the Independents entirely expelled the Presbyterians, or at least disabled them from supporting their party.

The same day, December the 7th, Cromwell, who came to London the night before, sat in the House, and received thanks for his great services.

Though the General had promised the city not to quarter the soldiers upon the inhabitants, as this promise was only conditional, in case the sum demanded were paid, and as the city had not furnished the money, he ordered two regiments into the city, and on the morrow, a third, after which, he took away twenty thousand pounds from Weavers'-Hall, assuring the Treasurer he should be reimbursed out of the assessments of the city due to the army.

About the same time, was presented to the General, a plan, intituled, "A new Representative, or, an Agreement of the people," for settling the government.* This plan was wholly founded upon Independent principles, and agreeably to the army's remonstrance, except that it was more large on each article. This agreement was propounded as a rule for future government, and to be subscribed throughout the kingdom.†

The secluded members having published a protestation against the violence put upon them, both Houses declared the protestation to be false, scandalous, and seditious, and tending to destroy the fundamental government of the kingdom, and ordered that all persons who had any hand in framing or publishing it, should be incapable to bear any office, or to sit as members of either House. They further ordained, that all absent members, upon their coming to the House, should disclaim their being concerned in, or giving consent to the contriving or publishing the protestation.

After that, both Houses passed an ordinance, that no persons who had been delinquents, or assisted the King against the Parliament in the first or second wars, or been aiding in bringing in the Scots army, or subscribed to the treasonable engagement in 1647, for a personal treaty, or abetted the late tumults within the city of London and Westminster, or the counties of Essex, Kent, Middlesex, or Surrey, should not be elected, or give their voice for electing, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Common-council-men, or any other officers. But within a few days, a committee of the Common-council acquainted the House, that the city was so generally concerned in the engagement for a personal treaty, that there would not be a sufficient number of persons to supply the necessary offices of the city, if that restriction in the late ordinance should stand.

The 20th of December, the General ordered fifteen or sixteen of the members secured by the army to be released, with liberty to resume their places in the House if they pleased.

Since the Independents were masters of the Parliament, petitions against the King multiplied so fast, that scarcely a day passed without some one being presented to the Commons, especially from the garrisons, which were part of the army. Somersetshire, where the King had formerly many adherents, distinguished itself on this occasion above all the rest, by presenting a petition, desiring that speedy and effectual justice might be executed upon the chief of the delinquents, that is, upon the King.

At length, the 23d of December, the House of Commons having resolved, pursuant to the desires of the army, to bring the chief delinquents to a trial, and intending to begin with the King, appointed a committee of thirty-eight to draw up a charge, and for that purpose to receive all informations and examinations of witnesses for the matters of fact against him.

The same day, the fleet, under the command of the Earl of Warwick, sent a declaration to the general, that they concurred with the army in their remonstrance. This did not much redound to the Earl of Warwick's honour, who having been one of the Presbyterian leaders, was the first that quitted his party to join with the Independents.

The resolution to try the King being taken, Colonel Harrison was commanded to remove him from Hurst castle to Windsor. All the time the King was in the Isle of Wight, he kept a private correspondence with the Lord Newburgh. Since his being at Hurst, that Lord had found means to acquaint him, he was to be removed to Windsor, and as his house was in the road, sent him word, to endeavour to dine with him, and complain of the going of his horse, promising to supply him with one of the fleetest in England, by means of which he might attempt to escape. Accordingly, the King complained all the morning, that his horse was very uneasy, and so artfully managed, that he was conducted to dine with the Lord Newburgh. But when his Majesty came there, he was told, that the horse so much depended upon, was the day before lamed with a kick. This stratagem failing, the King was conveyed to Windsor, where he was kept till the 19th of January 1648-9, when he was carried to St. James's.‡

He was no sooner at Windsor, than the council of war ordered all the usual ceremonies to the King to be laid aside, as serving him upon the knee, and the like, and most of his domestics to be dismissed. For though the council of war had no right to take then upon them, yet they daily incroached upon the priviledges of the Parliament, which acted entirely by their orders.§

The 28th of December, the committee appointed to consider of drawing up a charge against the King, reported an ordinance for attainting him of high-treason, and for trying him by such commissioners as should be named in the ordinance, which being read the first time, was ordered to be read again the next morning.‖ But as the House knew, the ordinance would be approved at the third reading, they passed an

* One of the agitators, who was the author of this paper, was shot to death for it last year, by Cromwell's order.

† It contained rules for future elections of representatives of the people. They to have the supreme authority, and this Parliament to be dissolved in April next, and then a new one to sit. Divers rules for the election of members. Officers, and malignants, to be incapable of electing, or being elected; and generally of the power and equal distribution of the members, to be in all three hundred persons, &c. The frame of this agreement of the people was thought to be, for the most part, made by Commissary General Ireton.

‡ Colonel Harrison, the son of a butcher, and the most furious enthusiast in the army, was sent with a strong party, to conduct the King to London. At Windsor, Hamilton, who was there detained a prisoner, was admitted into the King's presence; and falling on his knees, passionately exclaimed, "My dear master!"—"I have been so to you," replied Charles, embracing him. No farther intercourse was allowed between them. The King was instantly hurried away. Hamilton long followed him with his eyes, all suffused in tears, and prognosticated, that in this short salutation, he had given his last adieu to his sovereign and his friend.

§ A woman of Hertfordshire, illuminated by prophetical visions, desired admittance into the military counsel, and communicated to the officers a revelation, which assured them that their measures were consecrated from above, and ratified by a heavenly sanction. This intelligence gave them great comfort, and much confirmed them in their present resolution.

‖ In proportion to the enormity of the violences and usurpations, were augmented the pretences of sanctity among those regicides. "Should any one have voluntarily proposed," said Cromwell in the House, "to bring the King to punishment, I should have regarded him as the greatest traitor; but since providence and necessity have cast us upon it, I will pray to God for a blessing on your counsels; though I am not prepared to give you any advice on this important occasion. Even I myself," subjoined he, "when I was lately offer-an act for erecting a high court of justice, with power to try the King.*

A. D. 1648-9.] The ordinance for trial of the King passed in the House of Commons, the second of January, and was sent up the same day to the Lords for their concurrence. Since the 6th of December, the Upper House had consisted only of nine Peers, the rest having absented themselves, that they might not be obliged to countenance the outrageous proceedings of the Commons. But upon notice, that the ordinance would that day be sent up to the Lords, there came more Peers than usual, as the Earls of Northumberland, Manchester, Rutland, the Lords North, Rochford, Maynard, Dacres, in all sixteen, and the Lord Denbigh, Speaker. The ordinance being read, was unanimously rejected. However, to gain time, if possible, the Lords agreed to acquaint the Commons, that they would send answer by messengers of their own; and at the same time adjourned for ten days. This artifice was fruitless. The Commons having ordered the journal of the House of Lords to be examined, and finding the ordinance was rejected, voted, "That all members of the House of Commons, and others, appointed to act in any ordinance wherein the Lords were joined, shall be impowered to sit, act, and execute, in the said several committees of themselves, notwithstanding the House of Peers join not with them." And therefore they ordered the names of six Lords, who had been appointed for judges, to be left out of the commission, and others to be nominated in their room. Among these last was Serjeant Bradshaw, who was afterwards chosen president of the high court of justice. Then, the House voted:

"I. That the people, under God, are the original of all just power.

"II. That the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, being chosen by, and representing the people, have the supreme authority of this nation.

"III. That whatsoever is enacted and declared law by the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, hath the force of law, and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the consent and concurrence of the King, and House of Peers, be not had thereunto."

The ordinance for trial of the King, with the amendments that were forced to be made, for want of the Lords' concurrence, passed the House of Commons the 6th of January.

The following days, to the 20th, were employed in preparations for the trial, the like whereof had never yet been seen in the world.†

The high court of justice observed the same rules in trying the King, as in judging a common malefactor, there being no precedent of such a trial.‡

The principal article of the accusation was, that the King had levied war against the Parliament, which was undeniable. The sieges and battles were evident proofs of it. But this ought not to have been the principal point. It should have been proved, that he was the beginner and author of the war. For it is manifest, if this war had been only defensive on his part, he was not to be blamed. And yet, in the charge, he was supposed to have put the Parliament under a necessity of defending themselves, and this point, which was the chief, not only was not proved, but even not attempted to be proved. The depositions of the witnesses tended not to show, that the King had forced the Parliament to take arms, but only that he had been seen sword in hand against the Parliament, and giving orders to levy war. The question, which of the two, the King or the Parliament, had begun the war, ought to have been fully cleared. But though it had been so, to the King's disadvantage, who does not know, that the beginner of a war, is not always the aggressor? This was a point of great discussion, and which impartial judges would have found difficult to decide. For if what has been said in the history of this reign be remembered, it will be observed, that though it is evident, the King governed in an arbitrary manner for some years, the ground of the war he undertook, was not in maintenance of this arbitrary power. He had fully consented to the annulling of his usurpations. But the ground of the war, on his part, was the defence of the power the King enjoys by the laws of the land. On the Parliament's side, the ground of the war was, that in a supposition, the King could not be trusted any more, they would have divested him of the power his legal prerogatives afforded him to return to his former courses, and govern for the future as he had governed before. The King was unwilling to be curbed, and the Parliament would set bounds to his power. This was the true ground of the war. It was not therefore easy to determine who was the first author of it. The King refused to give other security for the future than his word; and the Parliament pretended to have very strong reasons to suspect the word of a Prince, who had so often broken it.

There are frequent instances in history of Kings assassinated by their subjects, in consequence either of the public hatred, or of private revenge, or of the interest of some faction. The English history furnishes, even since the conquest, examples of two Kings solemnly deposed and imprisoned. But till Charles I. it no where appears, that any King was ever tried for his life, before his own subjects, as judges.

The King was brought three times before the high court of justice, and as often called upon to answer the charge entered against him, which was read in his hearing. But he constantly refused to own the authority of the court, and of those who erected it. On the other hand, the court would never hear his reasons for declining their jurisdiction. They always took for granted, that the authority by which the court was established, was sufficient; which was the very thing the King would have combated, but was never suffered. At last, seeing he could not prevail to be heard on ing up petitions for his Majesty's Restoration, felt my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and considered this preternatural movement as the answer which heaven, having rejected the King, had sent to my supplications."

* The preface to this extraordinary act was as follows:

"Whereas it is notorious, that Charles Stuart, the now King of England, not content with those many encroachments which his predecessors had made upon the people in their rights and freedoms, hath had a wicked design, totally to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws and liberties of this nation, and in their trade to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; and that besides all other evil ways and means to bring this design to pass, he hath prosecuted it with fire and sword, levelled and maintained a cruel war in the land against the Parliament and kingdom, whereby the country hath been miserably wasted, the public treasure exhausted, trade decayed, thousands of people murdered, and infinite other mischiefs committed; for all which high and treasonable offences, the said Charles Stuart, might long since justly have been brought to exemplary and condign punishment: whereas also the Parliament, well hoping, that the restraint and imprisonment of his person, after it had pleased God to deliver him into their hands, would have quieted the distempers of the kingdom, did forbear to proceed judicially against him; but found by sad experience, that such their remissness served only to encourage him and his accomplices in the continuance of their evil practice, and in raising of new commotions, rebellions, and invasions. For prevention therefore of the like or greater inconveniences, and to the end, no chief officer, or magistrate whatsoever may hereafter presume, traiterously and maliciously to imagine or contrive, the enslaving or destroying of the English nation, and to expect impunity for so doing: be it ordained and enacted, by the Commons in Parliament, and it is hereby ordained and enacted by the authority thereof, that Thomas Lord Fairfax, Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, Esquires; Sir Hardress Waller, Knight; Philip Skippon, (and a hundred and forty-five others) shall be, and are hereby appointed and required to be commissioners and judges for the hearing, trying, and adjudging of the said Charles Stuart, &c."

† John Bradshaw, serjeant at law, was president of the court. William Steele, Dr. Dorislaus, and Mr. Aske, were counsellors assistants to draw up the charge against the King. John Coke, sollicitor. Serjeant Dandy, Serjeant at arms. Mr. Phelps and Mr. Broughton, clerks to the court.

‡ It is remarkable, that, in calling over the court, when the crier pronounced the name of Fairfax, which had been inserted in the number, a voice came from one of the spectators, and cried, "He has more wit than to be here." When the charge was read against the King, "In the name of the people of England;" the same voice exclaimed, "not a tenth part of them." Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, giving orders to fire into the box whence these insolent speeches came; it was discovered, that Lady Fairfax was there, and that it was she who had the courage to utter them. She was a person of noble extraction, daughter of Horace, Lord Vere of Tilbury; but being seduced by the violence of the times, she had long seconded her husband's zeal against the royal cause, and was now, as well as he, struck with abhorrence at the fatal and unexpected consequence of all his boasted victories.

that subject, he left his reasons in writing to this effect:

"That no earthly power could justly call him (who was their King) in question as a delinquent.

"That there were no proceedings just against any man but what were warranted, either by God's laws, or the municipal laws of the country where he lives. As for the proceedings against him, they could not be warranted by God's laws. For on the contrary, it is there said, 'where the word of a King is, there is power; and who may say unto him, what dost thou? Eccles. viii. 4.' Then for the law of the land, no impeachment can lie against the King, they all going in his name: and one of their maxims is, 'That the King can do no wrong.' Besides, the law upon which they grounded their proceedings, must either be old or new: if old, they ought to shew it; if new, they should tell what authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of the land, had made it, and when.

"How the House of Commons could erect a court of judicature, which was never one itself, he left to God and the world to judge.

"And it was full as strange, that they should pretend to make laws without King, or Lords' House, to any that had heard speak of the laws of England. And admitting, that the people of England's commission could grant their pretended power, he saw nothing they could shew for that; for certainly they never asked the question of the tenth man in the kingdom.

"That having concluded, as much as in him lay, a treaty at Newport, and expecting the House's agreement thereunto, he was suddenly surprised and hurried from thence as a prisoner; that the higher House, for any thing he could see, was totally excluded; and for the House of Commons, it was too well known, that the major part of them were detained or deterred from sitting: so as if he had no other, this would have been a sufficient reason for him to protest against the lawfulness of their pretended court.

"That the arms he took up, were only to defend the fundamental laws of the kingdom, against those who had supposed his power had totally changed the ancient government."*

Of all the witnesses examined against the King, there was not one which proved the King to be author of the war. But among the depositions, there were two which must not pass unobserved, supposing they were neither forged nor altered.

Richard Price, a scrivener of London, deposed, that the committee of safety being informed, that the King was privately negotiating with the Independents, sent the deponent to Oxford, under colour of carrying proposals to the King, from the Independents: that he was introduced to the King by the Earl of Bristol, and received orders to say to the leading Independents, from his Majesty, that if they would take his part against the Parliament, he would grant them whatever freedom they desired.

The second deposition was of Henry Gooche of Grey's, Inn, who said: "That on the 30th of September last, having access to, and discourse with, the King at Newport, he told him, that since his Majesty had justified the Parliament's taking up arms, by consenting to the preface of the bill, he did not question, but most of the Presbyterian party, both soldiers and others, would stick close to him." To which the King answered, "that he would have all his old friends know, that though for the present he was contented to give the Parliament leave to call their own war what they pleased, yet that he neither did then, nor ever should decline the justice of his own cause." Moreover, upon the deponent's saying, "That his business was much retarded through want of commissions." The King made answer, "that being upon a treaty he would not dishonour himself, but if the deponent would go over to the Prince his son, (who had full authority from him,) he, or any for him, should receive whatever commissions should be desired." That, besides, he expressed much joy, that his good subjects would engage themselves for his restoration.

The King refusing to answer before the high court of justice, his refusal was taken for a confession, and sentence of death was passed upon him the 27th of January.† A little before his sentence was pronounced, he earnestly desired to be heard before the two Houses, saying, he had something of great importance to offer them. But his desire was rejected. It is generally believed, he intended to propose to the Parliament, that he would abdicate the crown in favour of his eldest son.‡

The sentence was executed the 30th of January, 1648-9, on a scaffold erected in the street at the windows of the Banqueting-house at Whitehall.§ The King suffered death with great constancy, and without showing the least signs of weakness or terror.‖ His body, after having been for some days exposed to view, in one of the rooms at Whitehall, was carried to Windsor,

* This, says the King, I intended to speak in Westminster-Hall, on Monday, January 22, but against reason was hindered to show my reason.

† The names of those who were present, and gave their assent to the sentence, were as follows: Bradshaw, President; Lisle, Say, Cromwell, Ireton, Hardress, Waller. Bourchier, Heveningham, Pennington, Martin, Purefoy, Barkstead, Thomlinson, Blackistone, Millington, Constable, Ludlow, Hutchingson, Livesy, Tichbourne, Roe, Lilbourn, Smith, Edwards, Clement, Wogan, Norton, Harvey, Venn, Scot, Andrews, Fleetwood, Mayne, J. Temple, Scroope, Dean, Okey, Hewson, Goffe, Holland, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Allen, Pelham, Blagrave, Walton, Harrison, Whalley, Pride, Ewers, Grey of Groby, Danvers, Maleverer, Moore, Alured, Cawley, Stapley, Downs, Horton, Hammond, Love, Potter, Garland, Dixwell, P. Temple, Waite.———All these likewise (except those whose names are printed in Italic characters) with Ingoldsby and Chaloner, signed the warrant for the King's execution.

‡ Three days were allowed the King between his sentence and execution. This interval he passed with great tranquillity, chiefly in reading and devotion. All his family, who remained in England, were allowed access to him. It consisted only of the Princess Elizabeth, and the Duke of Gloucester; for the Duke of York had made his escape. Gloucester was little more than an infant; the Princess, notwithstanding her tender years, showed an advanced judgment; and the calamities of her family had made a deep impression upon her. After many pious consolations and advices, the King gave her in charge to tell the Queen, that, during the whole course of his life, he had never once, even in thought, failed in his fidelity towards her, and that his conjugal tenderness and his life should have an equal duration.

To the Duke too he could not forbear giving some advice, in order to season his mind with early principles of loyalty and obedience towards his brother, who was so soon to be his Sovereign. Holding him on his knee, he said, "now they will cut off thy father's head." At these words the child looked very steadfastly upon him. "Mark child! what I say; they will cut off my head! and perhaps make thee a King: but mark what I say, thou must not be a King as long as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers' head when they can catch them. And thy head too they will cut off at last! therefore, I charge thee, do not be made a King by them." The Duke sighing, replied, "I will be torn to pieces first!" so determined an answer from one of such tender years, filled the Kings eyes with tears of joy and admiration."

§ Two men in disguises and vizors, stood upon the scaffold for executioners. William Hulet was tried and condemned on October 15, 1660. In the same trial it is said, that Brandon the hangman cut off the King's head. Others say, it was Colonel Joyce.

‖ When the King came upon the scaffold, he found it so surrounded with soldiers, that he could not expect to be heard by any of the people; he addressed, therefore, his discourse to a few persons who were about him, particularly Colonel Tomlinson, to whose care he had lately been committed, and upon whom, as upon many others, his amiable deportment had wrought an entire conversion. He justified his own innocence in the late fatal wars, and observed that he had not taken arms till after the Parliament had enlisted forces; nor had he any other object in his warlike operations, than to preserve that authority entire which his predecessors had transmitted to him. He threw not, however, the blame upon the Parliament; but was more inclined to think that ill-instruments had interposed and raised in them fears and jealousies with regard to his intentions. Though innocent towards his people, he acknowledged the equity of his execution in the eyes of his maker; and observed, that an unjust sentence, which he had suffered to take effect, was now punished by an unjust sentence on himself. He forgave all his enemies, even the chief instruments of his death; but advised them and the whole nation, to return to the ways of peace, by paying obedience to their lawful Sovereign his son and successor. When he was preparing himself for the block, Bishop Juxon called to him: "There is, Sir, but one stage more, which, though turbulent and troublesome, is yet a very short one. Consider it will soon carry you a great way: it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you shall find, to your great joy, the prize to which you hasten, a crown of glory." "I go," replied the King, "from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown; where no disturbance can have place."——The great source whence sor, and buried without any pomp in St. George's chapel.*

It is no easy thing to give a just and exact character of Charles I. amidst the excessive commendations bestowed on him by some, and the calumnies wherewith others have endeavoured to blacken his reputation. If the parties born in his reign, had died with him, we might find in the histories of that time, composed after the troubles were over, an impartiality which might help to form a true judgment of this Prince's character. But the same parties continuing in the following reigns, with a mutual animosity, it may be said, there is not an impartial English historian upon this subject. Some had no other view than to vindicate the King, and others, whose aim was to justify the Parliament, could not do it without loading the King, and rendering him odious. We must therefore proceed with the utmost caution when we are in search of this Prince's character, for fear of being misled, and drawn into error by the different representations given their readers by the historians.

The commendations bestowed on Charles I. with regard to sobriety, temperance, and chastity, were never contested. All agree likewise, that he was a good husband, a good father and a good master. But some accuse him, and perhaps not unjustly, of suffering his Queen to have too great an influence over him, and too large a share in state affairs. The kingdom being Protestant, and the Queen a very zealous Catholic, her power, which she greatly abused, in causing the most important offices to be conferred on Papists, must have been looked upon with a jealous eye. This was the chief ground of the opinion spread about the kingdom, that the court intended to restore the Catholic religion in England.

"He was so great a lover of justice, that no temptation could dispose him to a wrongful action, except it was so disguised to him, that he believed it to be just." These are Lord Clarendon's own words, which may be very true, if applied to the concerns of particular persons. But besides the justice which a King ought to administer impartially to private persons, there is another kind of justice due from him, to all his people in general. With respect to this last, it may justly be doubted, that the Lord Clarendon's encomium is inconsistent with the project of altering the constitution, and assuming a power, which certainly was illegal.

Never was a King perhaps so punctual and regular in his devotions both public and private. This was of some use to him, to repel the charge of his not being well affected to the Protestant religion, and he knew how to improve it on occasion.

the King derived consolation amidst all his calamities, was undoubtedly religion; a principle, which in him seems to have contained nothing fierce or gloomy, nothing which enraged him against his enemies, or terrified him with a dismal prospect of futurity. While every thing around him bore a hostile aspect; while friends, family, and relations, whom he passionately loved, were placed at a distance, and unable to serve him; he reposed himself with confidence in the arms of that Being who penetrates and sustains all nature, and whose severities, if received with piety and resignation, he regarded as the surest pledges of unexhausted favour.

* After the King's head was struck off, at one blow, his body was put in a coffin, covered with black velvet, and removed to his lodging room in Whitehall. Being imbalmed, it was delivered the 7th of February to four of his servants, Herbert, Mildmay, Preston, and Joyner, who had been appointed to wait upon him during his imprisonment; and by them, that same day, removed to Windsor, where came, by permission, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earls of Southampton and Lindsey, with Dr. Juxon, Bishop of London. Colonel Whitheot, the governor, not permitting the Bishop to say the burial office, according to the liturgy, the body was silently interred on February 9, in a vault about the middle of the choir, over against the eleventh stall on the sovereign's side, near Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour, with this inscription in capital letters, on a fillet of lead, KING CHARLES, 1648. The whole funeral charges came but to 229*l.* 5*s.* Lord Clarendon excited a strong feeling, respecting the interment of Charles's body by his account of the vain endeavours which were made to discover it, after the Restoration. It was said in his time, that the republicans had had the address to bury Cromwell under the Obelisk in Red Lion Square, and to place the body of Charles in the coffin of Cromwell in Westminster Abbey; so that when the body of Cromwell was condemned to be hung on the gallows at Tyburn, the head separated from the body, and it was conceived that the indignity had been offered to the royal martyr. Such was the opinion in the time of Lord Clarendon, confirmed by the vain search for the body of Charles. Clarendon died in the year 1673, and his history was not published till 1704. In the interim, however, about 1700, as Mapletop tells us, in his History of Windsor, the vault of Henry VIII. was opened to deposit therein the body of a still-born child of the Princess Anne, and in that vault was found the coffin of Charles I. on which was placed that of the infant. This accorded too with the account published in Wood's "Athenæ Oxonienses," and Saunderson's Life of Charles; yet Lord Clarendon's subsequent publication revived and continued doubts on the subject. These doubts, however, were removed, by the actual discovery of King Charles's body, in the month of April 1813. Whilst the workmen, engaged in opening the royal vaults to deposit the late Duchess of Brunswick, were making a subterraneous passage from the middle of the choir to the new royal mausoleum, they accidentally broke a part of the vault of Henry VIII. which was not then intended to be opened. The precise spot of Henry's vault being thus ascertained, a strong desire prevailed to satisfy all doubts on the subject of Charles. The Regent being, therefore, at Windsor, on the day after the funeral of the Duchess of Brunswick, he was consulted about the mode of exploring these royal remains, which he directed to be immediately done in his presence. The leaden coffin was cut open by the plumber, from the head to a little below the chest, and the body appeared covered over with a cere-cloth. On carefully stripping the head and face, the countenance of Charles I. immediately appeared in features apparently as perfect as when he lived. His severed head had been carefully adjusted to the shoulders; and the most perfect resemblance to his portraits was remarked in the oval shape of the head, the pointed beard, &c. On lifting up the head, the fissure made by the axe, was clearly discovered, and the flesh, though somewhat darkened, was found to be in a tolerably perfect state. In the same vault was also found a decayed leaden coffin containing the remains of Henry VIII. but they consisted of nothing more than the skull, with some hair on the chin, and the principal limb bones. The following interesting extract, from Sir Henry Halford's narrative of this affair, we have much satisfaction in submitting to our readers.

"On removing the pall, a plain leaden coffin, with no appearance of ever having been enclosed in wood, and bearing an inscription, 'King Charles, 1648,' in large legible characters, on a scroll of lead encircling it, immediately presented itself to the view. A square opening was then made in the upper part of the lid of such dimensions, as to admit a clear insight into its contents. These were, an internal wooden coffin, very much decayed, and the body carefully wrapped in cere-cloth, into the folds of which a quantity of unctuous or greasy matter mixed with rosin, as it seemed, had been melted, so as to exclude as effectually as possible the external air. The coffin was compleatly full; and, from the tenacity of the cere-cloth, great difficulty was experienced in detaching it successfully from the parts which it enveloped. Wherever the unctuous matter had insinuated itself, the separation of the cere-cloth was easy; and when it came off, a correct impression of the features was observed in the unctuous substance. At length the whole face was disengaged from its covering. The complexion of the skin of it was dark and discoloured. The forehead and temples had lost little or nothing of their muscular substance; the cartilage of the nose was gone; but the left eye, in the first moment of exposure, was open and full, though it vanished almost immediately; and the pointed beard, so characteristic of the reign of Charles, was perfect. The shape of the face was a long oval, many of the teeth remained; and the left ear, in consequence of the interposition of the unctuous matter between it and the cere-cloth, was found entire.

"It was difficult, at this moment, to withhold a declaration, that, notwithstanding its disfigurement, the countenance did bear a strong resemblance to the coins, the busts, and especially to the pictures of King Charles I. by Vandyck, to which it had been made familiar to us. It is true, that the minds of the spectators of this interesting sight were well prepared to receive this impression; but it is also certain, that such a facility of belief had been occasioned by the simplicity and truth of Mr. Herbert's narrative, every part of which had been confirmed by the investigation so far as it had advanced; and it will not be denied that the shape of the face, the forehead, and eye, and the beard, are the most important features by which resemblance is determined.

"When the head had been entirely disengaged from the attachments which confined it, it was found to be loose, and without any difficulty it was taken up and exposed to view. It was quite wet, and gave a greenish red tinge to paper and to linen when it touched it. The back part of the scalp was entirely perfect, and had a remarkably fresh appearance; the pores of the skin being more distinct, as they usually are, when soaked in moisture; and the tendons, and the ligaments of the neck were of considerable substance and firmness. The hair was thick at the back part of the head, and in appearance nearly black; a portion of it, which has since been cleaned and dried, is of a beautiful dark brown colour; that of the beard was of a redder brown; on the back part of the head it was no more than an inch in length, and had probably been cut so short for the convenience of the executioner, or perhaps by the piety of friends soon after death, in order to furnish memorials of the unhappy King.

"On holding up the head to examine the place of separation from the body, the muscles of the neck had evidently contracted themselves considerably, and the fourth cervical vertebra was found to be cut through its substance transversely, leaving the surfaces of the divided portions perfectly smooth and even; an appearance which could only have been produced by a heavy blow inflicted by a very sharp instrument, and which furnished the last proof wanting to identify King Charles I. After this examination of the head, which served every person in view, and without examining the body below the neck, it was immediately restored to its situation; the coffin was soldered up again, and the vault closed."

He

He abhorred all debauchery, and could not endure an obscene or prophane word. His court was very different from his father's, where oaths, prophane jests, and obscene discourse were but too much in vogue. It is hard to conceive, how the Duke of Buckingham, who was used to King James's ways, could accommodate himself to the gravity and severity of Charles I. or how King Charles could adapt himself to the Duke of Buckingham's manners.

James I. was lavish, and his son Charles inclined towards avarice. But this failing may be excused by the consideration, that he never abounded with money, from the beginning to the end of his reign.

His enemies would represent him as a cruel and bloody Prince; but as they have not been able to reproach him with any particular action denoting such a disposition, it is easy to perceive, this charge is founded on the supposition of his having been author of a war wherein so much blood was spilt.

Sincerity, as appears in his history, was not his favourite virtue. He made frequent use of mental reservations, concealed in ambiguous terms, and general expressions, of which he reserved the explication at a proper time and place.*

Some accuse him of an inclination for the Roman Catholic religion, and even carry this charge so far as to say, he intended to restore it in England. These imputations are groundless. But it cannot be denied, that he gave occasion for them by his conduct, though contrary to his intention. During the first fifteen years of his reign, the Roman Catholics were not only screened from the rigour of the law, but even encouraged and countenanced to such a degree, that he made them Privy-Counsellors, Secretaries of State, and Lords-Lieutenants of Counties. Two things induced him to this condescension. The first, the Queen's importunities, who was extremely zealous for her religion. The second, his project to render himself absolute, for the execution of which, he believed the assistance of the Catholics, as well English as foreigners, to be necessary. The assistance of the Catholics, whom the King had managed for another occasion, became necessary for his own defence, after his breach with the Parliament. How unwilling soever he seemed to receive any aid from the Papists, it is certain, many were entertained in his service, and that he was privately assisted by the Catholics on sundry important occasions.

Though he did not excite the Irish rebellion, it may be affirmed, it was not against him that the Irish took arms, since they never had less cause to complain, than in this and the late reign. Besides, the Papists, both Irish and English, always looked upon this Prince as their Protector, and were ever ready to assist him. That he was a sincere member of the church of England, can hardly be doubted, since he affirmed it on the scaffold, at a time when it could be of no service to him to dissemble his belief.†

Many people gave him the surname of Martyr, pretending, he suffered death in maintenance of the truth of the Protestant religion, against the Presbyterians and Independents, and call the day of his death, which is solemnized yearly on the 30th of January, the day of his martyrdom.

I. There was too great a complication of causes which brought him to this tragical end, to ascribe his death solely to religion.

II. Though it were true that religion was the sole cause of his death, it would not be universally agreed that he died for defending the truth of the Protestant religion, since, among Protestants, the English alone, or rather a great part of the English, hold episcopacy to be a doctrine of faith.

III. Though dying for Episcopacy were really martyrdom, the King in his last proposals at Newport, agreed to reduce episcopacy to a very small matter.

IV. Had he been condemned by the Presbyterians, he might in some manner be said to suffer for episcopacy. But it is evident the Presbyterians had no share in this sentence, nor even thought of bringing him to a trial. The Independents were the men that condemned and executed him, and surely, it was not on any religious account, but to turn the monarchy into a republic.

V. If the Scrivener's evidence be true, King Charles cannot be said to suffer death for supporting religion against the Independents, since, according to the deposition, he offered to grant them all the freedom they should desire, if they would but take his part. However this be, the church of England having recovered, in the reign of Charles II. the advantage she had lost in that of Charles I. appointed the day of his death to be kept every year with fasting and humiliation.

To conclude, Charles I. was endued with many virtues, and noble qualities. There is even room to believe, that his failings flowed entirely from his design to enslave England, and if, on some occasions, he followed not exactly the rules of sincerity, it was only the more easily to execute what he had undertaken. Without this unfortunate project, he might be reckoned one of the most accomplished Princes that has ever been on the English throne.‡ The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Strafford, Archbishop Laud, and the Queen herself, accustomed to a very different government from that of England, were the persons that ruined this unhappy Prince, whom they so passionately desired to raise higher than his predecessors.

The Queen spent the residue of her days in a melan-

* Rapin, and some other historians, have rashly questioned the good faith of this unfortunate Prince; but for this reproach, the most malignant scrutiny of his conduct which, in every circumstance, is now thoroughly known, affords no reasonable foundation. On the contrary, if we consider the extreme difficulties to which he was so frequently reduced, and compare the sincerity of his declarations and professions, we shall allow, that probity and honour ought justly to be numbered among his most shining qualities. In every treaty, those concessions which he thought he could not in conscience maintain, he never could, by any motive or persuasion, be induced to make. And though some violations of the Petition of Right may perhaps be imputed to him, these are more to be ascribed to the necessity of his situation, and to the lofty ideas of royal prerogative, which from former established precedents, he had imbibed, than to any failure in the integrity of his principles.

† On the subject of "the Icon Basilike, or the Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings," a work published in the King's name a few days after his execution, it seems scarcely possible to fix an opinion. The proofs brought to convince that this work is, or is not the King's, are so convincing, that if any impartial reader peruse any one side apart, he will think it impossible that arguments could be produced, sufficient to counterbalance so strong an evidence, and when he compares both sides, he will be some time at a loss to fix any determination. Should an absolute suspence of judgment be found difficult or disagreeable on so interesting a question, I must confess, (says Hume) that I incline to give the preference to the arguments of the royalists. The testimonies which prove that performance to be the King's, are more numerous, certain and direct, than those on the other side. This is the case, even if we consider the external evidence: but when we weigh the internal, derived from this style and composition, there is no manner of comparison. These meditations resemble in elegance, purity, neatness, and simplicity, the genius of those performances, which we know with certainty to have flowed from the royal pen; but are so unlike the bombast, perplexed, rhetorical, and corrupt style of Dr. Gauden, to whom they are ascribed, that no human testimony seems sufficient to convince us that he was the author. Yet all the evidences, which would rob the King of that honour, tend to prove that Dr. Gauden had the merit of writing so fine a performance, and the infamy of imposing it on the world for the King's.

It is not easy to conceive the general compassion excited towards the King by the publishing, at so critical a juncture, a work so full of piety, meekness, and humanity. Many have not scrupled to ascribe to that book the subsequent restoration of the royal family. Milton compares its effects to those which were wrought on the tumultuous Romans, by Anthony's reading to them the will of Cæsar. The Icon passed through 50 editions in a twelvemonth; and independent of the great interest taken in it by the nation, as a supposed production of their sovereign, it must be acknowledged the best prose composition, which at the time of its publication was to be found in the English language.

‡ Dr. Welwood says.—"He was a Prince of a comely presence, of a sweet, grave, but melancholy aspect. His face was regular, handsome, and well complexioned; his body strong, healthy, and well made; and though of a low stature, was capable to endure the greatest fatigues. He had a good taste of learning, and a more than ordinary skill in the liberal arts, especially painting, sculpture, architecture, and medals; he acquired the noblest collection of any Prince in his time, and more than all the Kings of England before him. He spoke several languages very well, and with a singular good grace; though now and then, when he was warm in discourse, he was inclineable to stammer. He wrote a tolerable hand for a King; but his sense was strong, and his stile laconic."

choly widowhood. She lived however long enough to see the Prince her son's restoration; but found not with him, all the satisfaction she expected, which doubtless was the cause of her return to France where she died in the year 1669.

By an indenture in the 2d year of King Charles I. a pound weight of gold, of the old standard, of twenty-three carats, three grains and a half fine, and half a grain alloy, was coined into 44*l.* 10*s.* by tale; namely, into Rose-Rials at 30*s.* a-piece; Spur-Rials at 15*s.* a-piece, and Angels at 10*s.* a piece. And a pound weight of crown gold, at twenty-two carats fine, and two carats alloy, into 41*l.* by tale; namely, into Unites at 20*s.* double crowns at 10*s.* or British crowns at 5*s.* a-piece. And a pound of silver of the old standard, of eleven ounces, two-penny weight fine, into sixty-two Shillings by tale; namely, into Crowns, Half-crowns, Shillings, Half Shillings, Two-pences, Pence, and Half-pence.

The gold coins of this King (as appears by the indenture above) are, Rose-Rials, Spur-Rials, Angels, Unites, Double and British crowns. The Rose-Rial has, on one side, the King's figure in wrought armour, crowned, and holding in his right hand the sceptre, resting upon his shoulder; and in his left hand the ball, CAROLVS. D. G. MAG. BRITAN. FRAN. ET. HIB. REX. Reverse, under a crown, the arms quartered, Scotland in the first and fourth quarter, between C. R. crowned, HIS. PRÆSVM. VT. PROSIM. struck, probably, when the King was in Scotland, and weighing six-penny weights, eight grains, and a quarter. (Fig. 1.) The Spur-Rial, weighing just half the other, exhibits the King's head crowned, looking the contrary way, and extending to the edge, CAR. D. G. MAG. BRIT. FRAN. ET. HIB. REX. Reverse, the arms, as before, VNITA. TVEMVR. The Unite has XX. behind the King's head crowned in ruff, CAROLVS. D. G. MAG. BRIT. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. Reverse, arms in a square shield crowned, CULTORES. SVI. DEVS PROTE GIT. Another, with the falling band, has a sun for the mint-mark; and reverse, the arms in an oval shield crowned, C. R. FLORENT. CONCORDIA. REGNA.——The silver coins of this King are Crowns, Half-crowns, Shillings, Six-pences, Two-pences, Pence, and Half-pence: and also, ten and twenty Shilling-pieces, peculiar to this King, which have his figure on horse-back. The Crown-piece has the King on horse-back, with his sword in his hand, CAROLVS. D. G. MAG. BRITA. FRAN, ET. HIBER. REX. Reverse, between C. R. the arms in an oval shield crowned, CHRISTO. AVSPICE. REGNO. Another has on one side a plain cross, on the other V. with s above it. The Half-crowns are various; some with the arms in an oval, some in a square shield. They have for mint-marks, a lion passant, and in some gardant, anchor, harp, fleur-de-lis, &c. The Newark Half-crown, in form of a lozenge, has C. R. on each side of a crown, and XXX. below. Reverse, OBS. NEWARK. 1646. (There is also a Newark Shilling, exactly in the same form, and with the same inscription; only it has XII. instead of XXX.) (Fig. 6.) The Pontefract Half-crown is in the same form as that of Newark: on one side C. R. crowned, DUM. SPIRO. SPERO. Reverse, the castle, and a hand out of the Towers, holding a drawn sword, OBS. P. C. 1648. The Pontefract Shilling wants the sword and hand, and has XII. instead of XXX. but in other respects it is like the Half-crown.) (Fig. 5.) There is also a Three Shilling-piece, coined at the siege of Carlisle, having C. R. and III. below: reverse, OBS. CARL. 1645. Of the Shillings, some have the King's head crowned, with the ruff, and XII. behind the head: reverse, the arms, and CHRISTO AUSPICE REGNO, a cross the mint-mark. (Fig. 2.) Another is with a falling band, (Fig. 3.) One has 1637, and ARCHETYPUS. MONETÆ. ARGENTÆ. ANGLIÆ. The Carlisle Shilling, which is an Octogone, has a crown with C. R. XII. Reverse, OBS. CARL. 1645. The Six-pences are strictly like the Shilling, only have VI. instead of XII. The Carlisle Sixpence, has C. R. crowned. Reverse, VI. D. The Carlisle Groat, is Octogone, and has on the reverse IIII. (Fig. 7.) The Three-pence has the King's head, title and arms, as the larger pieces, CHRISTO. AVSPICE. REGNO. One has the Ostrich-Feathers, (because made of Welsh silver,) with this motto, EXVRGAT. DEVS. DISSIPENTVR. INIMICI. In the field, RELIG. PRO. REG. ANG. LIBER. PAR. 1645. (Fig. 4.) The Two-pence has II. behind the King's head, with title and arms as the Three-pence, Legend IVSTITIA. THRONVM. FIRMAT. One has the King in ruff, bareheaded, CAR. DG. MAG. BRIT. FRAN. ET. HIB. Reverse, two Cs. interlinked under a crown, FIDEI. DEFENSOR. (Fig. 8.) The Penny has I. behind the King's head.

THE HISTORY OF THE INTERREGNUM,

FROM THE DEATH OF CHARLES I. TO THE RESTORATION OF CHARLES II.

BOOK XXII.

THE HISTORY OF THE INTERREGNUM IS DIVIDED INTO THREE PRINCIPAL PARTS. THE FIRST CONTAINS, WHAT PASSED WHILST ENGLAND WAS REDUCED TO A DEMOCRACY. THE SECOND, WHAT HAPPENED DURING THE PROTECTORATES OF OLIVER AND RICHARD CROMWELL. THE THIRD, WHAT PASSED FROM THE DEPRIVATION OF RICHARD CROMWELL, TO THE RESTORATION OF CHARLES II.

PART I.

The Commonwealth of England.

A. D. 1649.] TO understand the revolution in England after the death of Charles I. we are necessarily to remember some material things which have already appeared in the foregoing reign, and of which it will not be amiss to make here a short recapitulation.

First, The Parliament now sitting consisted properly but of a House of Commons, who refused to acknowledge the negative voice of the Peers. This they had manifestly showed in erecting a court of justice to try the King with the concurrence of the Lords, whose consent was voted unnecessary.

Secondly, This House of Commons was composed of a small number of members, all Independents, Anabaptists or other sectaries. All the Presbyterian members who sat in the House the 6th of December, were expelled by the army, and the absent, whose principles agreed not with those of the Independents, durst not resume their places. If ever there was an usurpation, it was this pretended Parliament's government, founded only in violence, and wholly supported by the army.

Thirdly, The Independents, of whom this House was chiefly composed, were distinguished by two principles, one relating to the civil, the other to the ecclesiastical government. By the first, they asserted, that the republican government was not only the most perfect, but also absolutely necessary for England, after so many oppressions from her Kings, who had changed the government into a real tyranny. With regard to religion, though they called themselves Protestants, their principles were, that every particular church was independent, and might be governed as the members thought proper. Their notions concerning the vocation of the ministers of the gospel, were also very singular; as they believed that, without any other call, every man was free to discharge the office of minister, and use the talents given him by God. The other sectaries, who had joined the Independents because they had found in that party a full toleration, were united with them in the first of these principles, and had declared for a republican government. But with respect to religion there were between them some differences, which the Independents regarded the less, as they wanted to increase their adherents, and, besides, believed, that in matters of religion, toleration was absolutely necessary.

Fourthly, There was still in the army a remnant of levellers, who adhered to their principle, and were always ready for an attempt to recover their credit. It is true, Cromwell, after having raised this faction, had in some measure dispersed, but not entirely destroyed it. An able leader would still have made it as formidable as ever.

Fifthly, It was with the utmost concern that the Presbyterians saw the Independents in possession of Sovereign power. By that all their measures were broken: their progress for eight years became fruitless, and the storm which they had raised against the King, returned upon their own heads, or at least, it was apparent, they had all this while been labouring for others without any thing done for themselves. For indeed the Independents were equally enemies to Presbyterian and Episcopal government. As to civil government, the Presbyterians were not averse to royalty in general. If they had undertaken to limit its power, it was not from a belief that the thing was evil in itself, or unestablished by the laws of England, but because the two last Kings had used their power to destroy Presbyterianism. So, whatever they had done against King Charles I. was not pointed so much against his dignity as his person, because they considered him as their enemy, and despaired spaired of establishing a Presbyterian government in the church, so long as he had power to prevent it. Very likely however many of them would have complied with a republican government, notwithstanding the tenour of the covenant, had that government not been in the hands of the Independents, who were by no means inclined to support Presbyterianism, and whose principles upon toleration were entirely rejected by the Presbyterians. And therefore an union between the Presbyterians and Independents was morally impossible.

Sixthly, The royalists, equally enemies of both, could unite with neither of the parties, considering the opposition there was between their principles. They however conceived some hopes, that the division among their enemies would, one day, give them a good opportunity to restore the monarchy to its former state. Wherefore, they industriously fomented this division, in expectation that the Presbyterians would at last be obliged to abandon their project, and unite with the royal party, to free themselves from the persecution they suffered.

Presently after the King's death, the House of Commons published an act to forbid the proclaiming of Charles Stewart eldest son of the late King, or any other person whatever, on pain of high-treason. Here was laid, as it were, the foundation of the commonwealth, which the Independents meant to erect in England. The same day the Lords desired a conference with the Commons about settling the government, and the administration of justice, the Judges' commissions being determined by the death of the King. The Commons, without answering the message, voted the House of Lords to be useless and dangerous, and therefore to be abolished. They only left the Lords the power of being elected members of Parliament, in common with other subjects. This privilege was embraced by a few,* but rejected by most of the Peers; some even published a protestation against the power assumed by the Commons, which was little regarded. Thus, the Parliament, which at first was composed of the King, six score Lords, and five hundred and thirteen Commons, was reduced to a House of Commons consisting of about eighty members, of whom very few, at the beginning, had five hundred pounds yearly income. But it must be confessed, that, of these new Governors, some were men of great genius and uncommon capacity, and that if they erred in their principles, they wanted not skill to pursue the consequences. Their principle was, that the Sovereign authority resided originally in the people, by whom a part of it was committed to the Kings, chosen to govern them according to law. That the King's abuse of this trust, had broken the original contract between King and people, and by this violation, the contract subsisting no longer, the Sovereign power returned to the people as the fountain thereof. So, considering themselves as the representatives of the people, they believed, they had a right to change the form of the government, without any regard to the original contract annulled by the King in his violation of the laws.

In consequence of this principle the Commons, assuming the name of Parliament, voted, and afterwards enacted, that the kingly office should be abolished as unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous, and that the state should be governed by the representatives of the people in a House of Commons without King or Lords, and under the form of a commonwealth. This grand alteration in the government produced many others in things consistent with monarchy, but not with a commonwealth. The oaths of allegiance and supremacy were to be abolished, justice was no longer to be administered in the King's name, a new Great-Seal was to be made, new money to be coined; in a word every thing to be removed which bore any marks of royalty. A Great-Seal was therefore made, on one side of which was seen the Parliament sitting, with this inscription, "The Great-Seal of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; on the other side, the arms of England and Ireland, with these words, "The first year of freedom by God's blessing restored." This Seal was committed to a certain number of persons, who were stiled Keepers of the Liberties of England. And it was ordained that, for the future, all public orders should be dispatched in the name of these Keepers, under the direction of the Parliament. Lastly, the Parliament made choice of thirty-nine persons to form a council of state for the administration of public affairs under the Parliament. The projects of these changes were formed in February, but the execution of them all required some months.

In the beginning of March, the Parliament erected a new High-Court of Justice, consisting of sixty members, to try some persons of distinction, who were in their power.

Before this new court, of which Bradshaw was president, as he had been of that which condemned the King, were brought Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, the Lord Goring, lately created Earl of Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, all for the same crime, namely, for having appeared in arms against the Parliament.

They all received sentence of death.† But as they had many friends, petitions were offered to the Parliament in their name for a pardon. These petitions were examined in the House, and those of Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and Lord Capel, rejected. The votes were equally divided upon that of the Earl of Norwich, and as, according to custom, the Speaker's vote was to decide, he declared for pardon, saying, he had formerly received from the Earl some civilities, and therefore voted in his favour. The execution of Sir John Owen was suspended, because, as a commoner, he ought to have been tried before an inferior court. This saved his life. The three first were executed on a scaffold, erected before Westminster hall.

At or about the same time, many others were executed for the same crime in several parts of the king-

* The Earl of Salisbury, and the Lord Edward Howard of Escrick, signed the engagement, "To be true and faithful to the commonwealth, as it was established, without a King or House of Lords," and took their seats in Parliament by virtue of an election from the people, ——And also, April 16, 1649, upon the death of Sir Francis Pile. a writ issued out for a new election, and the Earl of Pembroke, with all his titles, was returned for Knight of the Shire for Berks, primæ impressionis, and his Lordship was accordingly admitted into the House with great respect.

† The Duke of Hamilton represented, that being a subject of Scotland, he had entered England with an army, as an open enemy, by virtue of a commission from the Parliament of Scotland, which he was bound to obey, and consequently, could be treated but as a prisoner of war. As this objection had been foreseen, he was told, he was not proceeded against as Duke Hamilton of Scotland, but as Earl of Cambridge in England; and since he had accepted that title, and as such, taken a seat in Parliament, he was thereby become a subject of England: that if the title of Duke of Hamilton obliged him to obey the Parliament of Scotland, that of Earl of Cambridge ought to have engaged him to refuse the commission. Besides, they were informed, that his accepting the command of the Scotch army, was not owing to mere obedience, but to his own solicitation, and that he had been the principal author of the war.

The Earl of Holland spoke but little in his defence.

The Lord Goring, (Earl of Norwich) represented, that he had been educated in the court from his cradle, having been a Page to King James I. that he had never served any other master than the King, whom he had followed, without examining the justice or injustice of his cause, not having had opportunity to be informed in such points, which were above his capacity.

The Lord Capel refused, at first, to own the authority of the court, alledging, that if he had committed any crime, he ought to be tried in the usual form, and not before a court unsupported by any law. But the condemnation of the King himself, by a court of the like nature, might have convinced him, of the unserviceableness of such a defence. He said afterwards, that having surrendered himself prisoner at discretion, he was, by the law of nations, exempted from death, if not inflicted within so many days, which were long since expired. He urged, that when after the taking of Colchester, the council of war had condemned Lucas and Lisle to be shot, General Fairfax promised life to the other prisoners, and therefore he demanded the benefit of that promise. The court being a little embarrassed, sent to the General, to know what promise he had made the Lord Capel. His answer was, that as General, he had promised the prisoners an exemption from military execution, to which they had been condemned, and that his intention reached no farther. Upon this answer it was decided, that the General's promise did not exempt the prisoner from the justice of the Parliament.

Sir John Owen justified himself by his oath of allegiance.

dom; and amongst the rest were Morrice and Blackbourn, who had surprised the castle of Pontefract for the King. Poyer, Powell, and Langhorn, who had drawn into a revolt from the Parliament the principality of Wales, cast lots for their lives, and the first was executed.

The Parliament consisted of so few members, that they perceived the ridiculousness of stileing themselves the representatives of the commonwealth. They therefore resolved, in order to increase their authority by a greater number of members, to permit all who had sate in the present Parliament, to resume their places, on condition of signing an instrument, called the Engagement, by which "they rejected all concessions made by the King in the treaty of Newport; approved of all the proceedings against him; and engaged themselves to be true and faithful to the commonwealth, as established without King or House of Lords." By this engagement were excluded all the Royalists, and the Presbyterians, who were the most rigid observers of the covenant. Yet a good number of the latter signed, and took their seats in the House; but Ludlow freely owns in his Memoirs, that an expedient was found to admit only those, from whom it was believed, there was no danger.*

The Prince of Wales received at the Hague the melancholy news of the tragical death of his father, and immediately assumed the title of King, being then eighteen years of age. Within two or three days, the states-general, the states of Holland, and the ministers of the Hague, paid him their compliments of condolence. He caused those of his father's council, who attended him, with the addition of Mr. Long, his secretary, to be sworn of his privy-council. He had no sooner established his council, than he received a letter from the Queen his mother, who, after expressions of her extreme affliction, advised him to retire into France, and form no council till she had spoken with him, but her advice came too late. His condition was deplorable, not having wherewithal to maintain his household, or any table but that of the Prince of Orange his brother-in-law, and subsisting entirely by his assistance. The states of Holland, foreseeing the Parliament would shortly solicit the King's removal out of their dominions, would have been very glad to be freed, by his voluntary retreat, from the necessity of desiring him to depart. Some of the states' deputies were even of opinion, to prevent the desires of the Parliament. The King was informed of this disposition, and wished to be gone, but knew not whither. He had been ill received in France whilst his father was alive, and had no reason to expect a better reception. He knew too well the Queen Regent and Cardinal Mazarin, to imagine, they would prefer his friendship to that of the new commonwealth of England. So, though he had resolved to withdraw into France, it could have been but for a very short space. On the other hand, he had no great inclination to be with the Queen his mother, knowing, she would hold him in a sort of servitude, which he could neither brook, nor avoid without a quarrel. Ireland alone seemed to promise him an honourable retreat, by reason of the situation of affairs in that kingdom.

In the year 1646, the Marquis of Ormond had by express orders from the King concluded a peace with the Irish rebels, in hopes of receiving sufficient forces to drive from that island the English Parliamentarians and the Scots. But however advantageous this peace was to the Catholic religion, the Pope's nuntio did not think fit to consent to it. The pretence was, that the Catholics found in it neither sufficient advantages, nor security. But the true reason was, that by this peace he would have lost all his credit, since the Marquis was to be acknowledged governor by the Irish. He caballed therefore with such success among the people, that, not only they deserted the Marquis, but also by their insults obliged him to retire to Dublin, unprovided of every thing to defend that capital, which they were preparing to besiege. In this extremity, he chose rather to deliver Dublin and Drogheda to the Parliament, than see them fall into the hands of the rebels. He capitulated therefore with the Parliament, and surrendered these two places to Colonel Jones, who took possession the 17th of June 1647. After that the Marquis withdrew into England, where he had frequent leave to visit the King, then a prisoner of the army, till at last he was forced to pass into France.

After the Marquis had quitted Ireland, the nuntio exercised a tyranny, which grew intolerable to the Irish. They therefore sent to the Queen and Prince then at Paris, that they were disposed to shake off the nuntio's yoke, and if the Marquis of Ormond were sent to them with a supply of arms and ammunition, they would put him at the head of an army capable of expelling all the King's enemies out of the island. The nuntio had notice of this plot, and excommunicated the authors, but for this once, he proved not the strongest. He was forsaken by all his adherents, and even forced to ask as a favour, the liberty to withdraw.

The Marquis of Ormond long waited at Paris for the performance of a promise made him by the Cardinal, of a supply of money, arms, and ammunition. But finding at last, he was only amused, he departed without any assistance, and arrived in Ireland the beginning of October 1648. Three months after, he concluded a new treaty with the grand council of the Irish assembled at Kilkenny. At the same time the process was forming in England against the King. But this peace was not general. Owen Roe O'Neale, who commanded in Ulster, rejected it, because, as he pretended, it was not advantageous enough to the Catholic religion. Much time was spent to gain him, without success. At last, the Marquis of Ormond, not to lose the opportunity of making progress in Ireland, while the Parliament was erecting their new commonwealth, resolved to take no farther notice of O'Neale, but act singly, with the army which the council of Kilkenny had at their disposal. He put himself therefore at the head of this army, and advancing towards Dublin, took Dundalk, Newry, Trim, Drogheda, and some other towns and castles, which facilitated his intended siege of Dublin. On the other hand, Prince Rupert, Admiral for the King, being pursued by the Parliament's fleet, put into Kingsale, where he was secure, and in a condition to favour the Marquis of Ormond's designs. This disposition of affairs made the King judge that Ireland was a convenient retreat, where at the head of an army, he might make himself master of Dublin, and then of the whole island. After which he hoped, that with his Irish succours and his friends in England, he might recover his throne. But news from Scotland made him suspend his resolution.

Since Cromwell's expedition into that kingdom, after the defeat of Duke Hamilton, the face of affairs was entirely changed. The Marquis of Argyle, with all the rigid covenanters who opposed the war against England, had regained the advantage they had lost. The new Parliament had declared incapable of all employments, those who were concerned in the engagement formed by Duke Hamilton, and the kirk had excommunicated them: so that they were considered as enemies of God and the state. Of this number were William, Earl of Lanerick, brother of Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Lauderdale, and many others, who formed a faction, which we may call Hamiltonian, and which was entirely crushed. By this revolution Scotland remained united with England, so long as the English Parliament continued Presbyterian, that is, to the 6th of December, 1648.

The revolution in England, upon the army's expelling the Presbyterian members from the Parliament, to leave only Independents, changed the interests of Scotland. When the Parliament of England had erected a court of justice for the trial of the King, the Scots found themselves

* To support their authority, the powers in being, ordered, that there should be twenty-eight thousand horse and foot kept up in England, and twelve thousand in Ireland; whose pay should be 80,000*l.* a month.

themselves extremely embarrassed. To suffer the Independents to remain masters of England after the death of the King, which was visibly their design, could not but be very disadvantageous to them. They perceived, that a Parliament so composed would disregard Scotland, and infallibly ruin the covenant between the two kingdoms, which it was of the utmost importance for the Scots to maintain, because the Presbyterians might possibly one day recover the ground they had lost. But on the other hand, they could not take arms for the King without manifest danger. After their late loss, they were hardly able to raise another army, to fight the Independents; and though they had done it, they would not have saved the King's life. They therefore resolved to show the English and all Europe, that they highly disapproved the proceedings of the Parliament of England, which was all they could do on this occasion.

Pursuant to this resolution, commissioners were sent to London, where they arrived the beginning of January 1648-9, and presented a memorial to the Parliament, setting forth the reasons which ought to divert them from their purpose of trying the King. But this memorial produced no effect. At last, after the King had been twice brought before the high court of justice, they gave in their protestation, which was not answered till after the King's death. Shortly after the Scotch commissioners were recalled. But just after their departure, an answer was in their name presented to the Parliament, which charged the sitting members with unfaithfulness, breach of promises and oaths, and other things very offensive. This was so ill received by the Parliament, that they ordered them to be arrested on the road, and put under guard, till it should be known whether they were avowed by their principles. But, the Scotch Parliament justifying them, and complaining of the violation of the law of nations in their persons, they were immediately discharged.

In so nice a juncture, the Scots had but two ways to prevent their falling into a dangerous anarchy. They were either, with the English, to change their government into a commonwealth, or else acknowledge the eldest son of the late King for their sovereign. They determined on the latter. They imagined, the offer of their crown might engage him to become a good Scot, and dismiss his English counsellors, who were not proper for Scotland; in a word, would think himself very happy to recover one of his kingdoms, and see himself in the same state in which his ancestors were, before his grand-father's accession to England. They resolved, therefore, to acknowledge and proclaim him, with restrictions, however, which left them at liberty to capitulate with him. A proclamation to this effect having been published, the council dispatched Sir Joseph Douglas, to give the King notice of it, and the states sent also two commissioners, to inform him of what had been acted in his favour, but without any order or instruction to treat with him. Before the conditions on which he was to be invested with the royal authority were proposed to him, it was necessary to know, if he would accept the crown upon terms not yet known, but easy to be guessed.* The commissioners found the King at the Hague, where there arrived at the same time, but in another ship, the Earls of Lanerick and Lauderdale, and some time after, the Earl of Montrose also from France. When the late King, after his retreat to the Scotch army, ordered Montrose to lay down his arms, he retired into Germany, and served in the Emperor's army. Afterwards he went into France, where the Queen and Prince of Wales gave him a reception very different from what he expected, after his great services in Scotland. This coldness was owing to his arrival in France, at the very time the Queen was using her endeavours to persuade the King her husband, to throw himself upon the Presbyterians and Scots, and grant all their demands, imagining, he had no other refuge. He had been very successful in serving the King, but had used his advantages with such barbarity, that he had been degraded by the Parliament, and excommunicated by the kirk; so that in Scotland he was considered as an enemy to the nation, and to Presbyterianism. As his residence in France was very disagreeable, he no sooner heard of the death of Charles I. then he repaired to the Hague to offer his service to the new King. In his retinue, were some Scottish Lords and gentlemen attached to his fortune.

The King received very coldly the news of his being proclaimed, by reason of the restriction in the proclamation. Charles believed, that no great regard was due to what had been done for him in Scotland. He understood, that in the intended capitulation, things would be demanded which he had resolved not to grant, as the confirmation of the covenant and the Presbyterian government. He wished however to justify his disinclination to Scotland, by the advice and opinion of the Scotch Lords who were with him at the Hague. For this purpose he would have had them appear together before his council, and upon being consulted, dissuade him from going to Scotland, and the council thereupon form their resolution. The Marquis of Montrose approved of this proceeding; but the Earl of Lauderdale, and the Earl of Lanerick, who took the title of Duke Hamilton, on hearing of the tragical death of his brother, would not consent to it. They thought it too nice a proceeding, for Scotch Lords to appear before an English council. On the other hand, they were so enraged against the Marquis of Montrose, that they would have no communication with him. When the King found he could not bring them together to consult upon this subject, he declared he would not go into Scotland, and persisted in his resolution for Ireland. Thus, upon a bare information that Scotland would not receive him without conditions, he resolved to refuse the crown of that kingdom. And, what is more, he gave commission to the Marquis of Montrose to raise forces in Germany, and make a descent upon Scotland. So, receiving with acknowledgment, the offer made him by the Scots, he ordered a war to be levied upon them, as upon enemies, because they refused to admit him for their sovereign, without a previous engagement.

The King could not reside any longer in Holland, where it was intimated to him, that the dread, the states were under, of a quarrel with the new commonwealth of England, made his stay there very unwelcome. Besides, they received advice, the Parliament was to send an agent, to propose between the two commonwealths a strict alliance; and this affair was not to be negotiated whilst the King remained at the Hague. This agent, named Dorislaus, arrived indeed before the King left the place. But the same evening that he came to the town, as he was at supper in his inn, with some other persons, six Scots of the Marquis of Montrose's retinue entered the room, and dragging him from the table, murdered him.† The assassins were neither arrested, nor immediately pursued; and though afterwards some pains were taken to apprehend them, the states showed on that occasion a great regard for the King, which offended the Parliament. Nevertheless, the King knew, after this action, there was no remaining at the Hague. He therefore sent his heavy baggage and some of his domestics to Ireland, with a resolution to follow them, after he had paid a visit to his mother in France. The States observing he was about to depart, thought it not convenient to press him, and thereby he gained time to be prepared.

While the King was deliberating at the Hague, concerning

* The kirk declared, that he should sign the covenant, submit to the kirk's censure, renounce the sins of his father's house, and the iniquity of his mother.

† He was Doctor of the civil law, born in Delft in Holland, and bred at Leyden, but afterwards lived long in London, having been received into Gresham College, as a professor; and had been, from the beginning of the troubles, in the exercise of the Judge Advocate's office in the Earl of Essex's army. Whitelock says, that they were twelve English cavaliers who stabbed him in several places, and cut his throat, one of them saying at the same time, Thus dies one of the King's Judges. Ludlow says, they were English and Scots.

cerning the offer from Scotland, the states of that kingdom were settling the terms on which he was to be received, not doubting his inclination and readiness to accept the offered crown. But he had friends in Scotland, who, better informed of his sentiments, resolved to disturb the public deliberations, by an insurrection, in hopes that a happy success would cause the King to be admitted without any condition. With this view Middleton, Monroe, the Gordons, and others, assembled some forces in the north, and seized the town of Inverness. But the Parliament having before received intimation of their design, had already raised forces, which immediately marched to the north, under Straughan and Kerr, and dispersed the mutineers before they could assemble all their forces.

Though the King had firmly resolved to go into Ireland, it was impossible for him to execute his design, by reason of the turn in his affairs in that island. After the Parliament was become master of Dublin, it had been often moved in the House, to send a powerful reinforcement to Ireland, but the opposite interests of the Presbyterians and Independents hindered the taking any resolution. The first were for sending Sir William Waller to command there, and the latter were as earnest for Major-General Lambert. The division between the Parliament and army, which arose quickly after, brought new obstacles to this affair. At last, the revolt of Wales, the insurrections in other counties, and the preparations of the Scots to invade England, discharged all thoughts of Ireland. If, in this interval, the Irish could have come to an union amongst themselves, and have joined the Marquis of Ormond, they might have expelled the Parliament's forces, and rendered themselves masters of the whole kingdom. But their divisions hindered them from improving so favourable an opportunity. The opposition of O'Neale kept the Marquis from taking the field till April 1649, when the King was dead, and the government of England modelled into a commonwealth.

The union of the Irish with the royalists, the progress of the Marquis of Ormond, the extreme weakness of the Parliament's party in that nation, brought the House at last to a resolution of sending thither a good army, with all possible diligence. Waller, who was a Presbyterian, was no longer considered as a proper General to serve the Parliament; and Lambert, till then supported by Cromwell, was now supplanted by him. Cromwell believed, the government of Ireland was a post not unworthy of himself, and so managed by his intrigues, that he was unanimously chosen to fill the dignity of Lord-Lieutenant of that kingdom. But before his troops could be ready for that expedition, he had a difficulty to overcome, which might have had dangerous consequences.

Besides the Cavaliers and Presbyterians, the Parliament had other enemies, who only waited an opportunity to declare, and were in the army itself. These were the Levellers, who were dissatisfied, for that after they had served as instruments to ruin the Presbyterian Parliament, they were not only disregarded, but even called seditious and rebels. This occasioned their assembling upon Cromwell's being appointed to command in Ireland, under a pretended necessity of inquiring what troops were proper to serve in that kingdom. To that end they met at Burford to the number of five thousand, and without any precaution continued there, pretending a promise from Cromwell, that no part of the army should approach within ten miles. But Raynolds, by the command of General Fairfax, unexpectedly fell upon them with five or six thousand men, and gave them an entire defeat. Nine hundred horse, and four hundred foot were sent prisoners to London, and some of them executed. Others obtained their pardon by Cromwell's mediation. This affair being ended, the army was prepared which Cromwell was to lead into Ireland.

While this army was assembling, the Marquis of Ormond approached Dublin to besiege it. Whereupon, Cromwell immediately sent about three thousand men to reinforce the garrison, which was very weak. Meanwhile, as he believed he could not arrive soon enough to save that city, he resolved to land his army in Munster, where he hoped to find no obstacle, because he knew, the Lord Inchiquin, president of that province, was departed with his English troops, to reinforce the army under the Marquis of Ormond. But the Marquis having notice of his intention, immediately dispatched the Lord Inchiquin with the forces under his command to prevent his landing, by which he considerably weakened his army. He however continued his march, and began the blockade of Dublin about the middle of June. He stayed some time at Finglas, five miles from Dublin, in expectation of fresh troops, and at last passed the river, and posted himself at Rathmims, to lay the siege in form. While he was in this camp, the succours sent by Cromwell arrived in Dublin. A few days after, the Marquis of Ormond resolved to repair an old castle, which by its situation was proper to hinder any fresh relief from entering the town. Then Colonel Jones, the governor, who from a lawyer was become a good officer, perceiving how much these fortifications might annoy him, resolved to endeavour to prevent their being finished. For that purpose he put the garrison under arms in the night, and at break of day making a sally, marched directly to the castle, and carried it sword in hand. This happy success caused him to advance towards the enemy's camp. He met by the way a body of horse, which stopped him some time. But this body being dispersed, brought such terror to the Irish army, that they fled in confusion without striking a blow. The Marquis of Ormond was forced to follow them, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies. After this defeat, he was obliged to retire to some distance, to wait for the succours, he had been promised.

Cromwell, informed of this success whilst embarking his army, altered his design, and instead of going to Munster, sailed to Dublin, where he safely arrived about the middle of August, with about fifteen thousand men. When the Marquis of Ormond knew that Cromwell was at Dublin, he retired to a still greater distance, and left in Drogheda a numerous garrison, under the command of Sir Arthur Aston, an officer of reputation, who had been governor of Reading, and afterwards of Oxford. About the same time Londonderry, the most considerable city in the north of Ireland, which was besieged by the King's forces, was relieved by a sally made by Sir Richard Coote, much in the same manner as Dublin was by Jones.

From what has been seen, it is manifest the King could not venture into Ireland, where he had no other succour to carry but his person, while Cromwell was assembling his army on the coast, and still less, after Ormond's defeat. But as, on the other hand, he was looked on with no good eye in France, where, since his arrival, the court had made him no offers of service, he resolved to withdraw into the Isle of Jersey, as the only place where he could hope to be favourably received. He retired therefore to that isle with his brother the Duke of York, and his small court, where he continued some months.*

The commotions raised by the King's friends in Scotland being appeased, the committee of estates assembled to prepare the conditions to be demanded of the King. Having learned that he was in Jersey, they sent Mr. George Windram to acquaint him, they were desirous to treat with him concerning his establishment in Scotland: but as the Isle of Jersey was neither safe, nor commodious, he was desired to name some town in the Low-Countries, where he might receive their commissioners. Windram left Edinburgh the 25th of September, but was not with the King till towards the end of October, being detained by contrary winds: so that the King was fully informed of what had passed in Ireland, where Cromwell having taken Drogheda by assault, had put the garrison to the sword, and was continuing his progress with wonderful rapidity. He therefore received Windram very graciously, and named Breda for the reception of the Scotch commissioners, promising, he would be there the 15th of the following March. It was, however, mere necessity which caused him to resolve to listen to the propositions the Scots were to make him. That this was his only motive, can hardly be doubted, when it is considered, that on the 30th of January 1649-50, he wrote to the Marquis of Montrose, that the Scots had sent Windram to him, and that their commissioners were to repair to Breda, in March to treat with him. Wherefore, he pressed him to hasten his preparations for a descent into Scotland before this affair should be settled, in order if it was possible, and should please God to favour him with success, to prevent the conclusion thereof.

* This year, upon information, that the Turkish Alcoran was printing in England, it was ordered, on March 10, to be suppressed.—— May 8, the Queen of Bohemia's pension of 12,000*l.* was suspended. ——June 7. at an entertainment in the city, the Earl of Pembroke refused to sit above Mr. Whitelock, the senior commissioner of the Great Seal, saying, "As much honour belongs to that place under a commonwealth, as under a King."

Windram being returned with the King's answer, the committee of estates laboured incessantly to finish the propositions to be sent to the King. The draught was laid before the Parliament, and after some amendments, ordered to be communicated to the general assembly of the kirk, where it was approved. After this the Parliament and general assembly named commissioners to carry them to the King. These commissioners arrived at Breda at the time appointed, and presented the conditions to him, on which the Scots would admit him to the exercise of the regal power. They consisted of these four articles:

I. That all those who have been, and continue excommunicate by the kirk of Scotland, may be removed from having any access to the court.

II. That he would be pleased to declare, that he would by solemn oath under his hand and seal, allow the national covenant of Scotland, and the solemn league and covenant of Scotland, England, and Ireland; and that he would prosecute the ends thereof in his royal station.

III. That he would ratify and approve all acts of Parliament, enjoining the solemn league and covenant, and establishing Presbyterian government, the directory of worship, the confession of faith and catechism in the kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approved by the general assembly of the kirk, and by the Parliament of that kingdom, and that he would give his royal assent to the acts of Parliament enjoining the same in the rest of his dominions, and that he would observe the same in his own practice and family, and never make opposition therein, or endeavour any change thereof.

IV. That he would consent and agree that all matters civil might be determined by the present and subsequent Parliaments of the kingdoms of Scotland, all matters ecclesiastical by the ensuing general assemblies of the kirk, as was formerly condescended and agreed to by his late father.

After hearing these conditions, the King demanded, whether these papers they had delivered to him, contained all the particulars which they had to propound or desire? Whether they had power to recede from any particular article, or to treat with him concerning the assistance of Scotland, to place him on the throne of England? They answered, their commission extended only to the offering of these propositions, and to receive either his consent or refusal.

These conditions, which to the Scots appeared very just, lawful, and absolutely necessary for the safety of Scotland, seemed to the King very hard and unreasonable.

He little cared to be King of Scotland, if he could not use the forces of that kingdom to procure him the English crown. Meanwhile, his power was to be so limited, that it should not be possible to receive any advantage from Scotland to that end. The King was unable to use force, and yet the terms to be imposed upon him appeared so hard, that he would have immediately rejected them, if he could have taken any other course. Though he perceived it would be to no purpose to dispute upon the articles, he desired to prolong the negotiation as much as possible, in hopes of good news from Scotland, where he knew the Marquis of Montrose would shortly make his appearance. Had the Marquis been attended with his former success, the treaty of Breda would soon have ended, since it was in the King's power to reject absolutely the offered conditions. But the Marquis's progress did not answer the King's expectations.

A. D. 1650.] After that Lord had left the King at the Hague, he went into Germany to endeavour to raise forces and money. The King of Denmark, as Charles's near relation, furnished him with a sum of money, and the English settled in Sweden assisted him to the utmost of their power. With this relief he was enabled to buy arms and ammunition, and to enlist five hundred soldiers which he sent in March to one of the Isles in Orkney. He followed them himself in April, and from thence repaired with his troops to Caithness in the north of Scotland. This was at the very time the Scotch commissioners were with the King at Breda. As the King was informed that Montrose was now gone for Scotland, he waited the success of this expedition before he would conclude with the commissioners, whom he nevertheless entertained with hopes of granting their demands.

After the Marquis's arrival at Caithness, he seized a castle where he might secure his arms and ammunition, and then wrote to his friends to join him. At the same time he published a manifesto, declaring, "That he was come with a commission from the King to protect his good subjects; but with no design to obstruct the negotiation at Breda; on the contrary, he hoped to hasten the conclusion of it by means of his army. If the treaty succeeded, he should readily lay down his arms on the first command from his Majesty."

The Scotch Parliament then sitting at Edinburgh was surprised to hear of Montrose's arrival in that juncture, with the King's commission. It was not difficult to perceive that, whatever was pretended, this was not to advance the treaty, but rather to obstruct it, and force the Parliament to desist from conditions which were thought necessary for the safety of the kingdom.

Meanwhile, as Montrose was very formidable, by reason of his former great successes in favour of the late King, the Parliament gave immediate orders for raising, with all possible expedition, an army of six thousand men, under the command of David Lesley. Till this army was ready, Colonel Straughan was detached with three hundred horse to the northward, in order to awe the country, and prevent the King's friends from rising and joining Montrose. This precaution had a surprising effect. The King's adherents, whether through fear of falling into the hands of this cavalry, or because of the six thousand men which were to follow, durst not stir, and Montrose was joined only by some ill-armed and worse disciplined Highlanders. So, his little army, if it deserve that name, composed of soldiers of different nations, strangers to one another's language, and in a barren country, could make no great progress. Besides, as Montrose had no cavalry to send out for intelligence, he knew not what passed in other places, and particularly Straughan's march, vainly expecting the King's adherents to come and join him. To this ignorance was owing his being surprised by Straughan's little troop, which, after a long march, fell upon him, when least expected. At the approach of the enemy the Highlanders deserted and fled; the foreigners made more resistance, but were routed at last.* The Marquis himself being forced to fly, threw away his Ribband and George, disguising himself like a peasant to prevent a discovery. He wandered some days, in this habit, and at last put himself into the hands of a gentleman named Aston, who had formerly served under him, and promised to conceal him. But whether through the hope of the reward published for taking of him, or the fear of being rigorously punished if he did not discover him, it is certain, he delivered him to Lesley, who immediately sent him to Edinburgh.* The Parliament now sitting, resolved to try him themselves, and as, since his degradation, he was called only James Graham, and was universally hated, no regard was paid to his birth. He was condemned to be hanged on a gallows thirty feet high, with this addition to his sentence, that, after he was dead, his head should be severed from his body, and set on Edinburgh talbooth: his arms and legs sent to four several towns, to be exposed as a spectacle, and his body buried under the gallows. He met death with extraordinary courage, and before his execution made a speech to the people, in which, far from owning himself worthy of death, he testified, on the contrary, an entire persuasion of the justice of the cause, he had supported.

The tragical death of the Marquis of Montrose disappointed all the King's hopes. He complained loudly to the commissioners of the execution of that Lord, during the negotiation, affirming it to be a breach of faith. He wrote in the same strain to the committee of estates, but was silenced by their answer, and told, it would be much better not to insist upon this affair. The answer imported, that papers were found upon Montrose, which it was more for his honour to conceal than to publish. The King easily understood, that by this was meant his commission to the Marquis after the news of his being proclaimed, and his letter of the 30th of January, after the time and place of conference had been fixed.

The King at last accepted the conditions presented to him by the commissioners. Only the signing of the covenant was deferred till his arrival in Scotland, upon his promise of compliance, in case it was judged proper to press him when he should be at Edinburgh.

When the King had signed the conditions, he went to Scheveling near the Hague and embarked, being attended by Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Lauderdale, and some other Scots, who gave him hopes that his presence in Scotland would remove all suspicions, and that an exact observation of what he promised would be dispensed with. But at his arrival, before he was suffered to land, the covenant was so pressed upon him, that he could not avoid taking it. He had positively promised it at Breda, and no man durst advise him to break his word. This exactness of the estates convinced Duke Hamilton and the Earl of Lauderdale, that it was not safe for them to appear publicly in Scotland. Wherefore, finding means to land with the King, they retired to their own estates, or their friends, in expectation of a more favourable juncture.

The Marquis of Argyle received the King with extraordinary reverence and outward marks of respect. But within two days, all his English domestics were removed, except the Duke of Buckingham. Some were obliged to return into Holland, others withdrew at a distance from the court, to friends who were willing to entertain them.

When the friends and confidents of the King were thus removed from his person, he saw himself in the hands of men whom he knew not, and whose principles were entirely different from those in which he had been educated; so that he was extremely uneasy, though outwardly he received all the respect due to his rank. What troubled him most, was the importunity of the ministers, who thought it their duty to instruct him in the Presbyterian religion, and scrupled not to brand the hierarchy and worship of the church of England with the name of Doctrine of Devils.† To be rid, as well as he could of this trouble, he was present at their sermons and prayers, but with so little attention, that it was plainly against his will.

* Bates, in his Elenchus Motuum, assures us, that Aston received two thousand pounds, in reward of his treachery.

† In this fanatical age, so prevalent was the opinion of witchcraft, that great numbers, accused of that crime, were burnt by sentence of the magistrates, throughout all parts of Scotland. In a village near Berwick, which contained only fourteen houses, fourteen persons were punished by fire; and it became a science every where much studied and cultivated, to distinguish a true witch by proper trials and symptoms.

While these things passed in Scotland, the Parliament of England was not idle. When they learned that commissioners from Scotland were to confer with the King at Breda, they imagined, Charles would accept the crown of Scotland on any terms, in order to use the forces of that kingdom to invade England, in which they were not mistaken. To prevent this danger, the Parliament resolved to carry war into Scotland.

After this resolution, Cromwell was hastily recalled out of Ireland to take the command of the army which was to act against Scotland. In the late Scotch invasion under Duke Hamilton, the behaviour of General Fairfax had given occasion to judge, that he would unwillingly accept the conduct of this new war, which was really the case. Cromwell's success in Ireland had been such as the Parliament could have wished. After the taking of Drogheda, he seized Kilkenny and many other places, and in a little time reduced the greatest part of the island to the obedience of the Parliament. The Marquis of Ormond was little capable of resisting him, because of the division still reigning amongst the Irish. This division went so far that O'Neale had at last concluded a treaty with Monk, one of the Parliament Generals, commissioned by the council of state. But the Parliament refused to ratify the treaty, as being too favourable to the Catholics, and therefore O'Neale had begun to treat with the Marquis of Ormond, and was upon the point of joining him, when his death prevented the execution of his design. His troops dispersing upon his death, were of no advantage to the Marquis of Ormond. In the meantime, Cromwell continued his conquests with surprising rapidity, and to prevent the agreement and junction of the Irish amongst themselves, he thought of an expedient, which succeeded. He published by proclamation a permission to all the Irish officers to enlist, in the service of foreign Princes, what soldiers they pleased of their own nation, with a promise to give them no disturbance or molestation. More than twenty-five thousand immediately chose to serve France and Spain, and afterwards a much greater number. This precaution prevented the Marquis of Ormond from bringing an army into the field capable to resist that of the Parliament. So, when Cromwell was recalled, the Irish affairs were in so good a condition, that his son-in-law Ireton, whom he left there as his Lieutenant, had but little to do.

Cromwell being returned to London, took his seat in the Parliament, where, by order of the House, the Speaker thanked him for his late services. After this, the Scotch war being the most pressing affair, the Parliament caused Fairfax to be asked, whether he would take upon him the conduct of the war? He replied, if the Scots entered England with an army, he would endeavour to repel them, but desired to be excused from attacking them in their own country. Cromwell acted his part so well, that though he passionately wished to be commander in chief, he gave his opinion in favour of Fairfax, and pretended he should be well satisfied to serve as his Lieutenant. Fairfax perceived that, being a Presbyterian (though he had but too faithfully served the Independents) the Parliament would have had no great confidence in him, and that the zeal shown on his behalf, was only ceremony. He therefore sent his commission to the House, which was cheerfully received, and an annual pension of five thousand pounds was settled on him in acknowledgment of his services. Immediately Cromwell was declared General of the armies of the commonwealth, and his commission presently dispatched.

The Scots hearing of the preparations against them in England, raised an army with all possible diligence, and gave the command to General Lesley, who formed his camp between Leith and Edinburgh, and fortified it with such intrenchments, that he was not to be attacked without manifest danger.

About the middle of July, Cromwell put himself at the head of the English army, consisting of eighteen or nineteen thousand men, and marched to the frontiers of Scotland, where he published his manifesto. As the enemy's army lay encamped near Edinburgh, he entered Scotland without any difficulty. But he found the country destitute of inhabitants, and every thing capable to subsist his army conveyed away; so that he was obliged to maintain it with supplies from his fleet. He advanced, however, and came in sight of the enemy's army; but found it too well intrenched to be attacked. He chose therefore to retire towards Musselborough, whereupon Lesley detached a large body of horse, which fell upon the English rear, commanded by Lambert, with some advantage.* The day after, there was a sharp skirmish, in which the Scots beat some English regiments; but at last were repulsed to their camp with considerable loss. Then, Cromwell once more attempted, by his approach, to draw the Scotch army out of their intrenchment, but his endeavours were fruitless. At last, after the two armies had remained almost in sight several weeks, Cromwell, for want of provision and forage, was forced to retire. His design was to embark his foot, and return into England with only his horse. To execute this resolution, he marched towards Dunbar, where his fleet expected him, his army being much diminished, and reduced to about twelve thousand men.

The Scots, advertised of Cromwell's resolution, imagined, the English were seized with terror, and that a more favourable opportunity could not offer, to fight them, and therefore they left their camp to follow them closely. The first day, they encamped upon a hill, about a mile from Dunbar, so that it was impossible for Cromwell to embark his foot, without exposing himself to the danger of a defeat. General Lesley was not for attacking the English, but only for watching an opportunity to engage them with advantage. But the clamours of the ministers in his army, who had promised a certain victory, as if by some revelation,† obliged him the next day to draw nearer to the enemy. Cromwell, who observed them with a perspective glass, seeing them descend the kill, cried out, "That God had delivered them into his hands." He immediately went to prayers, and then told some of his officers, that he had felt, in praying, such a repose in his mind, that he doubted not but God would give him the victory. The two armies remained in sight all the rest of the day, Lesley still alledging some excuse to delay fighting. But in the night, Cromwell resolved to attack the Scots at break of day.

This resolution being taken, he drew up his army in the night, and, not to be prevented, began the fight an hour before day. The Scotch cavalry on the right wing behaved well at first, but were at last put to flight. The left wing fled, without charging once. Three regiments of Scotch infantry fought with such bravery, that they were almost all slain on the spot, without offering to fly. The rest seeing themselves deserted by the horse, fled in confusion, leaving the field, and an undoubted victory to the English. It is said, the Scots lost three thousand men, besides seven or eight thousand prisoners, with twenty-seven pieces of cannon; and that the English lost but three hundred. The Scots, after their defeat, abandoned Leith and Edinburgh, of which Cromwell made himself master, but the castle of Edinburgh held out till the end of December.

This misfortune to the Scots was advantageous to the King, as it obliged them to alter their behaviour to the Hamiltonians. When the army lately defeated at Dunbar was raised, great care was taken not to admit any who had been concerned in the engagement of the late Duke Hamilton, or were suspected to be of the King's party. In a word, the rigid Presbyterians, who were then at the head of affairs, would have no society with those whom they called the Luke-warm, that is, men who were not sufficiently zealous for the covenant. After the defeat at Dunbar, a new army was to be raised, to oppose Cromwell, who threatened Scotland with entire ruin the next spring. The Parliament was therefore convened at St. Johnstoun's, whither the King had retired. But as a new army was not easily to be formed of the zealous, it was proposed in Parliament, to receive into this, those who had hitherto been called Luke-warm, and who offered their service to their country in its present distress. This affair being debated, the Parliament was forced to resolve, that all who had been excluded from places, should be allowed to produce proofs of their repentance, and then be employed in the service of their country. In consequence of this resolution, those who had till then opposed the Marquis of Argyle, who had wanted zeal for the covenant, who had shown an inclination for the King, who had even been employed by Charles I. readily gave outward marks of their repentance, in a disavowal of their past conduct, and a reconciliation with the kirk. After this they were admitted, as well into the Parliament as to public employs, and especially to posts in the army to be raised. Hence the King at last obtained, what he had so passionately desired, namely, to see those who were attached to his interests, in a condition to serve him, when occasion should offer.

But the resolution of the Parliament, of which necessity had been either the motive or the pretence, was not agreeable to all. The zealots could not bear the admission of malignants (as they called them) to employments, under colour of a resolution obtained from the Parliament by intrigue and cabal, in the same manner as the levying an army had before been obtained, to serve against the interests of Scotland. They said, it was mocking God, to receive the guilty to a hypocritical repentance, in order to re-admit them to employs from which they had been justly excluded.‡ But it was answered, it was strange cruelty to remove from employs, men who offered their service to their country, at so critical a juncture, and had professed a repentance, for not having been sufficiently zealous for the common cause. In a word, the first protested solemnly against the resolution of the Parliament, and formed a party called the Protestors, whilst those who adhered to it formed another, called the Resolutioners. Five western counties joined the Protestors, and entering into an association, published a remonstrance, which being offered to the Parliament, was voted seditious. But this did not hinder several officers of reputation, as Straughan, Kerr, and some others, from adhering to the party of the Protestors.

The managers of this affair in the Parliament, knew, that the party of the Protestors was much more numerous than that of the Resolutioners. Wherefore, it was thought convenient to give an appearance of satisfaction to the former, to prevent their obstructing the designs formed in favour of the King. Their project was, to put the King at the head of an army, almost wholly at his devotion, that he might, upon occasion, march into England, where it was not doubted, he would find many friends, and a powerful assistance. The rigid Presbyterians were therefore not to be alarmed at seeing the King in the head of the army, for fear of their concerting measures to hinder the execution of the project. For this purpose it was thought proper, that the King should publish a declaration of a strange nature, where he was made to speak a language agreeable to the sentiments of the people, but very contrary to his own. In this declaration, he owned "The sin of his father, in marrying into an idolatrous family:" he acknowledged, "the bloodshed in the late wars lay

* August 26. In a skirmish, one of the Scots fired a carbine at Cromwell; upon which Cromwell called out to him, and said, "If he had been one of his soldiers, he would have cashiered him for firing at such a distance."

† August 27. Cromwell sent word in a letter, that the Scotch ministers in their prayers said, "That if God would not deliver them from the sectaries, he should not be their God."

at his father's door:" he expressed "a deep sense of his own ill education, and the prejudices he had drunk in against the cause of God, of which he was, now very sensible: he confessed "all the former parts of his life to have been a course of enmity to the work of God:" he repented "of his commission to Montrose, and of every thing he had done that gave offence:" and with solemn protestations he affirmed, "that he was now sincere in his declaration, and that he would adhere to it to the end of his life, in Scotland, England, and Ireland." When this declaration was offered to him to sign, he appeared at first resolute to reject it; saying, "That if he passed it, he could never look his mother in the face." But upon a representation of its absolute necessity to gain the confidence of the Protestors, without which he could never execute his designs, he swallowed the bitter pill, and the declaration was published.

This declaration procured not all the advantage the King was made to expect. No man could believe he had voluntarily signed a paper so scandalous, and so prejudicial to the memory of his father. The Protestors, on the contrary, imagining, he concealed some deep design in this strange proceeding, united still more closely against him, and at last declared, they would have no communication with the Resolutioners, nor with Cromwell and the Independent party in England.

Charles was extremely troubled, to see that his declaration produced no other effect, than the loss of the confidence of both parties, and of his own reputation. It was universally believed, so scandalous a dissimulation was intended to deceive the people. At last, this false step, taken so contrary to his own opinion, joined to the sad life he had led, made him listen to propositions offered by some of his friends in the Highlands, who would receive no employs at the price of a hypocritical repentance. These gentlemen sent a message to him, that if he would come and head them, they would send to a place appointed, a good body of troops to receive him. The King therefore consented to join the mal-contents, being extremely desirous to withdraw from the Presbyterians, who had put so many hardships upon him. He had prepared a declaration, showing the ill treatment he had received from the Marquis of Argyle, and the cruel servitude in which he had been held since his arrival in Scotland. The Duke of Buckingham, having discovered this secret, by letters left upon the King's table, informed the Marquis of Argyle, who would not believe, the execution of the project was so near. Nevertheless, two days after, the King withdrawing from St. Johnstoun, repaired to the place appointed, where he found only a very inconsiderable body, instead of the good number of troops he had been promised. But while he was deliberating what to do, the committee of estates dispatched Major-General Montgomery to him, who very rudely pressed his return to St. Johnstoun, to which he at last consented, believing, doubtless, that those who had wished him among them, were not in so good a condition to receive him, as they had made him believe.

This design, however imprudent, produced a good effect for the King, though, withal, it lost him the confidence of the Presbyterians, who saw plainly, his heart was not with them, and that he little regarded his promises at Breda. Meanwhile, the Marquis of Argyle, and the committee of estates perceived, a too great rigour might throw the King upon desperate resolutions, and, in the present juncture, great disorders might happen, if the King should desire to head the mal-contents. This procured him better treatment, and a larger share in the public affairs. The King, on his part, saw also, he should never be easy in Scotland, or able to execute his designs, without the assistance of Argyle, who was at the head of the kirk party. He therefore courted him extremely, making him great offers, and even talking of marrying his daughter. But the Marquis, knowing his sentiments, looked upon these offers as so many snares, and was upon his guard, though he outwardly paid the King all due respect. The Lord Lorn, his son, Captain of the King's guards, did him many services, and privately brought to him those persons, whose company he desired.*

At last, the King was crowned at Scone, the 1st of January 1650-1, and from that day all persons had access to him. After this, the Scots were wholly intent upon raising an army, into which all who desired it were received, without distinction of party. This army was ready the beginning of June, before Cromwell could take the field, for want of forage. It consisted of fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, which the King headed himself, with David Lesley for his Lieutenant-General. As they were mostly new raised troops, the King judged it not proper to go in quest of Cromwell, who was formidable for his courage and experience, and was besides at the head of a disciplined and victorious army. He posted himself therefore very advantageously at Torwood, between Edinburgh and Stirling, having behind him a large and deep river, of which the passes were all secured, and by that means he received provisions out of the plentiful county of Fife, whereas the country before him was entirely laid waste. This army in the front was so strongly intrenched, that it would have been rashness to attack it. Here he resolved to wait the enemy's motions, and take his measures accordingly.

Cromwell, having assembled his army, marched directly to the King, with design to give him battle, but found him so strongly intrenched, that he thought it not proper to attack him. The armies remained in their respective camps about six weeks, all Cromwell's artifices to draw the King out of his intrenchments, proving ineffectual. At last, Cromwell, unable any longer to stay in his camp, by reason of the difficulty of getting provisions, whilst the county of Fife plentifully supplied the King, resolved to make an attempt to deprive the King of this advantage. For he saw plainly, it was in the King's power to avoid fighting as long as he pleased, and oblige him to spend the whole campaign in a state of inaction.

Wherefore he detached sixteen hundred men under Colonel Overton, who marched towards Edinburgh, to a place provided with boats, and passing the Frith, took his post in the county of Fife. Overton was immediately followed by Lambert, with a more considerable body. At the same time, Cromwell, with the rest of the army, advanced towards the King's intrenchments, as if he intended to attack them, in order to prevent any detachment from the King's army to oppose the landing of his forces. As soon as the King was informed that the English were in Fife, he detached Major-General Brown with four thousand men to fight them. Brown was routed, and Cromwell thereby free to transport his whole army into Fife. By this means he deprived the King of any farther supplies from that county.

It was indeed an advantage to Cromwell to put the King under a necessity of quitting a post where he could not be attacked. But withal, he had made it impossible to fight him, because there was a deep river between the armies, which joins the lake of Lomond to Edinburgh Frith. The King might have passed the river, because he was master of all the passes, but it was not thought proper to pursue Cromwell, who was now at a distance, having taken St. Johnstoun, and threatened Stirling. On the contrary, the King suddenly resolved to march into England, since he had no opposition before him, being pleased, that Cromwell had given him opportunity to form and execute a design so agreeable to his interest. He saw himself at the head of eighteen thousand men, and doubted not that his army would be greatly increased in England, by the junction of the Royalists and Presbyterians, equally oppressed by an independent Parliament. The Marquis of Argyle was alone of a contrary opinion, and so far incurred the suspicion of disloyalty, that the King was advised to put him under arrest. But it was not thought proper to follow this advice, from which no advantage could be received. The Marquis therefore was left in Scotland, and the King began his march to Carlisle with extraordinary diligence. He had now marched some days before Cromwell heard of it, and entered England the 6th of August, where he was proclaimed by his army.

The news of the King's march greatly surprized Cromwell. Accordingly, his greatest care was to prevent the mischiefs that might follow. As he doubted not, the Parliament would be alarmed at the news of the King's march, he speedily informed them of it, and withal, of his intention closely to pursue him. He advised them also to put the militia in arms in all counties of the kingdom, with all possible diligence, to keep the King's party in awe, and prevent their joining his army. He gave the same orders in the northern counties, as well to hinder the cavaliers from rising, as to find several bodies of the trained-bands ready to reinforce his army on his arrival in England. At the same time he detached Major-General Harrison with three thousand horse, which were to be followed by Lambert at the head of another body of cavalry, to retard the King's march as much as was possible. After these precautions, he left Major-General Monk in Scotland with five thousand men, with orders to endeavour to make himself master of Stirling and Dundee. At last, he put himself upon the march, three days after the King's departure, making all possible haste to reach the King before he should arrive at London, not questioning but he would march thither without halting.

The King entered England full of hopes that all the enemies of the Independents, as well Presbyterians as royalists, would eagerly join him. For this purpose, he sent Colonel Massey before, with a detachment to receive all who were willing to serve him. He wrote likewise to the Earl of Derby, then in the Isle of Man, to repair to him, greatly relying on his credit in Lancashire. But many things conspired to disconcert his projects.

At last, after a very fatiguing march, the King arrived at Worcester, where he was honourably received by the magistrates, and solemnly proclaimed. He resolved to refresh his weary troops in the neighbourhood of that city, as they were not able to continue their march without some repose. Probably his design was to march directly to London, if his army, according to his expectation, had been considerably strengthened on their route. But on the contrary he saw it so diminished by desertion as to be reduced to twelve or thirteen thousand men, without any hopes of its being augmented, for the forementioned reasons. It is therefore likely, he durst not farther advance, and thought the ground about Worcester proper for defence in case of an attack.

Whilst the King's army refreshed themselves at Worcester, Cromwell was advancing with speed. His orders for assembling the forces and militia of the north were so well obeyed, that on his arrival in England, his army was daily increased by parties from all quarters. By this means, after his junction with Lambert and Harrison, he found an army much superior to the King's, which lay encamped about a mile from Worcester, with a resolution to stand upon the defence. Cromwell, before he attacked the King's army, thought proper to make a diversion on the other side of the Severn. For this purpose he detached Lambert, who marched directly to Upton, where was a bridge guarded by Massey. This passage was so vigorously attacked, that after a sharp engagement, Massey was obliged to abandon it. Immediately after, Cromwell ordered part of his army to go over to the western side of the Severn, which forced the King to send some of his forces the same way, and so to weaken that part of his army which was to sustain Cromwell's attack.

The 3d of September, a day fortunate to Cromwell by the defeat of the Scots at Dunbar the year before, he charged the royal army on both sides the Severn. After an engagement of some hours, the King's forces were repulsed on both sides the river, and forced to retire into the town in such confusion, that the entrance was forgotten to be defended. The King's solicitations were fruitless, to inspire his now vanquished troops with resolution to resist any longer the conqueror. At last, his cavalry seeing the enemy break into the town, fled, and left the infantry to the mercy of the English. The King himself was forced to fly through St. Martin's gate, and with great difficulty avoided falling into the enemy's hands. The foot were almost entirely killed or taken; and the horse being warmly pursued, were easily dispersed; so that most of the officers and cavaliers were made prisoners. It is pretended, of the Scots were slain about two thousand, and seven or eight thousand taken prisoners,* who being sent to London, were sold for slaves to the plantations of the American isles. Duke Hamilton, mortally wounded, died nine days after. Amongst the principal persons were General Lesley, the Earls of Lauderdale, Rothes, Carnwarth, Kelly, Derby, and Cleveland.†

The King, though happily escaped from the defeat, was under great difficulties. He was to avoid his pursuers; that was his only concern, but the thing was not easy. At last, after two months great fatigues, after infinite dangers escaped, after a great part of the kingdom traversed from Worcester to the county of Sussex, he embarked, and safely arrived in Normandy the 22d of October.‡

While Cromwell was in pursuit of the King, Monk, in

* On the King's side there were three thousand slain, and ten thousand taken prisoners; and of Cromwell's army one hundred slain, and three hundred wounded. Among the prisoners were three English Earls, seven Scotch Lords, six hundred and forty Colonels, and other officers; the King's standard, and one hundred and fifty-eight colours were also taken.

† Lesley reached Lancashire before he was apprehended, and the rest were overtaken and made prisoners, at Newport in Cheshire, by a detachment of Lilburn's horse.

‡ The King left Worcester at six o'clock in the afternoon, and without halting travelled about twenty-six miles, in company with fifty or sixty of his friends. To provide for his safety, he thought it best to separate himself from his companions; and he left them without communicating his intentions to any of them. By the Earl of Derby's directions he went to Boscobel, a lone house on the borders of Staffordshire, inhabited by one Penderell, a farmer. To this man Charles entrusted himself. The man had dignity of sentiment much above his condition; and though death was denounced against all who concealed the King, and a great reward promised to any one who should betray him, he professed and maintained unshaken fidelity. He took the assistance of his four brothers, equally honourable with himself; and, having clothed the King in a garb like their own, they led him into a neighbouring wood, put a bill into his hand, and pretended to employ themselves in cutting faggots.—Some nights he lay upon straw in the house, and fed upon such homely fare as it afforded. For a better concealment, he mounted upon an oak, where he sheltered himself among the leaves and branches for twenty-four hours. He saw several soldiers pass by. All of them were intent in search of the King; and some expressed, in his hearing, their earnest wishes of seizing him. This tree was afterwards denominated the Royal Oak; and for many years was regarded by the neighbourhood with great veneration.

Charles was in the middle of the kingdom, and could neither stay in his retreat, nor stir a step from it, without the most imminent danger. Fear, hopes, and party-zeal interested multitudes to discover him; and even the smallest indiscretion of his friends might prove fatal.

Having joined Lord Wilmot, who was skulking in the neighbourhood, they agreed to put themselves into the hands of Colonel Lane, a zealous royalist who lived at Bentley, not many miles distant. The King's feet were so hurt by walking about in heavy boots or country-men's in obedience to his orders, laid siege to Stirling, which resisted but few days. This place, one of the strongest of Scotland, where the public records were kept, surrendered the 14th of August. All the papers and records were sent to London, whence they never returned, the ship which was bringing them back, after the Restoration, being cast away. After the surrender of Stirling, Monk besieged Dundee, where the inhabitants of Edinburgh had conveyed their best effects, after the battle of Dunbar. During the siege, some Scotch gentlemen assembling some forces to relieve the town, they were surprised and dispersed by a detachment from Monk, and their leaders taken prisoners. Notwithstanding this misfortune, Major Lumsdale the Governor made a stout defence, till the town was taken by storm the first of September, two days before the battle of Worcester. The taking of Stirling and Dundee were followed by that of Aberdeen, St. Andrews, and all the rest of the towns and castles, capable of making resistance. Thus, in a short time, Monk reduced the whole kingdom of Scotland to the obedience of the English Parliament. This was the consequence of the King's resolution, to conduct the Scotch army into England.

The victory of Worcester, and the reduction of Scotland, gave such a reputation to the new republic, that every state in Europe either courted its friendship, or dreaded its arms. For this reason, most of the Sovereigns excused themselves from making offers to the King, or supplying him with money, for fear of being suspected by the Parliament. So, the King saw himself reduced to great extremities, and even to a want of common necessaries. He lived at Paris, maintained by his mother, who had a pension from the crown, but Cardinal Mazarin, making his court to the Parliament of England, took no notice of the distress of her unfortunate son.

On the other hand, Cromwell's glory and credit were so increased since the battle of Dunbar and Worcestor, that as he was master of the armies of the three kingdoms, he was in effect, master of the revolutions of the Parliament, no man daring openly to oppose him.

Cromwell returned to London the 21st of September, leading with him, in triumph, his principal prisoners, who were committed to the Tower, whence Massey, some time after, found means to escape. A majority of the Parliament, with the Speaker at their head, attended by the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, met him at Acton. Eight days after, the Earl of Derby was tried and sentenced by a council of war, and beheaded at Bolton, in the county of Lancaster.*

While these things passed in England, the Parliament's fleet became master of the Isle of Jersey, Cornet castle in the Isle of Guernsey, and the Isle of Man. In January following, Sir George Ascough reduced the Isle of Barbadoes, then governed by the Lord Willoughby of Parham, for the King; and the Isles of Nevis and St. Christopher submitted without opposition.

England enjoying a profound tranquillity, and Ireland being almost reduced, the Parliament thought of means to unite Scotland with the commonwealth of England. As they had conquered that kingdom, they believed they had a right to do it as they pleased, without consulting the Scots, who were no longer able to oppose their will. An act therefore passed in the English Parliament, which entirely abolished kingly power in Scotland, and united that kingdom to the English commonwealth, with a power to send a limited number of representatives to the Parliament. Commissioners were afterwards sent into Scotland, to adjust the particulars of this union. Most of the Scotch nobility seeing themselves unable to resist the Parliament, submitted to their pleasure.† The Marquis of Argyle became men's shoes which did not fit him, that he was obliged to mount on horseback; and he travelled in this situation to Bentley, attended by the Penderells, who had been so faithful to him. Lane formed a scheme for his journey to Bristol, where, it was hoped, he would find a ship in which he might transport himself. He had a near kinswoman, Mrs. Norton, who lived within three miles of that city, and was with child, very near the time of her delivery. He obtained a pass (for during these times of confusion, this precaution was requisite) for his sister Jane Lane and a servant, to travel towards Bristol, under pretence of visiting and attending her relation. The King rode before the Lady, and personated her servant.

When they arrived at Norton's, Mrs. Lane pretended, that she had brought along with her as her servant, a poor lad, a neighbouring farmer's son, who was ill of an ague; and she begged a private room for him, where he might be quiet. Though Charles kept himself retired in this room, the butler, one Pope, soon knew him: the King was alarmed, but made the butler promise, that he would keep the secret from every mortal, even from his master; and he was faithful to his engagement.

No ship, it was found, would, for a month, set sail from Bristol, either for France or Spain; and the King was obliged to go elsewhere for a passage. He entrusted himself to Colonel Windham, of Dorsetshire, an affectionate partizan of the royal family: the natural effect of the long civil wars, and of the furious rage to which all men were wrought up in their different factions, was, that every one's inclinations and affections were thoroughly known, and even the courage and fidelity of many, by a variety of incidents, had been put to the trial. The royalists too had, many of them, been obliged to make concealments in their houses for themselves, their friends or, more valuable effects; and the art of eluding the enemy had been frequently practised.—All these circumstances proved favourable to the King in the present exigency.—As he often passed through the hands of the Catholics, the Priest's-hole, as they called it, the place where they were obliged to conceal their persecuted priests, was sometimes employed for sheltering their distressed sovereign.

Windham, before he received the King, asked leave to entrust the important secret to his mother, his wife, and four servants on whose fidelity he could rely. Of all these, no one proved wanting either in honour or discretion. The venerable old matron, on the reception of her royal guest, expressed the utmost joy, that having lost, without regret, three sons and one grand-child in defence of his father, she was now reserved, in her declining years, to be instrumental in the preservation of himself. Windham told the King, that Sir Thomas, his father, in the year 1636, a few days before his death, called to him his five sons: "My children," said he, "we have hitherto seen serene and quiet times under our three last Sovereigns: but I must now warn you to prepare for clouds and storms. Factions arise on every side, and threaten the tranquillity of your native country. But whatever happen, do you faithfully honour and obey your Prince, and adhere to the crown. I charge you never to forsake the crown, though it should hang upon a bush."—"These last words," added Windham, "made such impressions in all our breasts, that the many afflictions of these sad times could never efface their indelible characters.—From innumerable instances, it appears how deep-rooted in the mind of the English gentry of that age was the principle of loyalty to their sovereign; that noble and generous principle, inferior only in excellence to the more enlarged and more enlightened affection towards a legal constitution. But during those times of military usurpation, these passions were the same.

The King continued several days in Windham's house, and all his friends in Britain, and in every part of Europe, remained in the most anxious suspense with regard to his fortunes: no one could conjecture whether he were dead or alive; and the report of his death being generally believed, happily relaxed the vigilant search of his enemies. Trials were made to procure a vessel for his escape; but he still met with disappointments. Having left Windham's house, he was obliged again to return to it. He passed through many other adventures; assumed different disguises; in every step was exposed to imminent perils; and received daily proofs of uncorrupted fidelity and attachment. The sagacity of a smith, who discovered that his horse's shoes had been made in the north, and not in the west, as he pretended, once detected him, and he narrowly escaped. At Shoreham in Sussex a vessel was at last found in which he embarked. He had been known to so many, that if he had not set sail in that critical moment, it had been impossible for him to escape. After one-and-forty days concealment, he arrived safely at Fescamp in Normandy. No less than forty men and women had at different times been prior to his concealment and escape.

* What reward his grandson had for this famous Earl's loyalty, will appear by the following inscription, on a building erected at Knowsley, his seat in Lancashire:

"James Earl of Derby, Lord of Man, and the Isles, grandson of James Earl of Derby, and of Charlotte daughter of Claude Duke de la Tremouille, whose husband James was beheaded at Bolton, xv Octob. mdclii. for strenuously adhering to Charles the second, who refused a bill past unanimously by both Houses of Parliament, for restoring to the family the estate lost by his loyalty to him. mdccxxxii.

† The Scots in general, freed from the tyranny of the ecclesiastics, were not much dissatisfied with the change. It had been a usual policy of the Presbyterian ecclesiastics to settle a chaplain in the great families, who acted as a spy upon his master, and gave them intelligence of the most private transactions and discourses of the family. A signal instance of priestly tyranny and the subjection of the nobility! They even obliged the servants to give intelligence against their masters. Whitelocke tells the following story.—The synod meeting at Perth, and citing the ministers and people who had expressed a dislike of their heavenly government, the men being out of the way, their wives resolved to answer for them. And, on the day of appearance, a hundred and twenty women, with good clubs in their hands, came and besieged the church, where the reverend ministers sat. They sent one of their number to treat with the females, and he threatening excommunication, they basted him for his became one of the most zealous adherents of the common-wealth, but the clergy were very much dissatisfied with this union.

By the victory at Worcester, the Independents seemed to have deprived the King of all refuge, and to have nothing more to fear from him. Nevertheless, the royalists were still a thorn in their side. Indeed, this party appeared too weak to recover by their own strength, but they were not without a possibility of receiving assistance from foreign powers. Of these powers, they dreaded neither France nor Spain; but there was another power which inspired them with fear, this was the Republic of the United Provinces, who could strongly assist the royalists

The Prince of Orange dying in October, 1650, the Parliament judged the occasion favourable to treat with the States, because the interest of that Prince could no longer obstruct the negociation. They sent therefore, in March 1651, Oliver St. John, and Walter Strickland, to the Hague, to negociate, not a bare alliance, but such an union, as might render them one commonwealth. This proposal met with great opposition from the states. First, the English pretended, the states should renounce all their alliances, except those common to them with the republic of England. Secondly, the conditions proposed by the English were of such a nature, that all the advantages were of their side, and the forces of the United Provinces were properly but to serve for augmentation of those of England. Thirdly, if the time of the arrival of the two Envoys at the Hague be considered, it will be easily seen, that the affairs of the Parliament were not yet in a situation to oblige the States to be contented with conditions, so little advantageous. On these accounts, the English Envoys returned in July, dissatisfied not only at their ill success, but also at some insults on their persons from the rabble at the Hague. The Parliament's resentment against the States was so great, that a war was resolved.* Pretexts were sought from injuries said to be done to the English by the Dutch thirty years before, at Amboyna, and other places in the Indies. It is pretended, Cromwell consented to this war, of which he saw no necessity, in pure complaisance to St. John, and some others, who appeared extremely incensed against Holland.

But as the people were to be managed, who would not have been easily persuaded of the necessity of this war, it was resolved to force the Hollanders to be the aggressors, or at least to furnish a pretence for the war. For this purpose, the Parliament, under colour of encouraging navigation, made an act prohibiting the importation of all foreign commodities except upon English bottoms, or such as were of the country from whence the commodities came. By this act, which was to commence the first of December, 1651, all commerce between England and Holland was destroyed, since that commerce consisted only in foreign merchandizes imported from Holland in their own vessels. Besides this, the Parliament granted letters of marque to several private men, who complained of an unjust confiscation of their ships in Holland.

The States easily perceived the Parliament's design, but instead of beginning hostilities, as was expected by the English, they sent an embassy to London, to solicit a revocation of the act. The Parliament received the ambassadors with marks of respect, and granted them several audiences, their aim being to intimate, that it should not be their fault if the peace between the two republics were not preserved. But when the particular articles came to be discussed, it was plain the Parliament was bent upon war. Instead of revoking the navigation act, several stale pretensions were revived. Satisfaction was demanded for the massacre of the English at Amboyna in the year 1622; for the losses sustained from the Dutch since the year 1618 in the Indies, Persia, the Mogul's dominions, Muscovy, Greenland, and the Isle of Polerone. These losses, according to the Parliament's estimation, amounted to seventeen hundred thousand pounds sterling. A suitable reparation was also insisted on for the murder of Dorislaus, committed at the Hague, under the eye of the States, who had taken no proper measures to bring the authors to punishment. In fine, it was pretended, that satisfaction should be given for the secret intelligence which the last ambassadors from the States had held with the late King during the civil war. For these satisfactions and reparations, the Parliament offered to make an alliance with the United Provinces, upon the terms proposed by their Envoys at the Hague.

A. D. 1652.] These propositions convinced the States that they were to prepare for war. Accordingly with great care and expence a fleet was put to sea of a hundred and fifty sail. They were unwilling however to declare war against the Parliament, and resolved if possible, to cause the English to be aggressors. For this purpose, while the States' Ambassadors were still at London, their Admiral Martin Van Tromp, one of the bravest and most experienced sea officers in Europe, appeared in the Channel with a fleet of forty-five ships of war, pretending to convoy some merchantmen, and came and anchored in Dover Road, probably with design to give the English a provocation to begin hostilities. Admiral Blake, who commanded the English fleet, consisting only of twenty-six sail, appearing in sight, the Dutch weighed anchor, and put to sea without striking their flag, whereupon Blake fired three guns without ball for a signal to strike, to which Tromp answered no otherwise than by drawing up his ships in line for battle, and in contempt of the signal, discharged one single gun; and coming up to the English Admiral gave him a broad-side. So, the fight began, without any certainty which side was the aggressor.† The two Admirals had positive orders so to behave, as not to come to an engagement without apparent necessity. The English say, Tromp had orders from the States not to strike to the English, to oblige them to begin hostilities. This is not improbable, though the Dutch authors do not mention it.‡ Blake being reinforced with eight ships, the engagement lasted from four in the afternoon till night. The English, if their historians are to be credited, had not a single ship damaged, and the Dutch lost two, one taken, and one sunk. They say farther, that night coming on, Tromp drew his fleet to the back of the Goodwin sands, and the next morning sailed for Zealand. The Dutch own the loss of two ships, but affirm the English had six sunk, and that night only saved their fleet from entire destruction.

The Dutch Ambassadors, knowing the intention of their masters, endeavoured, in an audience obtained of the Parliament, to show, the battle was a pure effect of chance. On the other hand, the States sent to the Parliament an Ambassador Extraordinary, to propose an agreement. This was Adrian Paw, who had been Plenipotentiary at the peace of Munster. But the Parliament not receding from any of the articles proposed before the rupture, the States recalled the Ambassadors, and resolved to continue the war. A manifesto was published, in which they pretended to demonstrate, the Parliament attacked them, without any provocation; and the Parliament answered in another, declaring all labour, kept him prisoner, and sent a party of sixty, who routed the rest of the clergy, bruised their bodies sorely, took all their baggage, and twelve horses. One of the ministers, after a mile's running, taking all creatures for his foes, meeting with a soldier, fell on his knees, who knowing nothing of the matter, asked the black coat what he meant? The female conquerors, having laid hold on the synod clerk, beat him till he forswore his office. Thirteen ministers rallied about four miles from the place, and voted that this village should never more have a synod in it, but be accursed, and that though in the years 1638-9, the godly women were cried up for stoning the Bishops, yet now the whole sex should be esteemed wicked.

* Hostilities began between the two nations in October 1651, when an English man of war, meeting with some Dutch fishermen, demanded of them the tenth herring, as an acknowledgment of England's sovereignty in those seas, (or else, insisted upon their striking sail) which the Dutch refused; whereupon they fell from words to blows, and the Dutch shooting first at the English, the English man of war sunk one of their ships, and all the men were lost.

† The refusal of striking the flag, and the broad-side given by Tromp to Blake, seem to put it out of all doubt, that the Dutch were the aggressors.

‡ The Lord Clarendon says, the council of the admiralty of Holland, who govern the maritime affairs without communication with the states-general, ordered Tromp not to strike.

the occasions of complaint above-mentioned. To this was added the refusal of the striking the flag, a right they were resolved to maintain, at all hazards. The States replied, it was true, their republic, in its infancy, had paid that compliment to the royal dignity, when England was under the dominion of a King, but they could not believe themselves obliged to the same respect since the monarchy was changed into a commonwealth.

The war being sufficiently declared, Van Tromp put to sea with a fleet of seventy ships, whilst Van Gallen sailed to the Mediterranean to fight the English there. Tromp's design was to engage Admiral Ascough who lay in the Downs with part of the English fleet. But, while he was waiting an opportunity, Admiral Blake with forty ships sailed to the northward, to attack the Herring fleet, and their convoy. Tromp being informed of it, followed and overtook him near Newcastle. But while he was preparing for the fight, a furious tempest so dispersed his fleet that he returned to Holland, with but forty sail. The rest that escaped shipwreck, arrived not at the Texel till some weeks after.

About the same time, Ruyter convoying a fleet of merchant-men with thirty-four ships,* was met by Sir George Ascough, and a furious engagement ensued, which was bravely fought on both sides till Ascough, at last was forced to retire to Plymouth, and leave Ruyter free passage to convoy his fleet into Holland.

During the engagements in the Channel, Van Gallen attacked and beat the English into the Mediterranean: but his victory cost him his life, being slain in the fight.

Meantime, the English putting to sea with a formidable fleet, made themselves masters of the Channel, the Dutch not daring to appear. Meanwhile, a considerable number of Dutch vessels returning from Holland, without being informed of the war, fell into the hands of the English, and amongst others, a fleet of forty sail from Portugal, and six India ships richly laden.

Whereupon the Dutch, not to expose their merchants to greater losses, gave notice to the merchant-men, homeward bound, to sail to the Isle of Rhe, where a fleet should be ready to convoy them. Pursuant to this project, Tromp left Goree in November, with seventy men of war, and six fire ships, and met Blake, who expected him in the Channel. This fight lasted from eight in the morning till night, when part of the English fleet retired to the Downs, and part into the Thames. A wound received by Blake having thrown his fleet into some disorder, he could not hinder Tromp from pursuing his course.†

In February, Blake again put to sea, with a fleet of eighty sail, being assisted, at his own request, with Monk and Dean, newly arrived from Scotland for that purpose. The intention of the three Admirals was to call upon Tromp in his return from the Isle of Rhe, with three hundred merchant ships, he was to convoy to Holland. The States being informed of the great preparations in England, had equipped twenty ships to join their Admiral in his passage, but they were hindered by contrary winds. In the meantime, Tromp entered the Channel, and conducting the merchant-men along the coasts of France, met the English fleet, much superior to his own number of ships. But finding himself too far advanced to recede, a furious engagement began, which lasted three days, and would have been renewed the fourth, had the ships on either side been able to sustain a fresh charge. The Dutch lost in this engagement eighteen men of war, and eight merchant-men. But their historians pretend, that one and twenty ships of the enemy were sunk, and three stranded. Each side challenged the victory. However that be, Tromp convoyed his three hundred merchant-men into Holland, the eight excepted, which fell into the hands of the English. After he had secured the merchant-men, he engaged the English four several times, but not in so important a manner.

A. D. 1653.] Shortly after, the King imagining, he had friends amongst the commanders of the English fleet, offered the States to put himself on board their fleet, without any command, except of such English ships as should come and join him. But the States thought not fit to accept his offer. It was considered by them as a snare, to engage them to declare for him, to which, in their present circumstances, they had no inclination. They wanted peace, and were unwilling to remove, or render it impossible, by espousing the King's cause. They even found a way to convey privately, to Lenthal the Speaker, a letter from the particular States of Holland, to propose an agreement. Some say, this was owing to a private intimation from Cromwell, who began to discover, that peace was now proper for his interests. He had the address to obtain from the Parliament a civil answer to the letter received by Lenthal; but the answer was directed to the States General. This drew from the States a letter of the 30th of April, in which it was openly desired, the Parliament would please to name a place for a treaty.

Cromwell at last perceived, the continuation of the war was a contrivance of his enemies, that the expence might render it necessary to disband the army, now become useless, to which he saw the House was inclined. This tended manifestly to undermine his authority. For though he had excellent qualities, and by his valour and capacity had raised the Commonwealth to its present grandeur, he was still feared. Had he not been supported by the army, his ruin had been infallible, the Parliament fearing that his credit, already too great, would become still greater, to the prejudice of the Commonwealth. Cromwell had even private information, that a conspiracy was forming against him, in which were engaged not only several Presbyterians and Royalists, but also some considerable members of the House, though of the Independent-party. Affairs therefore were in such a situation, that the Parliament was either to be subdued, or himself ruined.‡ Such a choice does not long amuse the ambitious. Cromwell, displeased at a design to requite his services with ingratitude, easily determined to risque every thing to make himself master of the Parliament, rather than become their slave, who properly owed all their power to him. He therefore caused the officers of the army, in a general council, to frame a petition, and present it to the Parliament; in which they demanded, "the arrears of their pay, that they might not be compelled to take free quarter upon their fellow subjects, who already paid such great contributions and taxes, which, they were well assured, if well managed, would defray all the charges of the war, and of the government."

The Parliament, as Cromwell had foreseen, complained of the insolence of this petition, and ordered a reprimand to the officers for their presumption, to intermeddle in affairs which belonged not to them, and to arraign the Parliament's management of the treasury. This drew from the army a second petition, which put the House in mind of some former professions they had made, "That they would be glad to be dissolved, and that there might be successive Parliaments, to undergo the same trouble they had done. They therefore desired them to remember, how many years they had sat, and though they had done great things, yet it was a great injury to the rest of the nation, to be utterly excluded from bearing any part in the service of their country, by their engrossing the whole power into their hands: and thereupon besought them, that they would settle a council of war for the administration of the government, during the interval, and then dissolve themselves, and summon a new Parliament; which, they told them, would be the most popular act they could perform."

* Our historians say, there were ninety sail of them, whereof thirty were merchant-men. Ascough had but thirty-eight sail.

† With a broom on his main-top-mast, as if he had swept, or would sweep, all the English shipping out of the channel. This year Prince Maurice was lost in a hurricane in the West-Indies.

‡ The little popularity and credit acquired by the republicans, farther stimulated the ambition of this enterprising politician. These men had not that large thought nor those comprehensive views which might qualify them for acting the part of legislators; selfish aims and bigotry chiefly engrossed their attention. They carried their rigid austerity so far as to enact a law declaring fornication after the first act to be felony, without benefit of clergy. A bill was introduced into the House against painting, patches, and other immodest dress of women, but it did not pass.

This remonstrance, though intended to exasperate the Parliament, appeared very just in itself, and agreeable to the general sentiment of the nation. They were themselves sensible of this; but, besides that it was very mortifying to them to divest themselves of an authority which had so many charms, they had reason to fear, that an account would be demanded of their actions. They were unwilling to quit possession, and yet could not avoid solemnly deliberating upon the petition. In this debate, all the members, who were officers in the army, strenuously supported the petition. The Presbyterians, who had been received into the House upon their swearing to the engagement, were also of opinion, that the Parliament ought to dissolve themselves, since it could not be doubted, that it was the nation's desire. But the negative was carried by a majority of voices. It was therefore resolved, that it was not yet time to dissolve this Parliament, while affairs were depending that could not be left unfinished, and particularly the important war with Holland. That nevertheless, the Speaker should issue out writs for filling the vacant seats in the House. At the same time, a committee was appointed, speedily to prepare a bill, by which all persons were forbidden to present such petitions, under pain of being declared guilty of high-treason.

This was what Cromwell expected. Being therefore very certain, this Parliament was odious to the people, and not more agreeable to the army, he believed, he owed no farther regard to men, who only sought his ruin. When things were concerted with the principal officers, he came to the House, the 20th of April, with some officers and soldiers, and without any ceremony, told the members, he was come to put an end to their power, of which they had made an ill use; and therefore, they were immediately to be dissolved. The officers and soldiers entered at the same time, and staid at the door till the members walked out. Cromwell, as they came by him, reproached one with drunkenness, another with corruption, not sparing any of those whom he knew to be his enemies. After that, he gave the mace to one of his officers, and locked the door.* This was an extraordinary action, but no more than was done a few years before by General Fairfax, when he expelled and imprisoned the members, who were disagreeable to the army.

It cannot, however, be affirmed, that Cromwell, by this proceeding, had pulled off the mask. Had he, after this, called a free Parliament, and submitted to it himself, the people would have loaded him with blessings. But the sequel clearly discovered, he was only labouring for himself.

A little after, Cromwell published a declaration to justify the dissolution of the Parliament, and as his designs were not yet manifested, this declaration was subscribed by the Colonels of the army, and all the sea-captains, and met with a general approbation. He might have taken the administration of the government, by the same authority that he had dismissed the Parliament. But he had no design to usurp it so notoriously. He had contrived, that it should be given him by a Parliament, in order to dazzle the eyes of the public with so venerable an authority. The council of officers, who had presented the petition to the Parliament, being still assembled, Cromwell caused them to resolve, that a hundred and forty-four persons should be intrusted with the supreme power. In the choice of these persons, Cromwell at once displayed his abilities, and discovered, that he had some secret design, which would at a proper season manifest itself. They were chiefly men of no birth, illiterate, with no particular merit, unexperienced in affairs, in a word utterly incapable of an employ of that consequence. Cromwell easily foresaw, they would soon be weary, and forced to put the government into his hands, and so, furnish him with a pretence to assume it to himself. This notable choice being made, he wrote to each in particular, to require them to assemble at Whitehall the 4th of July in order to take upon them the administration of the government.†

These new Sovereigns meeting on the day appointed, Cromwell made a speech, and when it was ended, gave them an instrument signed by himself and the principal officers of the army, by which the supreme power was lodged in their hands. This instrument imported, that all these members, or any forty of them, were to be held and acknowledged the supreme authority of the nation, to whom all persons were to yield obedience and subjection till the 3d day of November, in the year 1654, that is, during one year and four months. That three months before their dissolution, they were to make choice of other persons to succeed them, whose authority should not exceed one year, and then they were likewise to provide and take care for a like succession in the government. But it will presently appear, that Cromwell did not intend, this regulation should be exactly observed. These members, thus empowered, made no scruple to call themselves a Parliament, and chose one Rouse for their Speaker. Amongst these members was one Barebone a leather-seller, who, in his neighbourhood, passed for a notable speaker, because he used to entertain them with long harangues upon the times. From this man the people, in derision, called them Barebone's Parliament.‡

The letter written by the States General to the Parliament the 20th of April, the day on which the Parliament was dissolved, was referred to the council of state, established by Cromwell and his officers, till the new Parliament should assemble. This council, under the direction of Cromwell, gave a favourable answer to the states, with hopes of a peace, upon sending plenipotentiaries to London. At last the States General named four ambassadors to negotiate a peace at London.

Whilst their instructions were preparing, the fleets of England and the States met, the 2d of June, and came to an engagement, which was renewed the next day. In this last engagement, Tromp, fighting with great disadvantage, was obliged to retire in disorder, having lost many ships, which were sunk or taken by the English.§

After this battle, the English fleet being reinforced to the number of a hundred ships, saw itself, some time, mistress of the sea, and gave frequent alarms to the coasts of Holland. At last, Tromp having repaired his fleet as much as possible, though it was inferior to the English both in the number and largeness of the ships,‖ attacked the enemies' fleet again near the Texel. The fight lasted from morning till night without any considerable advantage to either side. It was renewed the next day with the same fury, Tromp being reinforced

* Whitelock, who was present, says, Cromwell led into the House a file of musqueteers with him, and in a furious tone bade the Speaker leave his chair, and told the House, "They had sate long enough, unless they had done more good; that some of them were whoremasters, (looking toward Henry Martin, and Sir Peter Wentworth,) others of them were drunkards, and some corrupt and unjust men, and scandalous in the profession of the Gospel; and that it was not fit they should sit any longer, and desired them to go away." Whereupon, among all the Parliament men, of whom many wore swords, and would sometimes talk big, not one offered to draw against Cromwell, but all tamely departed the House. He bade one of his soldiers "take away that fool's bauble, the mace."

† After a short preamble, the letter ran thus: "I Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General, and commander in chief of all the armies and forces raised, or to be raised within this Commonwealth, do hereby summon and require you (being one of the persons nominated) personally to appear at the council chamber at Whitehall, within the city of Westminster, upon the 4th of July next ensuing the date hereof, then and there to take upon you the trust unto which you are hereby called and appointed, to serve as a member of the county of——and hereof you are not to fail." O. Cromwell.

‡ His name was Praise-God Barebone.

§ There were six sunk, and twelve taken, with thirteen hundred and fifty prisoners. The English fleet was at first commanded jointly by Blake, Monk, and Dean. Dean was killed, and in the engagement which followed, Monk commanded alone.

‖ The Dutch had ninety men of war, and the English one hundred and six.

with twenty-seven ships, nor did this second day decide the victory. The third day opened with a fresh engagement, in which Tromp was killed by a musket-ball. But Vice-Admiral De Witzen continued the fight, till the two fleets, as if by consent, retired to their own coasts, unable to fight any longer. The loss on both sides was very considerable,* and neither could justly boast of the victory; but the loss of Admiral Tromp was irreparable to Holland.

Cromwell took care speedily to repair the English fleet, in hopes of receiving some advantage from the consternation caused by the death of Tromp, the loss of so many ships, and the division then reigning amongst the United Provinces. But a violent storm so damaged his fleet, that he was under a necessity of either making a peace, or loading the people with new taxes, which, in his present situation, was very improper. He listened therefore to the propositions of the States, and the whole following winter was spent in this negotiation.

Barebone's Parliament did nothing considerable, in a session of more than five months.† At last, the 12th of December, the Speaker, with a good number of the members, who knew Cromwell's intentions, being assembled sooner than usual, one of them rose up and said, that they were unequal to the burthen laid upon them, and therefore proposed a dissolution of themselves, and a resignation of the sovereign authority into the hands from whom it was received. This proposal met with a ready and unanimous approbation. Then the Speaker and all the present members, without waiting for those who were not yet come, left their seats and went directly to Cromwell and the council of officers, to whom they declared, that they found themselves incapable of the trust reposed in them, resigned the instrument they had received, and besought them to take care of the government. Thus Cromwell and his council of officers were once more invested with the supreme power, by that Parliament on which themselves had conferred their pretended authority. This artifice was so gross, that Cromwell's belief to impose upon the people, is amazing.

Two days after, the council of officers, by virtue of the authority lately given them by the Parliament, declared that for the future the government of the republic should reside in a single person, namely, Oliver Cromwell, Captain-General of the forces of England, Scotland and Ireland, who should have the title of Protector of the three kingdoms, and be assisted by a council of twenty-one persons.

The 16th of December the council of officers sent for the commissioners of the Great Seal, with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, and informing them that Cromwell was made Protector, caused to be read in their presence a writing called the Instrument of Government, the substance whereof was:

I. A Parliament to be called every three years by the Protector.

II. The first to assemble on the 3d of September, 1654.

III. No Parliament to be dissolved till they had sat five months.

IV. Such bills as are offered to the Protector by the Parliament, if not confirmed by him in twenty days, to be laws without him.

V. That his council should not exceed the number of one-and-twenty, nor be less than thirteen.

VI. That immediately after the death of Cromwell, the council shall chuse another Protector before they rise.

VII. That no Protector after the present shall be General of an army.

VIII. The Protector shall have power to make war and peace.

IX. That the Protector and his council may make laws, which shall be binding to the subjects, during the intervals of Parliament.

After the reading of this instrument, Cromwell took an oath to observe it to the utmost of his power. Then he was conducted to Whitehall with great ceremony, Lambert carrying the sword of state before him, and from that time the title of Highness and Lord Protector was given him. Immediately after, he was proclaimed as such at London, and then in the three kingdoms, which formed but one Commonwealth. The city of London invited him to a splendid entertainment, where the solemnity of his reception was such as had been at any time performed to the King.‡

* Twenty-seven Dutch ships were fired or sunk, and above one thousand prisoners taken. The English lost four ships, four hundred common sailors, and eight captains; and had above seven hundred men, and five captains wounded.

† They made an act for marriages, ordering the banns to be published in the next market, three several days, and the ceremony to be performed by a justice of peace. And that there should be a register appointed in every parish to keep an account of them.

‡ At the time of Barebone's Parliament, mentioned above, it was usual for the pretended saints to change their names from Henry, Anthony, William, Edward, &c. which they regarded as heathenish, into others more sanctified and godly: even the New Testament names were not held in such regard as those which were borrowed from the Old Testament, Hezekiah, Habakkuk, Joshua, and Zerobabel. Sometimes a whole godly sentence was adopted as a name. Here are the names of a jury said to have been enclosed in the county of Sussex about that time.

Accepted, Trevor of Norsham.
Redeemed, Compton of Battle.
Faint not, Hewit of Heathfield.
Make Peace, Heaton of Hare.
God Reward, Smart of Fivehurst.
Standfast on High, Stringer of Crowhurst.
Earth, Adams of Warbleton.
Called, Lowe of the same.
Kill Sin, Pimple of Witham.

Hope for, Bending of the same.
Graceful, Harding of Lewes.
Meek, Brewer of Okeham.

"Cromwell," says Cleveland, "hath beat up his drums clean through the Old Testament. You may learn the genealogy of our Saviour by the names of his regiment. The muster-master has no other list than the first chapter of St. Matthew." The brother of this Praise-God Barebone had for name, "If Christ had not died for you, you had been damned Barebone." But the people tired of this long name, retained only the last two words, and commonly gave him the appellation of Damn'd Barebone.

PART II.

OLIVER CROMWELL, Protector.

A. D. 1654.] THE peace between England and the United Provinces was at last concluded, and the treaty signed the 5th of April, 1654. By this treaty Cromwell made great advantage of the necessity, the States were under, to make peace. They could not obtain it without promising to pay large sums for the damages done to the English thirty years since.* They consented to strike to the ships of the commonwealth, as they had before done to those of the King. They entirely abandoned the interest of Charles II. and obliged themselves to receive no exile from England into their dominions. They promised to restore to the English twenty-two merchant ships confiscated by the King of Denmark, or to pay their full value. Lastly, by a separate article, the States bound themselves never to admit the young Prince of Orange to be their Stadt-holder, General, or Admiral. But this article was ratified only by the province of Holland, the other provinces refusing it, and Cromwell not judging it proper to continue the war to force them to it. Thus ended a war which had been very warm on both sides, and inexpressibly destructive to both nations. It is said, the two Provinces of Holland and Zealand lost in it fifteen hundred ships, which fell into the hands of the English. And this very war, which had been undertaken to ruin Cromwell, served to advance him, as it obliged him to dissolve the Parliament for his own preservation.

Though the new Protector met with a general submission, it was with open complaints of his usurping the supreme power, by a pretended title, conferred on him by men without authority. The royalists considered Cromwell's advancement as a mortal wound to the King. The Presbyterians were not much more pleased with it: for though their government still subsisted in the church, they could hardly endure the liberty of conscience enjoyed by all the Protestants. Besides, they were excluded from the best posts, which it was Cromwell's care to fill with men of approved fidelity to himself. The Presbyterians were nevertheless caressed by him, because their assistance was needful to accomplish his project of being confirmed in his dignity by a free Parliament, where he foresaw they would have considerable influence. But he hated the cavaliers, and kept them very low. This occasioned many conspiracies against him, the authors of which were rigorously punished,† particularly Mr. Vowell, and Mr. Gerard, the first of whom was hanged in London, and the other beheaded in the Tower.

At the same time, and upon the same scaffold, Don Pantaleon Sa, Knight of Malta, and brother of the Portuguese Ambassador, lost his head. That gentleman having quarrelled with the same Mr. Gerard on the New Exchange, returned next day with a strong retinue. Unhappily, he singled out a man in the crowd whom he mistook for Gerard, and entering into a new quarrel, killed him, and others were wounded by his servants; after which, he retired to his brother the Ambassador's. This tumult drew the people together, who surrounded the Ambassador's house, and threatened to drag the criminals to justice. Cromwell being informed of it, dispatched an officer, with some soldiers, to demand the murderers. The Ambassador loudly complained of the insult offered him, and demanded an audience of the Protector, but was refused, and told, that if the criminals were not delivered, the people would not be appeased, nor could the Protector answer for the consequences: that as a man had been killed, and several wounded, justice must be satisfied. In the mean time, the people continued their noise and menaces; so that the Ambassador, seeing himself too weak to resist, was at last forced to deliver up his brother, and the rest that were concerned, in expectation of afterwards obtaining their pardon. But Cromwell continuing inflexible, the Portuguese gentleman was beheaded in the Tower, and his accomplices hanged at Tyburn. The situation of Portugal prevented her from resenting this infraction of the law of nations; and her ambassador soon after signed with Cromwell a treaty of peace and alliance, greatly to the advantage of English commerce.

Since Charles II.'s arrival in France, after his miraculous escape from the battle of Worcester, he had lived in extreme want, not having wherewithal to subsist. The court of France took no notice of his necessities, whether in complaisance to Cromwell, or from a desire of making a strict alliance with him, or through dread of his declaring in favour of Spain. So, the King was in a melancholy state. He had even the mortification to see Monsieur de Bourdeaux, who till then had been his resident in England, appointed Ambassador by the French court, upon Cromwell's being declared Protector. This alteration convinced the King, that France designed an alliance with Cromwell, and he did not doubt but the treaty would be followed with a request to him to depart the kingdom. To prevent this compliment, he let Cardinal Mazarin know, that he intended to withdraw. To facilitate the execution of this design, the Cardinal promised him the arrears of a pension of six thousand livres a month, which had been granted him, but never regularly paid, and the continuance of the same, as long as he should be out of France. At the same time, the King received another small relief, which enabled him to discharge his debts. Prince Rupert arrived safely at Nantes with the fleet, after having lost his brother Maurice in a storm. Besides that the ships were extremely damaged, and the King unable to repair them, he was in great want of money, which determined him to sell the ships, with the ordnance and tackling. Cardinal Mazarin was the purchaser, at a very cheap rate, and paid him the money without delay. After that, Prince Rupert repaired to Paris, and taking leave of the King, withdrew into Germany. The King, as soon as he had received the money, left Paris, and chose Cologne for his retreat, where he continued some years.

The King, before his departure from France, sent Wilmot, now Earl of Rochester, ambassador to the Emperor, and some other Princes of Germany, to procure a supply of money. He even applied to the Pope, by the mediation of Cardinal de Retz, and it is pretended

* To deliver up the island of Polerone in the East-Indies, taken from the English in the reign of King James, and to pay, it is said, three hundred thousand pounds for the affair of Amboyna, (85,000*l.* whereof to the English East India company,) for which the two last Kings could never get any satisfaction.

† There was a high court of Justice erected on purpose, "To try such as were accused of holding a correspondence with Charles Stuart, and of having a design against the life of the Protector."

that in order to succeed; the Cardinal prevailed with him to change his religion, and privately received his abjuration.

While the King was in this state of adversity, Cromwell was honoured, respected, and feared by all the powers of Europe.

Since Cromwell had left Ireland, in 1650, Ireton his son-in-law, who commanded there as his deputy, treated the Irish rebels, who fell into his hands, with great severity, the Parliament having ordered no mercy to be shewn to the massacrers. But this was not capable to lead the Irish to an union with the Marquis of Ormond. On the contrary, a religious zeal prevailing among them, by the persuasions of their monks and clergy, they could not bear to be under a Protestant commander. They even conspired against the life of the Marquis, and in an insurrection at Limeric, raised by a monk, he was in danger of being killed. At last, the Irish Bishops, in a full assembly, published a declaration, protesting they would have no communion with heretics, nor obey the Marquis of Ormond. Then, they required him to resign his command to a Catholic, on whom they could better rely. The Marquis being thus exposed to the suspicious and treacherous designs of the Irish, and utterly unable to restore the King's affairs, made the Marquis of Clanrickard his deputy, and retired into France, whence afterwards, he accompanied the King to Cologne.

Ireton dying of the plague in 1651, the Parliament gave the command of their forces in Ireland, to Lieutenant-General Edmund Ludlow, a republican, and one of Charles the First's Judges.

The Irish were not more obedient to Clanrickard than to Ormond. The Catholic clergy, and all Ulster, refused to have any society with the English, under the command of the Marquis, though a Catholic.

In the following years, the Irish, wholly unable to resist the Parliament forces, were exposed to the utmost severity of the English commanders. The barbarity they had exercised upon the English Protestants, settled in Ireland, was justly retaliated upon them. Many were executed, and others, to the number of a hundred thousand, most of whom perished with hunger and misery, had leave to go into the service of foreign Princes. The families which remained in the country, were, for the most part, removed into Connaught, where some lands were assigned them for their subsistence, while the rest was delivered to the adventurers, who advanced money for the Irish war. Part also of these confiscated lands was given to the officers and soldiers in payment of their arrears, and part was sold to the best bidders. In 1654, Fleetwood, who had married Ireton's widow, Cromwell's daughter, was made Governor of Ireland, and two years after, was succeeded by Henry Cromwell, younger son of the Protector.

Though Scotland was subdued, it was not entirely free from disturbances. The general assemblies of the kirk had been suppressed by Cromwell, knowing, that from thence flowed all the troubles which had been for so many years in Scotland. Besides, as it was his intention to introduce in that kingdom a liberty of conscience as well as in England, he knew it would be impossible to execute his design so long as these assemblies subsisted. The people of Scotland were enraged at a liberty so contrary to their covenant, and the maxims of their kirk. They sufficiently discovered their sentiments, though to no purpose, since they had neither places, nor forces, nor arms, nor leaders, to enable them to attempt a deliverance. On the other hand, some Lords and Gentlemen of the King's party still kept in the High-lands, with troops under the command of the Earl of Glencairn. But these troops, neither well armed nor disciplined, were defeated by Colonel Morgan. Nevertheless, with the remains of their troops, they still kept in some inaccessible places. At last, discord arising among them, they were forced to send to the King for Colonel Middleton. On Middleton's arrival, Glencairn quitted them. Middleton supported the remains of this party about a year, and then was obliged to forsake it.

As by the Instrument of Government, a Parliament was to assemble the 3d of September, Cromwell called one for that day. But in his writs for election of members, there was a strict order not to elect any persons, or their sons, who had borne arms for the King; and this was punctually obeyed, A new regulation was also made to proportion the number of representatives to the largeness of the boroughs and counties, and to their respective shares of the public expences.

The Parliament being assembled, Cromwell made a speech in the Painted-Chamber, where the House waited on him. He briefly touched upon the disorders of the preceding government, and endeavoured to justify the present establishment. After an assurance of his good intentions, he represented to them his services for the nation, since the dissolution of the long Parliament, and told them, he had called a free Parliament, agreeably to the desire of all good Englishmen; adding, that he did not speak to them as one that would be a lord over them, but as one that would be a fellow-servant, in the great affair of settling the government. Upon his recommendation, Lenthal, Speaker of the long Parliament, was chosen again to that post. It appeared very soon, that the Parliament had many members who were enemies of tyranny, and having served in the long Parliament, had imbibed maxims very contrary to those established by Cromwell. The first thing proposed, was to examine by what authority they were assembled; a question unexpected by Cromwell. In all appearance, his enemies designed to give him a mortal blow, by a decision that his authority was imaginary and illegal. Perhaps too, the Parliament intended to seize the Sovereign power, though convened by an unlawful authority. Cromwell himself had given them an instance of what could be done with the assistance of force. But as he had friends, as well as enemies, in the House, he found means to make them lose time, by the opposition they met with, from the officers and others who espoused his interest. So, though he could not hinder the frequent debates on this question, he gave his enemies cause to apprehend, that they should not carry it, when it came to be put. At last, perceiving they only waited a favourable opportunity to put the question, he sent for the members to meet him in the Painted-Chamber, where he told them, they were too free in calling an established government into question, from which themselves had derived their authority, since if they were not lawfully convened, they had no power to debate. At their return to the House, they found a guard at the door, refusing entrance to any person, who would not first sign an engagement in these words.—"I. A. B. do hereby freely promise and engage myself, to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector, and to the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and shall not (according to the tenor of the indenture, whereby I am returned to serve in this present Parliament) propose or give any consent to alter the government, as it is settled in one single person and a Parliament." Many refusing to sign this engagement, were excluded the House.

Notwithstanding all this, the members themselves, who had signed the engagement, were not more tractable, and ceased not to shew their ill-will to Cromwell. They had only signed, to have it in their power to destroy him, when a favourable occasion offered. A plot was formed chiefly by the cavaliers, but with the privity of many members of Parliament, to raise an army in several parts of the kingdom. Cromwell being informed of it by his spies, prevented the design of his enemies, by a dissolution of the Parliament eleven days before the time fixed for its continuance, by the Instrument of Government, namely, on the 22d of January. Though he was not informed of all the particulars, he knew, in general, that an insurrection was intended in several places, and had the names of some that were to be the principal actors. Two days after the dissolution of the Parliament, Major Wildman was arrested by his order, and a declaration was found in his house, containing the reasons which obliged the English to take up arms against Cromwell. Some others, as well republicans as royalists, were also apprehended.

Since the King's retreat to Cologne, he had received frequent expresses from his friends, informing him of the general dislike of Cromwell's government, and of the favourable opportunity for a general rising. What they said concerning the general discontent, was very true. But they built upon a false principle, which had often deceived Charles I. and now likewise deceived them. They imagined, that all who were displeased with the government were disposed to serve the King, and restore him without any condition. Upon this foundation it was, that they formed the project of an insurrection in the west, and of another in the north, not doubting of the army's joining, or at least suffering the cavaliers to act undisturbed against Cromwell. This project was communicated to the King, who approved of it as well as of the day appointed for the execution, namely, the 18th of April. The King dispatched the necessary commissions, and privately came into Zealand to be ready to pass into England if the undertaking should be crowned with success. At the same time, Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, repaired secretly to London with Sir Joseph Wagstaff, who had been Major-General in the army of the late King. At London their friends were consulted, and it was resolved, Wagstaff should conduct the insurrection, which was to be in the west, and the Earl of Rochester that in the north.

On the day appointed, Wagstaff came within two miles of Salisbury, where he found Penruddock, a Cornish gentleman, Jones, Grove, and some others, who had assembled about two hundred horse. With this small force they entered Salisbury without any opposition. For as it was then the time of the assizes, little notice was taken of those who entered the city. The market place was immediately seized, and all the stables locked up, that the horses might be at their devotion. After this, the judges were seized, with the sheriff, and were in great danger of being hanged for their refusal to proclaim the King, who notwithstanding was proclaimed. But soon after, the conspirators perceiving, that the inhabitants remained in their houses, without offering to join them, they were discouraged, and leaving the town, took the western route. A troop of horse, accidentally quartered in the neighbourhood, pursued and inspired them with such terror, that at their approach they laid down their arms. Wagstaff fortunately escaped, but Penruddock, Grove, and Jones were taken. The two first were beheaded, and the other hanged; and many, concerned in the plot, were sold for slaves, and sent to Barbadoes. Notwithstanding the great hopes conceived by the royalists of a general rising throughout the kingdom, the people no where attempted to favour the enterprise; and the whole was ended in two or three days.

The Earl of Rochester repaired to the county of York, where he found some gentlemen zealous for the King's service. But after an enquiry into what they could perform, he thought it not proper to make any attempt, but returned to the King with an account of what had passed.

The King, having lost the hopes he had been made to conceive, returned to Cologne. Soon after his arrival it was discovered, that one of his domestics, named Manning, lately come from England, held a secret correspondence with Thurloe, Cromwell's secretary, and acquainted him with the transactions of the King's court. He was apprehended and shot to death in a castle belonging to the Duke of Newburg.

After the death of Charles I. the commonwealth of England grew so powerful, that it was too late for France to endeavour to weaken it, especially as she was then engaged in a war with Spain. If France had assisted Charles II. she would have run the risk of seeing the Parliament in alliance with Spain, which in that juncture was not to be hazarded. For this reason, the interests of Charles II. were entirely abandoned by France, and all his assistance from thence was a pension too inconsiderable for his subsistence. The English feared her so little, that in 1652, their fleet made no scruple to attack that of France, sent to the relief of Dunkirk, besieged by the Spaniards, and taken by them the same year. Notwithstanding that affront, France sent an ambassador to the Parliament to desire their friendship.

After the death of Charles I. the King of Spain paid great regard to the Parliament, and gave them no just cause to make war upon him. All that England could reproach him with, was, his receiving, though very coldly, in 1649, Lord Cottington and Mr. Hyde, as ambassadors from Charles II. but without entering with them into any negotiation, that might create jealousy in the Parliament. The sole design of this embassy was, to procure some money from the Spanish court for the King's subsistence, in which the ambassadors were unsuccessful. Nevertheless, Cromwell, now made protector, had no sooner concluded a peace with Holland, then he resolved to attack Spain. The grounds of this war are not easy to be guessed.*

On his advancement to the Protectorship, he sent out two fleets, one under the command of Blake, to the Mediterranean, to chastise the Algerines, who frequently took English vessels, and the other under Penn, with thirty ships, and about five thousand land soldiers commanded by Venables. The two last commanders had sealed orders from Cromwell, which were to be opened at a prefixed time. This fleet sailed from Portsmouth the 27th of December, and arrived at Barbadoes the 28th of January, whence they sailed again the 30th of March 1655. By the sealed orders, the two commanders were to proceed to Hispaniola and take St. Domingo, the capital of the island. Cromwell's instructions for this undertaking were so particular and circumstantial, that they appeared to be drawn by men thoroughly acquainted with the country. At the approach of the English fleet, the Spaniards abandoned St. Domingo. But Venables, instead of landing his troops, according to his instructions, within a mile of the place, disembarked them at a much greater distance. This gave the inhabitants time to come to themselves, return to the town, and put it in a posture of defence. The English, when they approached St. Domingo, were so fatigued, by a long march, by the excessive heat, by hunger and thirst, that they were easily repulsed, and forced to retire to their ships, leaving many dead and wounded in the island.

This attempt miscarrying, the English fleet sailed to Jamaica, and seized the isle with little opposition. Some troops were left there, which were afterwards reinforced by Cromwell, in order to preserve this conquest, which the English have ever since retained. Venables was sent to the Tower on his return to London, but soon discharged. The war being sufficiently declared by this attempt, the King of Spain ordered the effects of the English merchants in all his dominions to be seized. Nor did the mischief stop there; for by this war, so unjustly undertaken, the English forfeited the Spanish trade, which, transferred to the Dutch, helped them to repair the losses sustained in the last war.

The war with Spain was soon followed by a peace with France, proclaimed at London the 23d of October. This peace was easily made, since France was willing to forget the injury received from the English in 1652.†

A. D. 1655.] Cromwell's usurpation was so visible, that a man must have wilfully shut his eyes not to see it. He himself was so convinced of the unlawfulness

* It is probable, the chief motive of it was, that he might be able, with the help of Spanish gold, to carry on his design in England, without depending upon a Parliament for money.

† This confederacy was dearly purchased on the part of England, for by it the balance of the two crowns of France and Spain was destroyed, and a foundation laid for the future greatness of the French, to the unspeakable prejudice of all Europe in general, and of the English nation in particular, whose interest it had been hitherto accounted to maintain that equality as near as might be. It is remarkable, that, in this treaty, Cromwell would not allow the French King to call himself King of France, but of the French; when he himself assumed the title of Protector of England and France. And, what is more, in the instrument of the treaty, Cromwell's name was put before the French King's.

of his power, that he would fain have had it confirmed by a free Parliament, being the only way which could furnish him with a plausible pretence to exercise it. But failing of success, he continued where he was, that is, invested with the dignity of Protector, by men who had no power to confer it. Wherefore, the authority of a Parliament appeared to him absolutely necessary to confirm him in his own. But, as he had experienced what was to be expected from a free Parliament, he resolved to call one which might be more at command. He therefore summoned a Parliament to meet the 17th of September; but he took such measures that though the people seemed to enjoy a perfect freedom in the choice of their representatives, he secured a majority of voices. Besides, he would admit no man into the House, who had not first promised under his hand, to do nothing against the established government. This Parliament, composed of the representatives of the three kingdoms, met on the day appointed. But above a hundred members, refusing to sign the engagement, were denied their seats in the House. The rest appeared ready to perform Cromwell's desires. An act was forthwith passed, for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart, (so they called the King) which was signed by all the members. By another act, it was declared high treason to attempt the life of the Protector. In short, in the space of some months, the Parliament liberally granted all the money desired by Cromwell, as well for the maintenance of the army and government, as for the continuation of the war against Spain.

Some days before the Parliament met, Blake and Montague, their Admirals, falling in with eight Spanish ships, returning from the West Indies richly laden, took two, and stranded some others. This action was performed near Cadiz, where the English Admirals had long expected this fleet. Cromwell ordered the two prizes to be brought to Portsmouth, and the money and goods to be conveyed in waggons, in a sort of triumph, to London.

In January 1656-7, a conspiracy against his person was discovered by Cromwell, by one Sindercomb, discharged out of his guards. This man being convicted, and condemned to die, was found dead in prison, the day on which he was to be executed. No accomplices were discovered.

A. D. 1657.] About two months after, some Anabaptists were discovered, who had projected to kill Cromwell. Major-General Harrison, Vice-Admiral Lawson, Colonel Rich, Major Danvers, and some others, all Anabaptists, on suspicion of being concerned in the conspiracy, were put under arrest.

Since Blake and Montague had taken the two prizes, they had continued cruising off Cadiz, in expectation of the Spanish fleet returning from Peru. As this fleet did not appear, though it should now have been arrived, Blake had notice, it was retired to Teneriffe, one of the Canaries, till the English fleet should be sailed from Cadiz. Whereupon, he stood for the Canaries, the beginning of April, and found there the Spanish fleet, consisting of six galeons richly laden, and ten other ships of less burthen. The commander of this fleet had anchored in the bay of Santa Cruz, and taken all imaginable care to secure himself against an attack. The ten smaller ships were moored close to the land, and defended by two forts well mounted with guns, and several batteries erected on the shore. But the galeons drawing more water, could not come so near the land, but lay farther off, with their broad-sides towards the sea. Blake seeing no possibility of approaching the ten ships, resolved, notwithstanding the rashness of the undertaking, to attack the galeons. Accordingly, with a fair wind, he approached the galeons, received their fire, and boarded them. After an obstinate fight, he possessed himself of the galeons, and as the wind, which had brought him into the bay, would not serve to carry them out, set them on fire. Immediately after, a land breeze arising, put him safe to sea again. The Spaniards, on this occasion, sustained a great loss, in ships, money, men, and merchandize: but the English acquired nothing but glory. Blake dying in his return to England, was pompously buried by Cromwell, in Henry the VIIth's chapel, among the monuments of the Kings.

The Parliament, which met the 17th of September, continued their session without interruption, being employed in the most important affair that could ever come under their consideration. Whether Cromwell had now formed the project of his higher advancement, or the disposition of the House in his favour, inspired him with the thought, he suddenly became more popular than ever. He caressed all parties alike. The Presbyterians were told, he was not far from their sentiments; the nobility met with great respect from him; and he appeared less incensed against the King's party. At last, after his friends and creatures had been long labouring to dispose men in his favour, Mr. Pack, a member of Parliament, and one of the city aldermen, proposed, in direct terms, that he might be invested with the title of King. This proposition was immediately seconded by a great many members, and it was even observed, that his known enemies very readily gave their consent to it. These imagined, there was no better way to ruin him, and excite plots against his life. But for the same reason, his principal friends opposed it with all their power. It is, nevertheless, very probable, he was privy to this proposal, though he thought not fit to tell it to Desborrow his brother-in-law, or Fleetwood his son-in-law, from whom it met with the greatest opposition. This contract between Cromwell's friends, held those in suspence, who only intended to make their court to him, and caused them to be irresolute. Wherefore this proposal was debated in the House two days successively. In all appearance, the irresolute were informed, in this interval, what they were to do. However that be, it was at last carried by a majority of voices, that the crown should be offered to Cromwell. Pursuant to this resolution, the House immediately appointed a committee, to acquaint his highness with what had been resolved for the public good. He seemed surprised at the offer, and told the committee, he thought it very strange, the Parliament should entertain such a design: that he did not believe it proper for them to offer, nor would his conscience give him leave to accept it. The committee expecting this answer, replied, they did not question but he would grant their desire, when he should be informed of the reasons which had induced the Parliament to take this resolution, and which they besought him only to hear. Whereupon, he appointed a day to hear what they had to say to him.

The committee, on the day appointed, entertained him with long discourses, concerning the reasons on which the Parliament founded their request, of which the principal were: "That the people of England had for many ages been accustomed to the government of Kings: that in changing this government, there had necessarily been an abolition of many laws, customs, and formalities, and an establishment of others, which would never be endured by the people on account of their novelty: that according to the laws of England, there could be no security to any act concerning the government, without the intervention and authority of a King: that hitherto, those concerned in the war, and the late changes, could not be safe, but would remain liable to dangerous inquisitions, agreeable to the laws of the land: that the daily conspiracies against the present government, clearly showed, the people were inclined to a King, nor would be satisfied without one: in a word, that the kingdom would never be in peace, till things were brought back to their ancient channel. That it was very true, the royal family had been rejected on account of their tyrannies; but this was no objection to the choice of a King of another family, nor could any kingdom be produced, where the like had not happened, as well as in England."

These very reasons had been alledged in the debates in the House, and were answered by the republicans to this effect: "That an oath had been taken to be faithful to the commonwealth without a King; and to make make a new King, was returning to Egypt. Where was the necessity of recurring to Kings, since it was agreed, they invaded the rights of the subject? That it was advantageous that all the subjects should be equally liable to be called to an account, that they might be more united amongst themselves. That if a King was at last necessary, they would chuse rather to have the true heir to the crown." Cromwell was not unacquainted with the reasons alledged on both sides in the House, and therefore to show, he would neither accept nor refuse the offer without deliberation, he appointed the 8th of May for his final answer.

It is pretended, that in this interval, he was in the utmost distraction, not knowing what to determine. His ambition prompted him to accept the offered crown, the whole intrigue probably being directed by himself. But the disposition of his relations and principal friends made him tremble. For how could he promise himself allegiance from strangers, when he saw his own most intimate friends determined to abandon him? Nay, it is said, some of them threatened to kill him, and that he was informed of a plot to assassinate him, the moment he accepted the crown. The very day he was to give his answer, Desborrow and Fleetwood, walking with him in St. James's Park, told him, if he accepted the crown, they could serve him no longer. He was discouraged by all these things, at the very instant the crown was about to be placed on his head. His answer therefore to the committee was, that he could not accept the government under the title of a King.* Whether this refusal was for or against his interest, is a problem that admits of great dispute.

To reward in some measure so great a moderation, the Parliament confirmed his dignity of Protector, with more power than was annexed to it by the council of officers. This was done by a solemn instrument, called "The Humble Petition and Advice;" the Parliament thereby showing it was not a law to be imposed on him, but an advice, which was submitted to his judgment and discretion, with freedom to accept or refuse it, as he should think proper.†

Cromwell having solemnly sworn the punctual observation of the respective articles, appointed the 26th of June for the day of his inauguration, which was performed with great pomp.‡ This done, the House adjourned to the 20th of January 1657-8.

Since the renewal of the ancient treaties between France and England, another negotiation was begun, for a league offensive and defensive against Spain. This negotiation, set on foot by the ambassador of France in 1656, at London, was concluded at Paris the 13th of March 1657, by a treaty of league, importing, that Cromwell should join six thousand men with the French army; that Mardyke and Dunkirk should be besieged, and when taken, delivered to the English.

King Charles being informed of this negotiation, sent a trusty messenger to Archduke Leopold, still governor of the Low-Countries, to offer a league with Spain. The Archduke accepted the proposal, believing, if the King of England was attached to Spain, he would have credit enough to draw the Irish forces from the French, into the Spanish service. The King and the Archduke concluded a treaty, by which the King's residence at Bruges was to be connived at by Spain. Spain was moreover to furnish him with six thousand men, as soon as he should be possessed of some good port in England. With the ratification, Philip settled upon the King a monthly pension of six thousand guilders, and another of three thousand upon the Duke of Gloucester, who had been sent for out of France by his brother the King, where his mother was persuading him to change his religion. So, the King left Cologne in April 1657, and retired to Bruges, at the same time that the Archduke Leopold resigned the government of the Low-Countries to Don John of Austria, natural son of Philip IV.

As soon as the treaty of league between France and England was signed, Cardinal Mazarin signified to the Duke of York, that he was to retire out of the dominions of France. All the English of the King's party, in the service of France, had the same orders.

In consequence of the league, Cromwell sent six thousand men of his best troops into France, under the command of Reynolds, who had concluded the treaty at Paris in quality of his ambassador. In this campaign, the French took several places from the Spaniards, and amongst the rest Mardyke, which was delivered to the English. Reynolds was unhappily drowned in his return to England, and was succeeded in the command of the English forces in the service of France, by Lockhart, a Scotchman, and ambassador to that crown.

As by the 2d article of the Humble Petition and Advice, the Protector was every year to summon a Parliament, consisting of two Houses, Cromwell resolved to observe that article, which had been inserted in the instrument by his sole direction. He therefore chose a certain number at his own pleasure, to compose the other House. Most of these were officers, or other persons devoted to him, to whom he added some of the ancient Peers; but they refused to take their seats with these men. This choice being made, he issued writs for their meeting in Parliament, in a separate House, the 20th of January 1657-8. His intention was to have this House considered as a House of Peers, and invested with the same privileges, the Peers had formerly enjoyed. He durst not however give it that name, but

* A crown had actually been made, and brought to Whitehall.

† The substance of it was:

"That his Highness Oliver Cromwell should, under the title of Protector, be pleased to execute the office of chief magistrate, over England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the territories and the dominions thereunto belonging, and to govern according to all things in that petition and advice. And also that he would in his lifetime appoint the person that should succeed him in the government: that he would call a Parliament consisting of two Houses once in a year at farthest: that those persons who are legally chosen by a free election of the people to serve in Parliament, may not be excluded from doing their duties, but by consent of that House whereof they are members; that none but those under the qualifications therein mentioned, should be capable to serve as members in Parliament: that the power of the other House be limited as therein is prescribed: that the laws and statutes of the land be observed and kept; no laws altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, but by new laws made by act of Parliament: that the yearly sum of a million of pounds sterling be settled for the maintenance of the navy and army; and three hundred thousand pounds for the support of the government; besides other temporay supplies, as the Commons in Parliament shall see the necessities of the nation to require: that the number of the Protector's council shall not exceed one-and-twenty, whereof seven shall be a Quorum. The chief officers of the state, as chancellors, keepers of the great seal, &c. to be approved by Parliament: that his Highness would encourage a godly ministry in these nations; and that such as do revile and disturb them in the worship of God, may be punished according to law; and where laws are defective, new ones to be made: that the Protestant Christian religion, as it is contained in the Old and New Testament, be asserted and held forth for the public profession of these nations, and no other; and that a confession of faith be agreed upon, and recommended to the people of these nations; and none to be permitted, by words, or writing, to revile or reproach the said confession of faith."

‡ A place being prepared at the upper end of Westminster hall, in the midst of it was set a rich cloth of state, with a chair of state under it, upon an ascent of two steps. Before it a table and chair for the Speaker, and on each side of the hall covered seats one over another, for the members. About two o'clock his Highness came, the Earl of Warwick carrying the sword before him, (and being the only nobleman that was present at that solemnity, says Ludlow,) and the Lord Mayor of London, with the city sword. His Highness standing under the cloth of state, the Speaker presented to him a robe of purple velvet lined with ermines, which Sir T. Widdrington the Speaker, assisted by Whitelock, put upon him. Then he delivered to him the Bible richly gilt and bossed; after that he girt on his sword, and delivered into his hands the sceptre of massy gold, and then made a speech to him, and gave him the oath. After this, the people gave several shouts, and the trumpets sounded: the Protector sat in the chair of state, holding the sceptre in his hand; on the right side sat the ambassador of France, on the left the ambassador of the United Provinces: near him stood his son Richard, Fleetwood, Lord Deputy of Ireland; Claypole, Master of the Horse, the Council and others of State. The Earl of Warwick held the sword on the right, and the Lord Mayor the city sword on the left side of the chair. Near the Earl of Warwick stood Viscount Lisle, General Montague, and Whitelock, each of them with a drawn sword in his hand. Then the trumpets sounded, and a herald proclaimed his Highness's title, and proclamation was made to the people, crying, God save the Protector. The ceremonies being ended, he went in state to Westminster-hall gate, where he took coach, and went to the House, and passed some bills.

contented himself with calling it the Other House, till a more proper name could be given it.

Cromwell was now supported only by the army, filled by himself with fanatics and enthusiasts, who imagined the time was come to erect a fifth monarchy, or the reign of Jesus Christ upon earth. Cromwell was not ignorant, his enemies had designed to destroy him, on pretence of raising him higher, and this had made him refuse the title of King. It was also to break their measures, that he had asked and obtained a power of erecting another House, to oppose it occasionally to the House of Commons, where he knew he had but too many enemies, of which he had cause very soon to be still more sensible.

His enemies having had time to concert their measures during the adjournment, took another course to destroy him when the Parliament re-assembled. As by the 3d article of the Humble Petition and Advice, it was said, the members legally chosen, should not be excluded without the consent of their House, a motion was made to admit all the elected members, who had refused to sign the engagement. This motion was so suddenly received and approved, that Cromwell had not time to oppose it. By this means above a hundred members, Republicans and Presbyterians, all enemies to the Protector, were admitted into the House of Commons. From that time, the face of affairs began to change, Cromwell's enemies having gained the superiority in the very House which would have made him a King. As they had formed great projects against him, their first care was to hinder the Other House, wholly consisting of his creatures, from using their pretended negative voice to break their measures. Cromwell, perceiving to what all this tended, sent for the Parliament to Whitehall, and in a speech maintained the authority of the Other House with such vehemence, that the Commons fearing an immediate dissolution, found it necessary to acknowledge the Other House as an essential part of the Parliament.

Notwithstanding this, the Commons took into consideration the Humble Petition and Advice, and many were of opinion, it was null and void, because it was made when many members were excluded from the Parliament, without any lawful cause. This manifestly tended to a revocation of the act, and withal of the subsequent confirmation of Cromwell's Protectorship. Cromwell was too quick sighted not to see how much it concerned his interest, not to suffer this Parliament to sit any longer. Wherefore he came to the Other House, and sending for the Commons, dissolved them, in great anger.

A. D. 1658.] When the Parliament was dissolved, Cromwell suspecting, or perhaps being informed, that Lambert was one of the principal authors of the plot formed against him, dismissed him from all his employments; allowing him, however, 2000*l.* a year. Fleetwood was recalled from Ireland to succeed Lambert in the Lieutenant-Generalship, and Henry Cromwell, younger son of the Protector, was sent into Ireland in Fleetwood's room. Since Cromwell had been confirmed in the Protectorate, he had called his eldest son Richard to court, and made him chancellor of the university of Oxford. He had married his second daughter to the Lord Falconbridge, and his third to Mr. Rich, grandson to the Earl of Warwick. His eldest had been long since married to Mr. Claypole, and a fourth lived unmarried, till the reign of William III.* Soon after the dismission of Lambert, Cromwell so reduced the authority of the Major-Generals, that they had no longer the power, as they had before, of oppressing the people.

Another conspiracy had been forming in England in favour of the King. The principal managers of this plot were John Mordaunt, brother of the Earl of Peterborough, Sir Henry Slingsby, a rich and popular man in the county of York, and Dr. Hewet, a minister of the church of England. This plot had been represented to the King in so advantageous a manner, that he conceived hopes of success. And therefore he had himself made some preparations in the Low-Countries, and four regiments raised by him, and after the miscarriage of the design, added to the Spanish army, were intended for his service. He had moreover sent commissions into England, for those who would engage in his interest. One of these commissions to raise a regiment of horse had been granted to one Mr. Stapley, whose father had been Cromwell's great friend, and one of the King's judges. Cromwell, upon some intimation, sent for Stapley, and artfully drew from him a confession of whatever he knew, and that he had received his commission from Mr. Mordaunt. He also told him, the Marquis of Ormond had been at London, and stayed there three weeks to concert measures with the conspirators, and give them his directions; which was true. However, the Marquis had the good fortune to leave England, and return to the King. Immediately after the dissolution of the Parliament, Mordaunt, Slingsby, and Hewet were committed to the Tower, and many of their accomplices were apprehended in all parts of the kingdom. After which, Cromwell erected a high court of justice for trial of the criminals, and especially of the three principal. Mr. Mordaunt escaped death by means of his wife, who bribed some of the judges, and prevailed with Colonel Mallory, one of the two witnesses against her husband, to make his escape. Sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewet were condemned and executed.† The same court tried and condemned several others.

In June, this year, Marshal Turenne, General of the French army, besieged Dunkirk, contrary to the opinion of Don John of Austria, who expected that he would have opened the campaign with the siege of Cambray. As this belief had made him neglect to provide for the defence of Dunkirk, he was forced to hazard a battle to save that place, which was not in a condition to make a long resistance. But this battle proved fatal to the Spaniards, who were entirely defeated, and the siege was continued by Turenne, who made himself master of Dunkirk the 26th of June. The town, in pursuance of the treaty with England, was surrendered to Cromwell, who placed a strong garrison in it, and made Lockhart the governor.

Cromwell had for some time appeared more uneasy and fearful than ever. This is not very strange, since he had informations from divers parts, of a design to assassinate him, by some of his former most zealous adherents. This caused him to use new precautions, as not to lye two nights together in the same chamber, nor appear in public without a strong guard. But all these precautions to avoid a violent, could not secure him from a natural, death. In August, this year, he was seized with a fever at Hampton-court, which at first had no dangerous symptoms, but his distemper daily increasing, he was removed to Whitehall, where, after nominating his eldest son Richard for his successor, he expired in the 60th year of his age, on the 3d of September, on which day he had gained the two great battles, of Dunbar in 1650, and of Worcester in 1651.‡

Cromwell's family was originally of Glamorganshire in Wales, and called Williams, one of which marrying a sister of Cromwell, Vicar-General in the reign of Henry VIII. assumed the name of Cromwell, and transmitted it to his posterity. Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntington, April 25, 1599. His education had nothing extraordinary,* nor is it known how he spent his time before he arrived at the age of thirty-five years, when he began seriously to reform his manners and lead a very regular life, without indulging himself in any indecent or ill action. Probably he then, if not sooner, engaged in the Presbyterian party.† The reputation he had acquired of an honest man and good Christian, and doubtless his principles concerning the government, were the cause of his being returned for the town of Cambridge, to the Parliament which met the 3d of November 1640.‡ He sate two years without being distinguished, not having a genius for speaking to place him upon a level with some of the members of that Parliament. His delivery was ungraceful, and his speeches prolix and confused. It was, probably, in these two years that he was gained by the Independents, and enlisted in their party, though concealed under the name of rigid Presbyterians. Agreeably to the views and interests of that party, Cromwell affected an extraordinary zeal for Presbyterianism, and the liberty of the nation against the usurpations of the court, in which he followed the directions of the then leading members of the House. So, when the civil war began, in 1642, he had a post in the army, as a man entirely devoted to the House of Commons, of which he was member. He was at first a Major of horse, and though he was two-and-forty years of age before he had drawn a sword, he was so distinguished by his valour in that office, that he had soon after a regiment given him. There was not in the army an officer that faced danger with more intrepidity, or that more ardently sought occasions to signalize himself. His reputation increased so such a degree, that he became Major-General, then Lieutenant-General under Fairfax, and at last his successor. His great talents for war gave him occasion to show that he had no less genius for civil affairs. He entered into the deepest designs of his party, and at last became one of the principal leaders, advancing here with the same rapidity as in the army. It was he, who accusing the Earl of Manchester of not having done his duty in the second battle of Newbury, broke the ice, and gave occasion to the new model of the army, which was the first step to the triumph of the Independents. From that time, he was looked upon as the chief of the Independent party, and, properly as General of the army, Fairfax acting only as directed by Cromwell. The troops believed themselves invincible under his command, and that he was never once forced to turn his back. The victory gained over Prince Rupert, at Marston-moor, was chiefly ascribed to his valour. The reduction of Ireland in less than a year, greatly increased his fame, and the battles of Dunbar and Worcester carried it to the highest degree.

* The marriages of his daughters; Mary to the Lord Falconbridge, and Frances to Mr. Rich, the Earl of Warwick's grandson, were celebrated first according to ceremonies then in use, but privately afterwards, according to the rites of the church of England. Bridget had two husbands, Ireton and Fleetwood, and Elizabeth (whom Rapin by mistake says lived unmarried) was wife to Claypole. The Lady Falconbridge lived to extreme old age.

† They were both beheaded on Tower-hill, June 8. Hewet's greatest crime was collecting and sending money to the King, and dispersing his commissions. Mrs. Claypole used all her interest with her father the Protector, to save the Doctor's life, but without success; which denial so afflicted her, that it was reported to be one cause of her death; she dying August 6.

‡ There was that day one of the greatest storms of wind that ever was known, a circumstance much noticed by the superstitious of both parties.

If his government be compared with those of the two last Kings, there will appear a very great disparity with regard to the glory and reputation of the English nation. James I. and Charles I. seemed to have studied to disgrace the English name, whereas Cromwell, in the space of four or five years, carried the glory of his nation as far as possible, and in that respect was not inferior to Elizabeth.§

As for his morals and conduct, as a private person, they may be said to have been very regular. He was guilty of none of the vices to which men are commonly addicted. Gluttony, drunkenness, gaming, luxury, and avarice, were vices with which he was never reproached. On the one hand, it is certain, he promoted virtuous men; as, on the other, he was inflexible in his punishments of vice and ill actions. It is true, his own preservation obliged him sometimes to employ men of ill principles, but this is not uncommon to those, who are at the head of a government.

Though, as to his religion, he was an Independent, his principle was to leave every man at liberty in the religion he had chosen, and he never persecuted any person on that account. He even connived at the private meetings of those, who remained attached to the church of England, though he was well informed of them. If they were not favoured with the free and public exercise of their religion, it was because they were considered by him as royalists, always ready to form plots in the King's favour, and from whom, consequently, he had great reason to secure himself. Dr. Burnet, in the History of his own times, says, that if Cromwell had accepted the title of King, he intended to establish a council, in imitation of the congregation de propaganda fide at Rome, to have an eye to what passed all over the world, with regard to the interests of the Protestant religion. He adds, that a fund was to have been settled upon this council, of ten thousand pounds a year, for ordinary emergencies, besides a salary of five hundred pounds a-piece to four secretaries.

It may also be added, that never man was better acquainted with the inward springs of human actions, though he seemed not to have made it his particular study: never man had more address to manage people, and lead them to his ends, nor more natural capacity for affairs, which had received no assistance from learning; for he scarcely remembered the little Latin he had brought from school: in a word, never man chose at once his most advantageous course with more judgment, or executed a design with more vigour and readiness.

Although the royalist authors traduce Cromwell's memory as much as possible, and though in particular, the action by which he was possessed of the government, is the principal foundation of all their complaints, it is certain, the King was no way interested in the change it produced. It was not Charles II. but a republican Parliament, that was deprived of the supreme power by Cromwell.

The republicans were enraged against Cromwell, and deemed him the most perfidious of men. This is not strange, since he had wrested from that Parliament the sovereign power, seized by these republicans without any lawful authority. But, what was this Parliament? It was an assembly of independents, anabaptists, fanatics, enthusiasts, and others of no religion, who, under colour of establishing a free commonwealth, held the nation in servitude; who, to confirm their own authority, had treated their fellow-members with unheard of violence, and dared to embrue their hands in the blood of the late King, at a time when he had almost granted every thing that was desired; who, in short, were industrious to break the union of the church, to subvert all religion, or introduce the most ridiculous and extravagant one.

But what cannot be justified in his conduct, is, his throwing himself, from the beginning of the Parliament, into a violent party, which aimed at the ruin of Church and State; his directing afterwards that party; and his being the chief author of the violences put upon the Parliament and the King.

The second charge against him is, his excessive dissimulation. It is pretended, that he carried his dissimulation so far, as to mock God and religion, by expressing a piety and devotion which he had not, and by making long prayers, full of seeming zeal.

In the republican party were two sorts of men, whom it was very difficult to govern. The one were Deists, or men very indifferent as to religion, who acted only upon the principles of civil liberty. The others were Enthusiasts, who expected every day when Christ should appear to reign upon earth. These were the most difficult to manage, because they would not hear reason,

* His education was suitable to his birth, he being first sent to Cambridge, and then to Lincoln's-Inn.

† In 1637, Cromwell, Haslerigg, Hampden, and some others, resolved to take refuge in New England, on account of the persecution raised by Archbishop Laud against the Puritans, and were actually embarked for that purpose; but they were prevented, by a proclamation against transporting his Majesty's subjects to the Plantations in America; and by an order of council, for stopping eight ships in the river Thames, prepared to go for New England, in one of which Cromwell was.

‡ The reason of his being chosen, was, because he opposed the draining the Fen-lands in the Isle of Ely, which was then proposed, and not liked by the town of Cambridge.

§ He said once in Parliament, "That he hoped he should make the name of an Englishman, as great as ever that of a Roman had been."

when it contradicted their headstrong and violent zeal. Cromwell's accepting the Protectorship, was considered by them as a step to Kingship, to which they were such enemies; that they affirmed it to be the great Antichrist, that hindered Christ's reign upon earth. Cromwell found means so to divide these two parties, that all combinations between them, for his ruin, became impossible. To the Deists he made himself merry with the extravagant zeal of the fanatics; and to these last, he talked of the others as of heathens and infidels. But as the Enthusiasts were the most obsinate, he intimated to some of them, that he would rather have taken a shepherd's staff than a Protectorship, had it not been to prevent every thing from running into confusion: that he would resign his dignity with more joy than he accepted it, as soon as things should be settled: that nothing was more contrary to his inclination, and principles, than a grandeur which obliged him to assume an outward superiority over his fellow-labourers. To convince them of what he said, he frequently called them into his closet, and shutting the door, made them sit covered, familiarly talking with them as his equals. Commonly these discourses ended in a long prayer.

He took care to have spies amongst all the parties, and was thereby fully informed of what was contriving against his person or government.* Among others, he gained Sir Richard Willis, Chancellor Hyde's agent, for conveying the King's orders to his friends in England. All the royalists confided in Willis, knowing he received the King's orders, and yet he betrayed them. But to keep the correspondence more secret, Cromwell assured him, that the informations from him should only be used to disconcert the plots of his enemies, that none might ever suffer for them; and if he imprisoned any of them, it should only be for a little time, and on other pretences. By that means, he defeated their designs, as by accident, in committing them to prison for supposed crimes, and releasing them when their measures were broken.

He sometimes intimated a willingness to treat with the King. Probably, his aim was to engage the royalists to offer propositions, which would have given him opportunity to amuse them, and to prevent any conspiracies against his person; for he was informed from several parts of designs to assassinate him. Wherefore he affected to speak publicly of assassinations with the utmost detestation, and to declare, he would never begin them, but if an attempt was made upon his life, and miscarried, he should not scruple to use the same method, and that he did not want instruments to execute it, nor money to reward them. This declaration kept the royalists in awe, through a fear of their own danger, or that of the King and royal family.

The third and last charge against Cromwell, is, cruelty, for having, whilst Protector, put some men to death, for conspiring against his person and government. That is, according to this reproach, he should have patiently suffered the plots against him, and when one failed, liberty should have been given for a second and a third, till some one had succeeded. This deserves no confutation. But to shew, that Cromwell was not for an unnecessary effusion of blood, we need only recite what is owned by the Earl of Clarendon in his history, who assures us, that when it was proposed in a council of officers, that there might be a general massacre of the royalists, Cromwell would never consent to it.

In the beginning of the long Parliament, Cromwell was a Presbyterian. After that, he threw himself into the Independent party, and was even one of the leaders, and affected to be one of the number of the Enthusiasts. But when he had accepted the Protectorship, he was neither Presbyterian, nor Independent, nor Republican, nor Enthusiast. As he had to manage all these different parties, who were equally opposite to him, he was not to appear an enemy to any in particular, and this management furnishes convincing proofs of his great ability.

What can never be entirely excused in him, is the death of Charles I. to which he contributed to the utmost of his power, and which will be an indelible blot on his memory. Another principle, and of which he made great use, is likewise to be condemned in him: which was, that moral laws were only binding on ordinary occasions, but might be dispensed with upon extraordinary cases.

Cromwell's death was followed by so many alterations in the government, that the interval between that and the Restoration, may be justly called a time of true anarchy. Cromwell should have had a successor like himself, to finish what he had so ably begun. But two such great men are not commonly found so near one another, nor often in the same age.†

* He laid it down for a maxim, to spare no cost or charge in order to procure intelligence. When he understood what dealers the Jews were every where, in that trade that depends upon news, the advancing money upon high or low interest, in proportion to the risque they run, or the gain to be made as the times might turn, and in the buying and selling of the actions of money so advanced, he brought a company of them over to England, for which some say, he received a consideration of two hundred thousand pounds, and gave them leave to build a synagogue. Among other good regulations, he also appointed a Council of Trade, to consider how to improve, order and regulate, the trade and navigation of the Commonwealth.

† Amongst his old friends, Cromwell could relax himself; and by trifling and amusement, jesting and making verses, he feared not exposing himself to their most familiar reproaches. With others, he sometimes pushed matters to the length of rustic buffoonery; and he would amuse himself by putting burning coals into the boots and hose of the officers who attended him. Before the King's trial, a meeting was agreed on between the chiefs of the Republican party and the general officers, in order to concert the model of that free government which they were to substitute for the monarchial constitution, now totally subverted. After debates on this subject, the most important that could fall under the discussion of human creatures, Ludlow tells us, that Cromwell, by way of frolic, threw a cushion at his head; and when Ludlow took up another cushion in order to return the compliment, the General ran down stairs, and had almost fallen in the hurry. When the high court of justice was signing the warrant for the execution of the King, a matter, if possible, still more serious, Cromwell, taking the pen in his hand, before he subscribed his name, bedaubed with ink the face of Martin, who sat next him. And the pen being delivered to Martin, he practised the same frolic upon Cromwell. He frequently gave feasts to his inferior officers; and when the meat was set upon the table, a signal was given; the soldiers rushed in upon them; and with much noise, tumult, and confusion, ran away with all the dishes, and disappointed the guests of their meal.

PART III.

RICHARD CROMWELL, Protector.

A. D. 1658.] In the last days of Cromwell's illness, some of his most intimate friends, seeing him in danger, asked him twice concerning the succession, and he readily answered, he would have his son Richard to succeed him. He had, however, in the time of his Protectorship, signed an instrument by which he appointed Fleetwood his son-in-law for his successor; but probably he had burnt that paper, for it could never be found.* An hour after his death, the Privy-Council met, and upon the report made of the will of the deceased, as also upon the Instrument of Government, impowering them to chuse a Protector, they immediately elected Richard Cromwell. Fleetwood even relinquished before them, the right, he might have, in case the paper signed in his favour should be found. Presently after, the Lord Mayor of London was acquainted with the election, and the day following Richard was proclaimed Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The same proclamation was made in all the principal towns of the three kingdoms, without the least opposition. On the contrary, addresses were presented to Richard from all parts, signed by many thousands to congratulate him upon his accession to the dignity of Protector, and to assure him, they would willingly hazard their lives and fortunes to support him. Thus Richard was installed successor to his father Oliver, and took the same oath. The first care of the new Protector, after his installation, was to gain Monk, Governor of Scotland, to his interests. After the voluntary resignation of Fleetwood his brother-in-law, of Desborough his uncle, and all the officers of the army, as well Republicans as Presbyterians, he seemed to have nothing to fear from England. Henry Cromwell his brother, then Governor of Ireland, held that island in subjection. Scotland therefore only remained to be secured to his interests. Monk had commanded in that kingdom, ever since his reduction of it, and had so artfully managed the Scots, sometimes by rigour, sometimes by gentleness, and the exact discipline of his army, that he had acquired their esteem and affection, who were never more happy than under his government. Many blamed the confidence Cromwell reposed in Monk, who had borne arms for the late King, and only engaged in the service of the Parliament, to free himself from captivity after the battle of Nantwich, where he was taken prisoner. It was, perhaps, for these suspicions, that Richard thought himself obliged to neglect nothing to gain him to his interests. For this purpose, knowing Monk's esteem and affection for Clarges his brother-in-law, he sent him to desire his friendship. But Clarges, as well as Monk, had been zealously attached to the King, and was still so in his heart, though outwardly he complied with the times. So, in the discharge of this commission, he took occasion to sound him, and easily found he was far from being the King's enemy. From that time Monk and Clarges held a strict correspondence. Clarges informed Monk of the transactions at London, and, in all appearance, designed then to serve the King, though perhaps he thought it not yet proper to explain himself to Monk, who was very reserved. Clarges, according to his instructions, acquainted Monk with the new Protector's great esteem for him, in which he followed the sentiments of Oliver his father, who had expressly charged him to be entirely directed by his advice. Monk readily submitted to Richard's government.

Cromwell's funeral was solemnized with great magnificence, large sums of money being borrowed for that purpose by the new Protector.† After the ceremonies usually paid to deceased sovereign princes, his body was deposited in Henry VII.'s chapel, amongst those of the Kings and Queens of England.‡

Richard proposed to begin his Protectorate with his father's maxims. He formed the design of making himself master of the deliberations of his council, and of reducing the army to receive his orders with submission. But Richard had none of Oliver's great talents, to command fear and respect, or to inspire his friends with hopes of a powerful protection. Meanwhile, knowing that the bare election of his person by the council, and the addresses presented to him, were insufficient to establish his authority, he believed it expedient to have his dignity confirmed by Parliament, and accordingly summoned one to meet the 27th day of January 1658-9. This Parliament was to consist of two Houses, namely, a House of Commons, containing four hundred English, thirty Scotch, and thirty Irish members; and of the Other House (for as yet it had no other name) which was instead of a House of Peers, and consisted chiefly of officers. They were generally men of no birth, who had advanced themselves by military posts, during the last war.

Richard had made no change in his father's council, but he was soon sensible, that this council, which was entirely directed by Oliver, was aspiring to more power under his successor. On the other hand, the army appeared less devoted to the son than to the father. They had even begun before Oliver's death, to appear less submissive, which had obliged him to remove Lambert, and some other Colonels and officers, who were sowing division among the troops. Richard was desirous to tread in his father's steps, but being sensible that his authority was not great enough, he thought he should attempt nothing, without consulting some of his principal friends. He therefore held a Privy-Council, in which he proposed, first, the admission of more new counsellors, to secure a majority, and make himself master of the debates, in spite of the old counsellors, who were less tractable than in the time of his father. Secondly, he proposed to reduce the army to an entire dependence upon him.

His friends, whom he consulted on this occasion, were self-interested, and attached to him, only in hopes of governing in his name. Instead of approving his design, they advised him to call into his council two Colonels, wholly devoted to the Republican party. Nor was this all; some of the leading officers of the army were informed of the Protector's designs, and that was sufficient to put them in motion. Fleetwood his brother-in-law, and Desborough his uncle, were the first to combine against him, and cabal with the officers, to deprive him of the Generalship of the army, to which they were authorized by the Instrument of Government. It was insinuated, that the Parliament which was going to sit, might prove dangerous to his authority, should they not be tractable, and therefore it was necessary to fortify himself with a good number of officers, as well to consult them, as to shew the Parliament, he was supported by the army, which could not but produce a good effect. Richard believing, this advice proceeded from their zeal for his service, was easily persuaded to order every regiment to send to London as many officers as could be spared. This order was punctually executed, and immediately a great number of officers appeared in London, who formed amongst them a council, which frequently met, and assumed the title of the Great Council of the Army.

* Some say, that Oliver had actually made Fleetwood his heir; but one of his daughters knowing where his will was, took it away, and burnt it, before Fleetwood could come at it: and a few minutes before Cromwell's death, when he was asked, "Who should succeed him?" He replied, "in such a drawer of the cabinet, in my closet, you will find it."

† The charges of it came to sixty thousand pounds.

‡ The corpse was removed, September 26, privately in the night, from Whitehall, to Somerset-house; where it lay in state till the 23d of November, and then it was carried, in a very solemn and magnificent manner, to Westminster-Abbey, where it was deposited.—— Some say, that it was deposited, as to outward appearance there, but that in reality, it was carried below bridge, and thrown into the Thames.——And again, others affirm, that it was buried in Naseby-field.

Besides this great council, some members of the Privy-Council, and officers of the army met also at Desborough's house, as well to consult how to deprive Richard of the Generalship, as to direct the great council, which being composed of many inferior officers, wanted to be directed in their deliberations. The result of this council was, that Desborough, attended with several officers, waited on the Protector with a petition, "That no officer or soldier should be turned out but by sentence of a council of war: that no member of the army should be proceeded against capitally, otherwise than by martial law: and lastly, that the army might have power to chuse their own General." As nothing was more contrary to Richard's designs than this demand, he positively rejected it, and threatened even to cashier them if they brought him any more such proposals.

The Parliament assembling the 27th of January, it was immediately debated in the lower House, by what right the Scots and Irish sent representatives to the English Parliament. The authority of the Other House was also taken into consideration, and the same objections made to it, as had been in Oliver's last Parliament. The debate upon these two articles held two whole months, and it was the 28th of March, before it was resolved, by a majority of voices, that the Other House should subsist, and the Scotch and Irish Representatives continue to sit in the House of Commons. After that, the Parliament made an act, to recognize Richard Cromwell for Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

A. D. 1659.] At last, on the 22d of April, Richard had notice, that the officers had resolved to dissolve the Parliament. He immediately assembled his council to prevent, by their advice, this attempt. Some were of opinion, that he ought absolutely to refuse such a demand, and adhere to the Parliament, as his only support. But he was not directed to the means to defend himself against the officers, who began to assemble in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, and would probably have been too strong for his guards. Others advised him to leave Whitehall, and suffer the officers to do as they pleased with the Parliament, without any promise to dissolve it. But the officers, foreseeing he might take that course, had now seized all the avenues about Whitehall. During these irresolutions, Desborough, with a strong retinue, demanded an audience of the Protector, and required him, in the name of the officers, to dissolve the Parliament. Richard at first refused to grant this demand; but he was told, his refusal would be attended with danger to himself, and that, in a word, they were resolved to obtain, by fair means or foul, what they demanded. He therefore promised to dissolve the Parliament by commission under the Great-Seal. But as the Commons, being informed of what passed, had adjourned themselves for three days, the Parliament was dissolved by proclamation.

After the Parliament was dissolved, the great council of officers thought themselves empowered to settle the government as they pleased, without consulting the Protector, who was now regarded but as a private person.* This anarchy however lasted only a few days, during which the officers elected Fleetwood for their General. They discharged also by their own authority five Colonels, who advised Richard to adhere to the Parliament, namely, Ingoldsby, Goff, Whaley, Lord Falconbridge, brother-in-law to Richard, and Howard afterwards Earl of Carlisle, and restored Lambert and others dismissed by Cromwell a little before his death. After this, they considered of settling the government, it being impossible for things to continue long in their present situation.

Lambert was a man of immoderate ambition, and would not have scrupled to follow the example of Oliver, had the juncture seemed favourable to him. But Fleetwood being his General, and the idol of the army, he could not hope to succeed in an attempt to sieze the government. He therefore thought proper to wait a more favourable opportunity, and, in the mean time, hinder Fleetwood from putting himself at the head of the government, whether under the name of Protector, or any other title, to which he had several reasons to believe he was aspiring. Lambert therefore secretly engaged Colonel Lilburn to cabal among the inferior officers, and break Fleetwood's measures, if they pointed to the Protectorship, whilst he regularly made his court to him, and endeavoured by his flatteries to influence him as Cromwell had formerly influenced Fairfax.

Lambert's cabal being made with the greatest secrecy, Fleetwood, as General, convened his officers to Wallingford house to settle the government. All the superior officers came, but at the same time the inferior, by the intrigues of Lambert and Lilburn, assembled at St. James's in much greater numbers. In this assembly the settlement of the government was likewise debated, and occasion taken, to magnify the happiness which England enjoyed under the administration of the Parliament, from the 6th of December, 1648, to the 20th of April, 1653, when it was dissolved by Cromwell. Their prudence, steadiness, and happy success in England, Scotland, Ireland, and in the Dutch war were extolled, with some intimations of advice, that nothing could be more advantageous to the three nations, than the restoration of that Parliament.

This debate was carried no farther; but it sufficed to convince the assembly at Wallingford house, that a division between them and the inferior officers could not but be dangerous to both, and that their best way was to join with the inferior officers in their restoring the Long Parliament. They all, therefore, declared for the good old cause, that is, for the cause supported by the Parliament, which brought the King to the scaffold, and turned the monarchy into a Commonwealth. It was, consequently resolved, in a general council at Fleetwood's house, to restore the Long Parliament.

Things being thus settled, Lambert at the head of a considerable number of officers, repaired to the house of Lenthal, Speaker of the Long Parliament, and presented to him the declaration of the great council of officers, by which the members of the Parliament, dissolved by Cromwell, April the 20th, 1653, were invited to return to the exercise of their authority. Lenthal answered, he would communicate the declaration to the members then in London, which he did the next day, and, the invitation being accepted, they met in Parliament the 7th of May, to the number of only forty-two. Thus the three nations were once more under the tyrannical dominion of a Parliament, which had not feared to imbrue their hands in the blood of their Sovereign: but with this difference, that the number

* Ludlow says, one great offence given by Richard to the nation was, by his irreligion. For an officer having murmured at the advancement of persons, who had been cavaliers, to commissions in the army, was brought to Whitehall to answer for it. Richard, in a deriding manner, asked him, "Whether he would have him prefer none but those that were godly? Here, continued he, is Dick Ingoldsby, who can neither pray nor preach, and yet I will trust him before you all."

was reduced to the half of what it was in 1648, when the Presbyterian members were excluded. Hence they were called in derision the Rump-Parliament, in allusion to a fowl all devoured but the Rump. The Presbyterian members, who had been expelled in 1648, would have resumed their seats, but none were admitted besides those who had sat, from the first of January 1648, to the 20th of April 1653, and in this the pretended Parliament was supported by the officers.

When the Parliament was restored to their authority, they sent Clarges to Monk, to engage him to submit to the new government. Monk had so little foreseen the late change in England, that he had not time to take any measures to regulate his conduct. When he sounded his officers, he found they were pre-engaged by letters from their friends in London. So, all he could do after the arrival of Clarges, was to acquiesce, and express his satisfaction to see the Parliament restored.

Four days after the Parliament met, Lambert, attended by several officers, presented a petition and address from the general council of officers; to which the Parliament returned a general answer, and thanked the army for their affection to the public. Then, taking it into consideration, they approved of all the articles in general, but appointed a particular committee to examine those which concerned the government. As to what related to Richard Cromwell and his mother, it was not to be debated, till they should be assured of his submission to the government, which was speedily obtained, without any opposition on his part.

When the Parliament examined the account of Richard's debts, the article of expences for his father's funeral was rejected, so that Richard was forced to pay that debt out of his inheritance, which swept away the greatest part of his estate, which was not large, considering Cromwell's advancement during his life. As to the revenue, and annual pension desired by the officers for Richard and his mother, the Parliament referred the consideration of them to another opportunity, and contented themselves with assigning twenty thousand pounds for the payment of his private debts. When they granted him the twenty thousand pounds, they required him to remove from Whitehall in six days.*

Fleetwood, Desborough, Lambert, and the rest of the principal officers, were by no means pleased with the proceedings of the Parliament, but knowing, the inferior officers considered their dependence on the Parliament as an advantage, they dissembled their resentments, and received their commissions from the Speaker. On the other hand, the Parliament believed it of the utmost importance, to be master of the army; which they flattered themselves, would enable them to rule peaceably and absolutely, and, without doubt, to perpetuate their authority. But till this was done, they saw they were to expect a strong opposition, considering the restless temper of the principal officers, who were ever seeking to make themselves necessary, for fear of losing their posts. This was the first, and almost open design of the Parliament. For this purpose, a committee which had been appointed to examine commissions was continued, who knowing the intentions of the House, made great alterations in the army, displacing such as were suspected, and substituting others of more assured fidelity. The same thing was done to the army commanded by Monk, and many officers being removed, others were appointed to succeed them. Clarges had now acquainted Monk with the Parliament's designs, which were so manifest, and Monk had but too much cause to perceive them, by the alterations the committee would have made in the army of Scotland. He wrote to the committee so, as to show them, he plainly saw their design to undermine his authority. He used some expressions in his letter, which made the Parliament apprehensive there would be danger of driving a man to extremities, who had twelve thousand men, and all Scotland at his disposal. For this reason, the officers appointed by the committee to go into Scotland, received orders, not to proceed on their journey.

The 18th of June the Parliament voted the continuation of the monthly assessment of thirty-five thousand pounds, imposed by the Parliament of the year 1646. Then, commissioners were named for the civil government of Ireland, and a commission granted to Edmund Ludlow, one of the King's Judges, and a most zealous Republican, to command the forces of that country.

The Parliament having received confused intimations of a plot forming in favour of the King, the royalists had orders to withdraw twenty miles from London. This intimation was not groundless. In March this year, the King, by a declaration, had empowered commissioners to treat in his name with those, who having been against him, or his father, were willing to return to his obedience. These commissioners spared neither pains nor promises, to increase the number of the King's friends. All were weary of the tyranny of an Independent Parliament, consisting of forty persons, and of an army, whose officers were mostly fanatics, and who, under colour of promoting piety, and extending the kingdom of Christ, had only their interest in view. The Presbyterians themselves, and the members of that party, who had been expelled the House in 1648, seeing little appearance of ever recovering the ground they had lost, and that nevertheless they remained exposed to the tyranny of the Independents and fanatics, agreed at last with the King's party, to deliver the nation from the servitude to which it was reduced.

On the hopes, that the Presbyterians would assist, the Royalists projected an insurrection in several parts of the kingdom. For this purpose, they intended to seize at once Gloucester, Lynn, Plymouth, Exeter and Chester. Mr. Mordaunt crossed the sea, to inform the King of the project, which he thought so well laid, that he repaired secretly to Calais, and then to St. Malo's, to be nearer England, in case the plot succeeded. But this project vanished. Sir Richard Willis, who betrayed the King's party, informed Thurloe of it, and Thurloe the Council of State, who immediately put the militia in safe hands, and took other precautions, which invincibly obstructed the execution of the project. Massey was taken in attempting to surprise Gloucester, but found means to escape. The Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir Horatio Townsend, who were gone to the West to serve the King, were arrested and sent to prison. There was only Sir George Booth, who, assembling about four or five thousand men, took Chester, and published a manifesto against the tyranny of the Parliament, without any mention of the King, intending to make the public believe, that the people's discontent was the sole motive of his taking arms. Sir Thomas Middleton joined him with some troops, but these two united bodies were so inconsiderable, that Lambert, who marched against them, by order of Parliament, easily defeated them, and re-took Chester. Sir George Booth had the good fortune at first to escape, but was taken some days after in woman's clothes, and brought to the Tower of London. Middleton retired to a castle of his own, which held out but few a days.†

During these transactions, the King's friends, not doubting of success, sent the Reverend Nicolas Monk, the General's brother, into Scotland, to engage him in the King's party. Some have pretended, that Monk, full of hopes, that the King's party in England would succeed, was upon the point of marching to support them, but was stopped by the news of Booth's defeat, and forced to feign himself entirely devoted to the Parliament. The Parliament certainly looked on Monk as a man in whom they could not confide. This the Parliament plainly showed, immediately after Booth's and Middleton's defeat by Lambert. For judging that that victory would keep Monk in awe, they readily confirmed the changes before intended in the army of Scotland. Monk was so offended with this proceeding, that he wrote to the Speaker, to desire his dismission, but Clarges prevailed with the Speaker not to communicate this letter to the Parliament, who doubtless would not have failed to grant his request.

* After the Restoration he went to France, and continued some years in obscurity at Paris; but upon the rumour of a war between France and England, he removed to Geneva. Some years before the death of King Charles II. he returned to England, and died at Cheshunt in Hertfordshire in 1712.—Richard, unlike his father, was of a gentle, humane, and generous disposition. Some of his party offering to put an end to these intrigues in his government by the death of Lambert, he declared, that he would not purchase power or dominion by such sanguinary measures.

† After this defeat, the Parliament thought of transporting the loyal families into Barbadoes, Jamaica, and other Plantations; and by degrees so to model the army, that they might never give them more trouble.

As the peace between France and Spain was to be treated at St. Jean de Luz, by the prime ministers of the two crowns, the King believed his presence at this negotiation might procure him some advantage. He therefore departed for Fontarabia in September, and crossed the kingdom of France incognito.

The principal officers of the army were still highly displeased with the Parliament, plainly perceiving, their design was to become master of the army. Wherefore, they began to think of means to maintain themselves in their credit and posts. One difficulty, however, was to be surmounted, before any resolution could be taken. This was, that the inferior officers were very well pleased with the Parliament, who greatly caressed them, intending to use them, to get rid of their commanders. Lambert, who commanded the forces about Chester, was entirely in the Party of Fleetwood and Desborough, knowing, the Parliament had no better intentions for him, than for the others. Besides, his chief aim was to procure a perpetual confirmation of the Generalship to Fleetwood, in hopes to govern and make use of him for his advancement to that post. At last, it was resolved, that Lambert should try to gain the inferior officers of his army. Pursuant to this resolution, Lambert coming to Derby, so managed, that his officers, whom he had carefully inspired with discontent, met to draw a petition, which, before it was offered to the Parliament, was to be communicated to Fleetwood, for the approbation of the general council of officers. Sir Arthur Haslerig having received advice that the petition was come to London, informed the Commons, and told them, the army was contriving a very dangerous plot, of which it was necessary to prevent the consequences. Upon this declaration, Fleetwood was examined by the Parliament, whether he knew any thing of the petition? He answered, he had a copy of it, and the original was in the hands of three officers, whom he named. Whereupon he was ordered to give notice to these officers to attend the House that afternoon with the petition, which was done, and the petition read. The House, the next morning, voted, "That to have any more general officers in the army than are already settled by the Parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous to the Commonwealth; and that Fleetwood shall acquaint them with this resolve." In their subsequent debates upon the proposals of the officers, a particular answer was returned to each article, and the officers were given to understand, that their complaints were causeless, and the Parliament neither obliged nor pleased to give them an account of their conduct. This answer convinced the officers, that things were come to that point, that they were either to submit to the Parliament, or endeavour a dissolution. But they could not resolve to submit, without trying first to render themselves superior. To this end, Lambert marched his brigade towards London, and appeared there himself to support his friends. The Parliament, on their side, seeing a breach with the army was not very remote, hastily passed an act, to declare it high-treason to levy money upon the people, without the consent of Parliament. Herein their aim was to hinder the army's subsistence. They did still more: for Monk the clergyman being arrived from Scotland, with assurances from his brother the General of his supporting the Parliament, and marching to their assistance if required, Lambert, Desborough, and some other principal officers, who had signed the address, were displaced by the Parliament. Then they annulled Fleetwood's commission, and named commissioners for the government of the army, from the 11th of October to the 22d of February. But these proceedings not being supported with power, the officers received the Parliament's orders with scorn.

The Council of State, being informed, that Lambert was assembling the army, ordered two regiments to Westminster, to guard the Parliament, whose Colonels and officers were devoted to them, and had refused to sign the address. This did not prevent Lambert from executing his design. Having drawn some regiments into London, on the 13th of October, he secured all the avenues to the Parliament. Presently after, the Speaker appearing in his coach as he was going to the House, was stopped by Lambert, and forced to return. Then he sent to the Colonels of the two regiments, in Palace-yard, to retire to their quarters, which they refusing to do, he smiled and bade them stay there as long as they pleased. At the same time, he took care to stop all the members who were going to the House, and hinder them from entering. So the Parliament, as well for want of a sufficient number of members, as for the absence of the Speaker, not being able to sit that day, the two regiments placed at Westminster to secure them from violence retired, after having remained there till night. They were no sooner gone, than Fleetwood seized the posts, and placed a strong guard at the door of the Parliament House, to hinder the members from assembling. Next day, the discontented officers cashiered, by their own authority, those of the two regiments appointed to guard the Parliament, and sent others to fill their places. The soldiers obeyed their new officers, and abandoned the old.

This anarchy lasted ten days, before the officers thought of settling any form of government. All they did, was to nominate ten of their own body to form a council, to take care of the most urgent affairs. Then they declared Fleetwood their General, Lambert their Lieutenant-General, and Desborough Commissary-General of horse. They established likewise a council of Seven to nominate such officers as were not suspected, with orders to exclude those, in whom they could not confide. Meanwhile a discipline so exact was observed by the troops, that it was wonderful to see soldiers so submissive to their officers, and so inoffensive to the people during such an anarchy. As the officers were still uneasy about Monk, whom they suspected, because he was not of their principles, and besides, was an enemy to Lambert, Colonel Cobbet was sent to try to gain him to their party, with secret orders, in case he could not succeed, to endeavour to corrupt his troops, and if possible, put him under an arrest. Clarges gave Monk intelligence of Cobbet's secret commission.

During these transactions in England, the King was on his journey to Fontarabia, where he arrived but a little time before the treaty between the two crowns was concluded. Don Lewis de Haro, Prime Minister of Spain, received him very civilly, and expressed a sense of his unhappy condition, by making him a present of seven thousand pistoles. But Cardinal Mazarin, for fear of rendering himself suspected to the Parliament, would not so much as see him. So, the King left Fontarabia, for Brussels, where he arrived the latter end of December.

The Great Council of Officers held frequent assemblies in London, to endeavour at some settlement of the government. At last, on the 26th of October, thirteen days after the dispersion of the Parliament, they agreed to establish a Committee of Safety,* and put the government into their hands. Sir Henry Vane, who, since the last change, had come into the measures of the army, was of this committee, with Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough, Ludlow, &c. At the same time, a declaration was published, to annul the acts or orders of the Parliament, of the 10th, 11th and 12th of October. In this paper the officers declared, that they had no design to erect a military government, but had already lodged the executive part in a Committee of Safety, who were to prepare such a form of government as might best comport with a free state and commonwealth, without a single person, Kingship, or House of Lords.

While the officers ruled in England, Monk was greatly embarrassed in Scotland. A neutrality would have exposed him to the danger of being sacrificed by both parties, if they should be reconciled, which was not impossible. At length he determined to side with the Parliament, and, without any evasion, sent his resolution to Fleetwood. For this purpose, he prepared for a speedy march into England with the best part of his army.

This resolution naturally created a belief, that Monk, under colour of re-establishing the Parliament, secretly intended to serve and restore the King. But it is not clear what was his plan, or his means to accomplish such a design.

He was preparing, however, with all possible diligence for his expedition, though not without several obstacles:

I. His forces being dispersed through all Scotland, required at least, six weeks to draw them together.

II. Ready money was to be provided for their maintenance, because he could expect no more from England. For this purpose, the taxes were to be anticipated, and even extraordinary supplies obtained of the Scots.

III. In his troops were some officers, on whose fidelity he could not rely.

IV. In short, it was absolutely necessary to his design, to have some towns on the frontiers of England, to facilitate his entrance, as he knew that Lambert was marching to oppose him.

All these difficulties were happily surmounted, except the first, because of the remoteness of his forces. As to the rest, he began with cashiering several of his suspected officers, and substituting others in their room. He kept those whom the Parliament had displaced, and whose successors were not yet come. Then he summoned to Edinburgh the officers of the nearest regiments, and communicating to them his design of marching into England, to restore the Parliament, he had the satisfaction to meet with their concurrence. This done, he found means to secure Berwick, and arrest Colonel Cobbet, who was there, and whose secret instructions were told him by Clarges. Cobbet was sent to Edinburgh, and there imprisoned. Monk also attempted to surprise Newcastle, but was disappointed. As to the money he wanted, he raised as much as was possible, and while his army was assembling, solicited the Scots for an extraordinary supply.

While Monk was making these preparations, Clarges his brother-in-law arrived in Scotland, with a proposal for a treaty with the Committee of Safety. It was resolved between them to accept the proposal, not with design to conclude the treaty, but to gain time till Monk's army was ready. Pursuant to this resolution, Monk, with the consent of his officers, made choice of Colonel Wilks, Lieutenant-Colonel Cloberry, and Major Knight, to go and treat in his name with the committee, and sent them away with such instructions, as he thought would raise insurmountable obstacles to the conclusion of the treaty. These three commissioners met Lambert at York, who told them, he was sufficiently impowered to treat with them. But to their demand for restoring the Parliament, he answered, his power did not extend to that article, and so they were obliged to go on to London.

These commissioners, ignorant of Monk's secret intentions, were no sooner at London, than they made all possible haste to conclude with the Committee of Safety, and the rather, because every thing which they proposed was accepted. So, the treaty was concluded and signed the 15th of November, to the great dissatisfaction of Monk. The treaty was never executed; but by the first article, a vigorous opposition to the King's restoration was agreed to. Monk, upon receiving the treaty, sought evasions to hinder the ratification, pretending, his commissioners had acted contrary to their instructions, and thereby became still more suspected by the committee of safety.

While Monk was preparing to march into England, the members of the late Parliament were not idle. They were ardently endeavouring to re-establish themselves, and wrest from the officers their usurped authority, but without the least thought of restoring the King. They believed, or pretended to believe, that Monk had no other view than the restitution of the Parliament, and, in this belief, considered Monk's friends as their own. This was true in general, though some there were of Monk's adherents in London, better informed than the rest, who knew what they were to believe. Be this as it will, all the friends of the Rump united to support Monk's designs, imagining, his sole intention was to restore the Parliament. For that reason, the members who had formed the council of state, before the interruption of the Parliament, being privately assembled, sent to Monk a commission, constituting him general of the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

On the other hand, Colonel Whetham, governor of Portsmouth, Monk's particular friend, declared for the Parliament, and received into his garrison Haslerig, Walton, and Morley, three members of Parliament, the most incensed against the army. The Committee of Safety, upon the first notice of this defection, sent a detachment of the army to block up Portsmouth, but the soldiers deserted their officers, declared for the Parliament, and were received into Portsmouth as friends. Another detachment sent from the army on the same errand, did almost the same thing, so that the committee knew not on whom to rely. At the same time, Lawson, Vice-Admiral, declared for the Parliament against the army, and entered the Thames with several of his ships, to awe the adherents of the committee. Lambert, who commanded a body of the army in the north, being informed of the ill situation of the committee's affairs, detached Desborough's regiment to the assistance of his friends in London, but that regiment, at St. Albans, declared for the Parliament.

The Committee of Safety seeing all this opposition, seemed to be discouraged. Haslerig, Walton, and Morley, finding themselves sufficiently strengthened by the soldiers of the army, which had retired to Portsmouth, marched in the head of these troops, towards London. Then it was that Fleetwood, and the rest of the Committee of Safety, were in the utmost perplexity. They durst not trust their own soldiers, and knew not what course to take. Whitelock, as appears in his Memorials, advised Fleetwood either to head the army, or agree with the King. He seemed to approve of this last course, but presently after altered his mind. At last, his colleagues and himself wanting capacity and resolution to extricate themselves out of such an emergency, consented to the meeting of the Parliament, and voluntarily resigned their usurped authority. They had no sooner given their consent, than they were entirely abandoned by their whole party.

Thus the Parliament met peaceably the 26th of December, and named a committee to govern the army in their name, and under their direction. Then they dispatched express orders to Lambert to disperse his forces, and send them into the quarters assigned by the same order. But Lambert's troops hearing the Parliament was restored, had in some measure prevented this order, and put their general under arrest, who was sent prisoner to the Tower of London. At the same time Sir Henry Vane, and some other members of Parliament, who had taken part with the army, were confined to their own houses. Thus, by a revolution little expected, the first and most difficult part of Monk's undertaking, namely, the restitution of the Parliament, was executed even before he left Scotland, and without having any other share in it, than his resolution to march into England.*

Meanwhile, this revolution seemed entirely to destroy the hopes of the King. France and Spain began to think of making a firm and lasting alliance with the Parliament, whereby the King would not have known where to retire for a subsistance.*

Monk entered England with his army the 2d of January 1659-60, and consequently might now be informed of the Rump's re-establishment. Some days after, he received a letter from the Speaker, acquainting him with the late transactions, thanking him, in the name of the Parliament, for his kind intentions, and insinuating, that if he thought it proper, he might save himself the trouble of coming to London, since the Parliament was in peaceable possession of their authority. But this letter did not interrupt his march. On his arrival at York, he found the Lord Fairfax, formerly General to the Parliament, at the head of some troops of that county, and in possession of the city, in order to hinder the Committee of Safety from being masters of it. The Lord Fairfax received Monk into York without any difficulty, and they had many conferences together. Fairfax was a Presbyterian, though Cromwell had made him subservient to the rise of the Independents. It would therefore be hard to conceive what interest he could have in countenancing Monk's designs, if the Presbyterian party had not secretly agreed to concur in the King's restoration.

Whatever dissimulation Monk had used, in pretending that he had no other view than to restore the Rump, the members of that Parliament were too wise not to perceive, he had some other hidden design. But they hesitated between two opinions, in appearance equally probable, namely, that he intended either to advance himself, in imitation of Cromwell, or to restore the King. For this reason, the Rump, a few days after their meeting, appointed A COUNCIL OF STATE, consisting of twenty-eight members, of whom Monk was one, and ordered each counsellor to take the following oath:

"I do hereby swear that I do renounce the pretended title of CHARLES STUART, and the whole line of the late King James, and of every other person as a single person, pretending, or which shall pretend to the crown or government of these nations of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any of them, and the dominions and territories belonging to them, or any of them; and that I will, by the grace and assistance of Almighty God, be true, faithful, and constant to the Parliament and Commonwealth, and will oppose the bringing in, or setting up any single person or House of Lords, and every of them in this Commonwealth."

This precaution however did not remove the fears of the Parliament with regard to Monk, who daily became more suspected. It was therefore resolved to send two of their members to him, under the pretence of doing him honor, but in reality, to observe his proceedings. Scot and Robinson were named, who found him at Leicester the 22d of January.†

When he came to St. Albans, he wrote to the Parliament, to desire that the regiments in the city, might be sent to more distant quarters, it not being convenient, that troops, which had so lately been in rebellion, should mix with those which were entirely devoted to the Parliament, and come to offer their service. With this letter he sent the manner in which his soldiers might be lodged in London, and the quarters that might be assigned to the regiments which were to be removed. Though this demand was suspected by many members to have some mystery in it, it was granted by a majority of voices, and the regiments in the city were ordered to remove. This shews, either that Fleetwood and Desborough were no great politicians, if they did not see that Monk's demand tended to make himself master of the city and Parliament, or that they believed they had not a sufficient influence over their inferior officers, to venture to oppose it.

Monk, artfully improving the division between the Parliament and the army, entered London, in triumph, the 3d of February 1659-60. After he had given orders for quartering his troops, he repaired to the council of state, who immediately tendered him the abjuration oath, which all the members were obliged to take. But he asked time to resolve, saying, he had been informed that strong objections had been made to this oath, even in the Parliament itself. Upon this refusal he was denied admittance into the council of state, till he had taken the oath, and was obliged to withdraw.

The 6th of February he went to the Parliament, where by the mouth of the Speaker, he received the thanks of the House, for the eminent services which he had done his country. Monk was a prudent not an eloquent speaker. He told the House, that the services, which he had been enabled to perform, were no more than his duty, and merited not such praises as those with which they were pleased to honour him: that among many persons of greater worth, who bore their commission, he had been employed as the instrument of providence for effecting their restoration; but he considered this service as a step only to more important services, which it was their part to render to the nation: that while on his march, he observed all ranks of men, all places to be in earnest expectation of a settlement, after the violent convulsions to which they had been exposed; and to have no prospect of that blessing but from the dissolution of the present Parliament and from the summoning of a new one, free and full, who, meeting without oaths or engagements, might finally give contentment to the nation: that applications had been made to him for that purpose; but that he, sensible of his duty, had still told the petitioners, that the Parliament itself, which was now free, and would soon be full, was the best judge of all these measures, and that the whole community ought to acquiesce in their determination: that though he expressed himself in this manner to the people, he must now freely inform the House, that the fewer engagements were exacted, the more comprehensive would their plan prove, and the more satisfaction would it give to the nation: and that it was sufficient for public security, if the fanatical party and the royalists were excluded; since the principles of these factions were destructive of both government and liberty.

This speech was not agreeable to all; some of the members complained, Monk spoke too positively, and assumed too great an authority: that he affected a popularity, which justly rendered him suspected: that he engaged for the fidelity of the Irish officers, which, however, was to be doubted: that in saying, the cavaliers were not yet to have a share in the government, he gave that party hopes of being one day admitted: in short, it left them in suspense as to his real intentions.

Two days after, the Parliament had occasion to try Monk's fidelity. The common council of the city of London, assembling the 7th of February, resolved to pay no more taxes till the Parliament was filled. Upon advice of this resolution, the Parliament ordered Monk to lead his army into the city, seize eleven members of the common-council, and pull down the chains, gates, and port-cullices. Monk readily and instantly obeyed the order. He assembled his forces, entered the city, and arrested the eleven members of the common-council. Then he wrote to the Parliament an account of what he had done, praying them withal to moderate their rigour, with respect to the gates and port-cullices. But the Parliament, whether through animosity against the city, or a farther trial of Monk's fidelity, insisted upon a punctual compliance with their order, and were immediately obeyed. After that, he returned with his troops to Whitehall, which displeased the Parliament, believing Monk ought not to have quitted the city without their order. The same, or the following day, Praise God Barebone presented a petition to the House, subscribed by many persons, desiring the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart might be taken by all persons without exception, and he received the thanks of the House.

* It does not appear that the King was apprised of Monk's favourable intentions towards him.

† All the way from Leicester to St. Albans, they lodged in the same house with him, and when they withdrew to their own apartment, they always found or made some hole in the door or wall to look in or listen.

Monk's late proceedings astonished both his friends and the city of London. The magistrates, enraged at this treatment, looked upon him as a perfidious man, who had amused them with hopes of his supporting the re-admission of the secluded members, in order to know their sentiments, and as one absolutely devoted to the Parliament. On the other hand, his friends represented to him, that he was guilty of an irreparable fault, in quarrelling with the Londoners, who alone were able to support him against the Parliament bent upon his ruin, whatever they might pretend. That this commission was a snare, which had lost him the confidence of the city, and exposed him to the Parliament's designs against him; besides that, without the assistance of London, he would never, with his small army, be able to execute his intentions.*
